

ROTHSCHILD

ROTHSCHILD

PREFACE

Mayer Amschel Rothschild, the founder of the Rothschild fortune, at the time of his death in 1812, created a trust of his estate, by will, for the elevation of the Jewish race and the establishment of a Jewish World Empire. The cardinal principles of the trust were secrecy, that the estate should be kept intact as a unit, that the heirs and their heirs should have only a communal interest in it, and that the estate as a whole should be governed by the eldest son of the eldest son unless a majority of the heirs determined otherwise.

The estate has been preserved and managed since his death as a unit in pursuance of the provisions of his will. There are now several hundred heirs, for the family is a prolific one, but the estate is communal and still under the management of one head. So far as known, the provisions of the wills of the members of the family still contain in substance the directions of the founder of the fortune.

History affords but meager information regarding the rulers of this fortune and the extent of it, because of their secretive methods. No inventory has ever been filed and no division has ever been sought by any heir.

Most of the histories of the Rothschild family are either Jewish or strongly pro-Jewish. While they are extravagant in praise of the virtues of the different members of the Rothschild family, they are rather meager in facts. The facts herein related have been gleaned from many sources and are based on information believed to be reliable.

We do not know the extent of the founder's fortune at the time of his death in 1812, nor do we know the present magnitude of it, but apparently it represents about one-half of the wealth of the world.

This huge fortune has been devoted with great shrewdness and energy to the purpose of exploiting the Gentiles in all the countries of the globe. The methods employed are the manipulation of currencies, speculations on the exchanges, and wars.

The Rothschilds by these operations profit enormously because they have the power by virtue of their immense wealth and political power, to put prices up or down at pleasure. It is for these reasons that we have had most of our wars and depressions. The protocols and the communist’s code, which are identical in purpose and intent, represent their plan for the conquest of the world. Both of these codes were published subsequent to Mayer Amschel's death, but some of the protocols appear to have been in existence prior thereto. They, however, represent his principles as shown by all that we know of him.

This book is not written in a spirit of anti-Semitism, for I have Jewish friends that I do not wish to injure. It is written in the hope that it may be helpful in solving our Jewish problem peaceably and by appropriate legislation. To the extent that the remedies herein suggested may contribute to that end they will be helpful to the Jews as well as to the balance of us, for it is certain that the people of this country will never meekly submit to slavery.

In writing and publishing this book I am inspired by no other motive than to render a service to my country. I realize that I am taking some risk in doing so—at least that of persecution. Adequate provision has been made for the publication and distribution of this book regardless of the author.

September 12, 1940. George Armstrong

Editors note:

This version differs slightly from the original book due to the fact that it is reformatted from a low quality scan, and that the original book wasn't available for reference during formatting.

CONTENTS

Preface 3

THE ROTHSCHILD EMPIRE 7

The Protocols 9

The Protocols Are Authentic 15

The Jews Defense 23

Mayer Amschel Rothschild, First King of the Jews 31

The Rothschild Dynasty 39

The Wealth of the Rothschild Family 49

The Mighty Rothschild Power 55

The "Kept" Press 61

The Murder Gang 69

World War I 75

League of Nations 83

Gold 89

World War II 95

Our Despot of the Blood of Zion 103

Our Undeclared War against Germany 107

Plan of Mobilization 113

THE SUBJUGATION OF AMERICA 121

Franklin D. Roosevelt 123

The Reds in the Saddle 131

Report of the Dies Committee 139
Corruption, Everywhere Corruption 147
Federal Reserve System 153
Deflations of 1920 and 1930 159
Deflation of 1937 165
"On Our Way"(Whither?) 171
Liars and Thieves 177
Mismanaged Currency 185
Bankruptcy 193
Poverty and Despair 201
America Enters the War 207
Skulduggery 213
Party Government 219
"King Franklin, 1st" 225
Traitors 233
Slavery 247
APPENDIX I. 251
APPENDIX II. 253

PART I

THE ROTHSCHILD EMPIRE

I.

THE PROTOCOLS

"For ages past the sons of Israel, despised and persecuted, have been working to open up a path to power. They are hitting the mark. They control the economic life of the accursed Christians; their influence preponderates over politicians and over manners."-—From "Funeral Oration of Rabbi Reichhorn."

Professor Serge Nilus of Russia published the Jewish "Protocols" in 1905. They purport to represent the minutes of secret meetings of the leading men of the Jewish race, and to set forth their plans for acquiring the wealth of the peoples of the world, for the overthrow of all governments, and for the creation of the Kingdom of the Jews with a Jewish king. It is stated in the introduction of the booklet that the protocols means "minutes of the proceedings of the Learned Elders of Zion and that these protocols give the substance of addresses delivered to the innermost circles of the rulers of Zion."

It is also stated that "the presumption is strong that the protocols were issued or re-issued at the first Zionist Congress held at Basle (Switzerland) in 1897 under the presidency of the father of modern Zionism, the late Theodore Herzl." It is also stated that the names of the present elders are a profound secret, that they are the "Hidden Hand" that rules the world, and that they probably consist of "three hundred men, each of whom knows all of the others, govern the fate of the European continent, and they elect their successors from their entourage." (Quoting the late Walter Rathnau, a Jew of Germany, as authority.)

The "Learned Elders of Zion" was probably a religious order in the beginning, as indicated by the name. But if such was the original foundation of the order, its character, and likewise its name, has since been changed. It is now purely a political racial organization and its present name is the "Council of the Jewish Agency." It is likely that the name was changed on account of the exposure by Nilus.

This order must be distinguished from "Elders of the Synagogue" and "Elders of Israel," which are purely religious organizations.

It must also be distinguished from the "Zionist Congress" and "Zionist General Council." These two latter organizations are semi-religious and semi-political and they are also semi-secret and semi-public. They are composed wholly of members of the Zionist church, but not all Jews by any means are church-men.

It is also to be distinguished from the ancient Jewish Symarium or San Hedrin which was the supreme judicial and administrative authority during the reign of the Roman Herod, when Christ was crucified. It was composed of their "Chief Priests, rulers, scribes, and Elders." and was at that time the supreme judicial and political Jewish authority.

A recent convention of the "Zionist Congress" was held in Zurich, Switzerland, for the purpose of considering the partition of Palestine, which was attended by 480 delegates, from all countries. It appears from the proceedings of this convention that Professor Chaim Weinzmann, formerly of Russia but now of England, was re-elected as president of this international congress; that Rabbi Wise of New York is president of the American branch; that an executive committee of eleven was appointed with full authority to act; that the "Zionist General Council" was increased from 54 to 70, the additional members being appointed by the convention.

It appears also from the proceedings of this convention that it defined the policy of the Zionist Church toward the partition of Palestine, subject to the approval of the "Council of the Jewish Agency" the final authority—the present "Learned Elders of Zion," the secret three hundred, the "Hidden Hand." It appears also that the Royal Commission of the British Government made its report regarding the partition of Palestine to Lord Rothschild as a member of the "Council of the Jewish Agency" and not to Professor Weinzmann as the head of the "Zionist Congress." It appears also that the reason therefore is the fact that the "Council of the Jewish Agency" is the authorized agency of the Jewish race—sectarian and non-sectarian.

Thus the supreme authority of this "Jewish Agency" is officially recognized by both the British Government and the Zionist Congress, although the latter is composed of regularly elected delegates from all countries of the world. What is it? Who are its present members? By what authority does it act? What are its purposes? And why all of this secrecy, if its purposes are honest and legitimate?

We cannot know much about this order because of its secret character and its secret methods. We know that Lord Rothschild was until his recent death a member of it, and that Lord Melchett of England is now said to be its chairman. We may assume that the Rothschild family has dominated it since the time of Amschel Rothschild. It is the government of the financial power of the Jewish race that rules the world, including America.

It is the cabal of the leading Jewish bankers and politicians who were formerly called the "Elders of Zion" and now the "Council of the Jewish Agency."

Whatever may have been the original character and purposes of the "Learned Elders of Zion" there can be no doubt about the fact that there was such an organization, that it now exists in some form, and that it is seeking to carry out the program set out in the protocols and according to the plan of the protocols.

There is no other explanation of the secret "Council of the Jewish Agency" and its achievements. There is no other explanation of the Versailles peace treaty, the League of Nations, the Bank of International Settlements, the International Labor Board, the deliberate impoverishment of the people of the world by the manipulations of the Elders, and for the present wars and past wars. This is all a definite program with a definite purpose, and that program and purpose are truly set out with brutal frankness in the protocols.

II.

THE PROTOCOLS ARE AUTHENTIC

" 'Per me reges requant.' 'It is through me that kings reign.' And it was said by the prophets that we were chosen by God himself to rule over the whole earth. God has endowed us with genius that we may he equal to our task."—From Protocol 5.

The Jews, of course, deny the authenticity of the Protocols. It is natural that they should do so. To admit it would be to defeat the purposes of their scheme. Moreover, the plan itself calls for such secrecy and duplicity.

The program is so cruel, so inhuman, so diabolical, and the objects to be accomplished appear so fantastic and remote that it is difficult to believe that this program still obtains. It should, however, be remembered that since the publications of the protocols a great and powerful nation, Russia, has been conquered by a handful of Jews; that Kuhn, Loeb & Co., Paul Warburg, and other Jews, financed the coup de etat by which the Jews secured control of the Russian government; and that the cruel and inhuman methods set out in the protocols were followed mercilessly in Russia by its Jewish government. It should be also remembered that the Jewish Second and Third Internationals of Russia are now actively organizing the forces of communism in every country of the world, including our own.

There are more Jews in America today than there were in Russia when the government was overthrown, and they are much more powerful and aggressive. It is estimated that there are now 80 times more communists in America than there were in Russia at that time. The same methods that were employed for the overthrow of the Czarist regime are being pursued here, viz: political corruption and class hatred.

As cruel and inhuman and incredible as are the protocols, they are no more so than the Talmud, whose authenticity the Jews admit. In fact the spirit and philosophy of the protocols permeate the Talmud, and vice versa. They are both founded upon the false premise that the Jews are a superior people and that they are the "chosen" people. They both breathe the same hatred and contempt for the Christian Gentile whom they call the 'goyim.' They both not only justify but advocate the exploitation and enslavement of the despised 'goyim.'

The Talmud is the law and gospel of the Jews. It is their bible and civil law as defined and interpreted by their chief priests and Rabbis.

"It must be admitted by every critical student of history that the Talmud has not merely been the means of keeping alive the religious idea among the Jews, but has formed their strongest bond of union."[1]

It is not the Talmud but the rabbi that has kept alive the racial and religious solidarity and bigotry and intolerance of the Jews.

The following brief quotations from "The Talmud Unmasked"[2] are examples of it:

"The life of a Goi and all his powers belong to a Jew." (A. Rohl. Die Polem. p. 20)." (P. 71).

"In Choschen Ham. (266.1) it says: 'A Jew may keep anything he finds which belongs to the Akum, for it is written: Return to thy brethren what is lost (Deuter. XXII, 3) . For he who returns lost property (to Christians) sins against the Law by increasing the power of the transgressors of the Law.'" (P. 72).

"In Midrasch Talpioth (fol. 225d) it says: 'God created them in the form of men for the glory of Israel. But Akum were created for the sole end of ministering unto them (the Jews) day and night. Nor can they ever be relieved of this service. It is becoming to the son of a king (an Israelite) that animals in their natural form, and animals in the form of human beings should minister unto him'." (P. 50).

"And in Eben Haezer (44, 8) : 'If a Jew enters into marriage with an Akum (Christian), or with his servant, the marriage is null. For they are not capable of entering into matrimony. Likewise if an Akum or a servant enter into matrimony with a Jew, the marriage is null'." (P. 51).

Many of these dicta are ancient but have never been repudiated or repealed and the spirit of them still prevails. They still constitute the law for the Jews, both civil and ecclesiastical. The Talmud is made up of the decisions and interpretations of the rabbis, in the same manner that our common law has been formed by our judges and commentators. No matter how ancient the dictum, it is the law until overruled by a contrary one.

---

[1] Encyclopedia Britannica, Vol. 23, p. 38.

[2] "The Talmud Unmasked" by Rev. I. B. Prainatis, Copyrighted by Col. E. N. Sanctuary, 156 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

The Jewish Encyclopedia, Vol 4, p. 294-296, defines the rabbis' functions as follows:

> "Rabbi (my master); function to teach the scriptures and the oral and traditional laws . . . In the Jewish religion the rabbi is no priest, no apostle, he has no hierarchical authority. He is a teacher, one who unfolds and explains religion, teaches the young in the school, the old from the pulpit, and both by his writings."

The reader should observe the intermingling of their civil and religious laws. Both appear to be based on their interpretation of the Old Testament (see reference to Deuter. XXII, 3 above). They are so confused that it is impossible to determine where their religion ends and their civil law begins.

It is clear, however, that both in a civil and religious sense they regard themselves as a "chosen" people, a superior race who are entitled to rule us (the 'goyim'), and are entitled to our services and to everything we have. We Gentiles were created for the purpose of serving them, of being their slaves. Although in the form of "human beings" we are no better than animals. We are not worthy of marrying one of them, either man or woman, and if we do, such marriage is illegal and void. They have adhered to this law rather religiously throughout the ages and in all countries.

The author sums up their estimate of us (the goyim) as follows:

> "They are idolaters, the worst kind of people, much worse than the Turks, murderers, fornicators, impure animals, like dirt, unworthy to be called men, beasts in human form, worthy of the name of beasts, cows, asses, pigs, dogs, worse than dogs; that they propagate after the manner of beasts, that they have a diabolic origin, that their souls come from the devil and return to the devil in hell after death; and that even the body of a dead Christian is nothing different from that of an animal."[3]

---

[3] The Talmud Unmasked. P. 46.

The following are samples of their estimate of Christians and of our Savior, Jesus Christ:

> "In Hilkhoth Akum" (X, 1) it says: 'Do not eat with idolaters, nor permit them to worship their idols; for it is written: Make no covenant with them, nor show mercy unto them (Deuter. ch. 7) ; 2) . Either turn them away from their idols or kill them.'
>
> "Ibidem (X, 7) : 'In places where Jews are strong, no idolater must be allowed to remain'."[4]
>
> "The book Zohar, III (282) tells us that Jesus died like a beast and was buried in that 'dirt heap . . . where they throw the dead bodies of dogs and asses, and where the sons of Esau (the Christians) and of Ishmael (the Turks), also Jesus and Mohammad, uncircumcised and unclean like dead dogs, are buried."[5]
>
> The author sums up their verdict as follows:
>
> "The Talmud teaches that Jesus Christ was illegitimate arid was conceived during menstruation; that he had the soul of Esau; that he was a fool, a conjurer, a seducer; that he was crucified, buried in hell and set up as an idol ever since by his followers." (P. 30).

They call this a religion and they insist on their privilege to worship God as they choose, and they decry our intolerance and bigotry. The Christian religion is based upon love and charity and repentance and the forgiveness of sin. There is no charity, no love, and no repentance here; there is nothing but pride, intolerance, and hatred.

The Christian religion is everything the Talmud is not, and the Talmud is everything the Christian religion is not; it and its devotees are the anti-Christ. We have the spectacle now of a Jewish rabbi, a Catholic priest and a Protestant preacher going about over the country at Jewish expense preaching tolerance; a virtue that is utterly foreign to the Jewish religion and the Jewish character.

---

[4] P. 98.

[5] P. 48.

The chief priests and rabbis who wrote the various and numerous dissertations set forth in the Talmud could have written the protocols. They are of kindred nature and expression; they are made of the same cloth and patterned in the same fashion.

We prefer to think that the Talmud and the protocols misrepresent the viewpoint of the Jews that we know and with whom we come in daily contact, and that may be true of many of them. However that may be, we know that the Jews hold themselves as a race apart and that they adhere religiously to their ancient racial customs and rituals and organizations. We know also that they blindly "follow the leader," and that their rabbis and Learned Elders are their leaders. They believe in their Talmud and obey its edicts—indeed they must do so or suffer racial ostracism; and they worship the Rothschilds and the Rothschild power that rules them.

These and similar proclamations as set forth in the Talmud, constitute the "bond" that has held the race together. They explain the fact that the Jew does not assimilate with other races. They are based on the false assumption that the Jews are a "chosen" and superior people.

The Talmud is mistaken. The Jews are not a "chosen" or a superior people. God never made any such mistake as that. The history of the race is not one of achievement of anything except money. It is one of chiseling and of defrauding the peoples of the various countries in which they have resided, which has often been followed by their own alleged persecution. In this life we usually reap what we sow, or in common parlance, "get what is coming to us." The history of Judaism is proof of the truth of this proverb.

It may be conceded that the Jew is more shrewd and cunning, and a better trader and manipulator of money than the Gentile—but that represent the limit of his superiority and achievements. The Jew has contributed but little to science, invention, art, to the wealth of nations, or to the advancement of civilization.

I hope that I am not intolerant and anti-Semitic, but I confess that I have no patience with a religion that denounces Christ as a bastard, an imposter and a cheat, and that glory in his crucifixion; and I am against a race that holds me as an inferior being and seeks to enslave me. I nevertheless wish to be fair and just, as well as candid and plain-spoken, in my discussion of the subject.

I can make allowance for the fact that the Jews feel, and probably righteously so, an ancient grievance against the Gentiles because of past oppressions, which is kept alive by their rabbis and Learned Elders and their protocols and Talmud. But it is high time for them to get over it, to forget their vengeance and to abandon their ambitious designs, particularly here in America where we do not want to harm them, and wish to accord them all of the rights and privileges we enjoy.

The renegade Gentiles who cooperate with them in furthering their villainous scheme, viz., to enslave the peoples of the world, are no better than the Jews. They are in fact worse, for they are without the excuse of race or religion. They are simply unmitigated scoundrels. They will herein be designated for descriptive purposes as Jewish. This term will be used also in describing hybrids and those suspected of Jewish blood.

III.

THE JEWS DEFENSE

"For what purpose then have we invented this whole policy and insinuated it into the minds of the goys without giving them any chance to examine its underlying meaning? For what, indeed, if not in order to obtain in a roundabout way what is for our scattered tribe unattainable by the direct road? It is this which has served as the basis for our organization of secret masonry which is not known to, and aims which are not even so much as suspected by these goy cattle, attracted by us into the "show" army of Masonic lodges in order to throw dust in the eyes of their fellows."—From Protocol 11.

The Liberty Magazine (Feb. 10 and 17, 1940) published two articles under the heading "The Jews and Free Masonry — Exploding the Myth of a World Conspiracy," written by Louis B. Davidson and Frederic L. Collins. These articles represent the flimsy and threadbare defense of the Jews that has been published from time to time in various forms. They purport to contain a synopsis of the testimony given in the trial at Berne, Switzerland, where the trial court found the defendant booksellers guilty and declared the protocols to be "forgery, plagiarism, and obscene literature."

There is some historical truth in this story, mixed as it is with much that is false, but the conclusions based upon this admixture are wholly false. It is true as they assert, that "there is no international organization of Free-masonry, and the organization of each nation is independent of all others." The continental masonry is composed wholly of Jews and hybrids. While the Jews are permitted to be masons in America (Catholics are excluded), they do not dominate the order and it is not a racial one and is not communistic. It is a non-political fraternal benevolent organization, while continental masonry is a political, malevolent one.

No one claims, except the authors of these articles, that "the noble order of Freemasons should be drawn into this campaign or calumny," or "links free masonry with world Jewry in a mythical conspiracy to rule the world." It is admitted, as these authors allege, that the "Illuminati" founded by the Jew Adam Weishaupt was a branch of the continental masons and that "the chief aim of this organization . . . was the destruction of all forms of religion, government, property, marriage, and all civil rights," which is likewise the present chief aim of the "Learned Elders of Zion," and of the Jewish communist party.

It is also admitted, as they allege, that the Illuminati "played a major role in bringing on the bloody days of 1789 (French Revolution), that it was founded and reputedly financed by Jews," and that the "great House of Rothschild was then just rising to the financial heights." There is evidence that it was in fact financed by the "great House of Rothschild;" and the French revolution was in fact brought about by the Jews. It was the final act that freed the Jews from their political and civil disabilities in France.

It is also true, as they allege, that the "Kerensky government in 1917 confiscated the entire issue (of the protocols) except one volume which had been sent to the British museum. It is said that the Jew Kerensky not only destroyed all of the copies to be found in Russia but that every Gentile found in possession of one was murdered. What stronger proof of guilt could there be? Men do not fear lies and forgeries; it is the truth that the guilty always want to suppress.

The copy that was sent to the British Museum was translated by Victor Marsden, a representative of the London Morning Post, who had previously resided in Russia for many years. It is true, as they allege, that the protocols have been translated into French, Italian, Arabic, German, Japanese and Scandinavian languages. It is said that their circulation is second only to that of the bible.

I have no means of knowing whether the protocols are responsible for the pogroms in Russia, as detailed in the articles mentioned. They have undoubtedly created a profound impression throughout the world, which is evidence that people believe them despite the Jewish control of the press, and their ridicule and their denials.

"Are they authentic? Shouted the alarmed editor of the (Jewish owned) London Times in May 1920," according to these authors. "What malevolent society made these schemes and is now triumphing over their realization? Are they forged? From where does the weird gift of prophecy spring that partly has come true and is partly to be realized? . . . Have we escaped a German peace by straining all our national resources only to submit to a Jewish peace?" (This is precisely what happened). The above quotation is from the Liberty article. They do not tell us what the Jewish owners did to this "alarmed editor." They probably crucified him.

It is not true that Nilus was a "briefless avocat" in Russia and it is not true that he wrote the protocols to "find favor with the Grand Duchess Elizabeth." Even the authors of the Liberty articles do not vouch for this fantastic story. Why then mention it? On the contrary, Nilus was a reputable educator and author of unimpeachable integrity. He believed that the "Hidden Hand" was the author of the protocols, and such was also the belief of Victor Marsden the translator, and such is also the belief of millions of people in all countries.

Assuming that the authors have correctly quoted the various paragraphs from "Maurice Joly's Dialogues in Hell," it must be admitted that there is evident plagiarism by the real author of the protocols. But that does not prove that Nilus was the plagiarist. If the "dialogues in hell" truly represented the hellish plans of the Elders it is but natural that they should adopt them and use them. In that case they are the plagiarists.

The weakest part of the whole argument is the statement of the evidence upon which the Berne trial court predicated its judgment. It is in substance as follows: The Princess Catherine Radziwill testified that she knew "the Paris agent of the Russian secret police and that she knew Golovinsky, very well;" that Golovinsky had access to Joly's Dialogues, that he "came to her home with parts of the script which he showed and read to her; . . . that his job was to prove to the Czar that the Jews had formed an international plot to conquer the world."

She was asked, "Could you describe Golovinsky's draft?" She replied, "Yes, as he kept reading passages to me I became familiar with the entire script. He later showed me the completed manuscript. It was identical with the Protocols of Zion, which I later saw in the various Nilus editions. It was written in French in a variety of handwritings. It was on yellowish paper; there was a big circular blue ink blot on the first page."

"This description was confirmed by the Count du Chayla, who described the text as unidiomatic and showing every sign of having been written by a foreigner on cheap yellowish paper —and said that on the first page was a circular ink blot."

It should be remembered that this trial was in 1935, just thirty years after the publication of the protocols in 1905. It must be conceded that these two witnesses who were able to remember the contents of a lengthy document that did not concern them, and an ink spot thereon, for such a long period of time, had most remarkable memories. It is obviously manufactured testimony, but if all they said were true it does not prove that Nilus forged the protocols or that they are spurious.

The decision of the Bern trial court was reversed by the appellate court, which the said Liberty authors failed to mention. This reversal is not surprising in view of the utter lack of competent and credible evidence. It should be also remembered that the Jews selected their own court in which to file their suit.

It is a cinch that they selected a Jewish or pro-Jewish one. They wanted to be able to proclaim to the world, as they do, that the courts have adjudged that the protocols are spurious.

In passing judgment on the Jews and their denials, it should always be remembered that the Talmud enjoins them to deceive the Christians, to lie to them and to cheat them. It is their law and their religion, and it is the part of it that many of them observe industriously and enthusiastically. We "goyim" are as dumb and gullible as they believe us to be if we accept such flimsy explanations at par.

The succeeding chapters of this book will prove conclusively that the "Learned Elders of Zion"—the present Council of the Jewish Agency are now ceaselessly and relentlessly pursuing their ancient plan to enslave the people of the world and to establish their world empire. There can be no proof of such a secret conspiracy other than by its fruits. There can be no explanation of current events or of the worlds history for the past 150 years except the machinations of the financial power that has governed it during that period of time.

It will be hereafter proven with reasonable certainty that the protocols contain the law of the Rothschild money power that now rules every country of the world, including our own. The protocols are the "law of our bank" to which Rabbi Reichhorn referred in his funeral oration (see Appendix II). They are the law of the Bank of England, the Bank of France, the New York Federal Reserve Bank, the Washington Federal Reserve Board, J. P. Morgan & Co., and Kuhn, Loeb & Co., and of N. M. Rothschild & Sons and of Georges Mandel (Jeroboam Rothschild).

They are the key that explains the political maneuverings of this malign power. When it is once clearly understood that these immense financial institutions are all controlled by the "King-Despot of the blood of Zion" who is none other than the present head of the Rothschild family, we can better understand the turmoil of the world and our own distressed condition.

It should be observed that the protocol quoted at the beginning of this chapter states that there are two kinds of masonry, viz: "secret masonry" and "show masonry;" that the "aims" of the secret masonry are known only to themselves and that they are not even suspected by the "goy cattle" who compose the "show masonry."

The secret masonry in France was the "Illuminati," and in Russia and the balance of Europe, the Nihilists, and in America the B'nai B'rith. It should be also observed that the protocols make the distinction between the ignorant "goy cattle" who are members of the "show" lodges, and their own wise sect who belong to their secret orders. The Illuminati and Nihilists were destroyers and killers. The B'nai B'rith is a modern secret order and has no history behind it; all we know of it is that it is a secret racial organization to promote racial "aims."

IV.

MAYER AMSCHEL ROTHSCHILD, FIRST KING OF THE JEWS

> "The King of the Jews will be the real Pope of the Universe, the patriarch of an international church." —From Protocol 17.

MAYER AMSCHEL ROTHSCHILD, 1—1790-1812.

Mayer Amschel was born in 1743 and died Sept. 29, 1812. He married Gutter Schnaper in 1770. They had a large family consisting of five sons and five daughters. He was educated as a rabbi and in his early life was both a rabbi and a junk and coin dealer. He became a money lender and in that connection acted as agent for William IX, Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel.

There is much obscurity in the history of the Rothschild family, due to the fact that their operations are always secret and the historians are either Semitic or anti-Semitic, the majority being Semitic. The conclusions here presented are based principally on Jewish or pro-Jewish history. I shall quote liberally from the Jewish Encyclopedia because it was, as stated in its preface, "prepared by more than 400 scholars and specialists" all of whom were Jews.[6] It was published in 1905 and re-published in 1909. While it is a partisan history, it is on the whole, accurate in its statements of fact—it at least presents the Jew version of the facts.

The authority mentioned says:

> "In a latter connection (money lender) he became an agent of William IX, Landgrave cf Hesse-Cassel, who on his father's death in 1785 had inherited the largest private fortune in Europe (estimated at $40,000,000) derived mainly from the hire of troops to the British government for the putting down of the revolution in the United States . . . After the battle of June in 1806 the Landgrave fled to Denmark, leaving 600,000 pounds (about $3,000,000) with Mayer Rothschild for safe keeping."

---

[6] *Jewish Ency. Vol. X, p. 499 et seq.

It states further:

> "According to legend this money was hidden away in wine casks and escaping the search of Napoleon's soldiers when they entered Frankfort, was restored intact in the same casks in 1814 when the elector returned to the electorate. The facts are somewhat less romantic and more business-like."

The facts are entirely "less romantic and more businesslike," (from the Jewish standpoint). Mayer Amschel Rothschild embezzled the money. This money was tainted from its very origin. It was paid by the British government to the Landgrave for the services of his soldiers, used to suppress the American revolution, and the soldiers were morally entitled to it. It was first embezzled by William of Hesse and then by Mayer Amschel.

This twice-stolen money is the foundation of the huge Rothschild fortune. It has ever since been true to its origin. There is not an honestly acquired dollar in the hundreds of billions now possessed by the Rothschild family.

Instead of putting the money in wine casks, Mayer Rothschild sent the entire sum, with his son Nathan, to London, and then and there established the London branch of the family.

> "Nathan . . . invested it in 800,000,000 pounds of gold from the East India Company, knowing that it would be needed for Wellington's peninsula campaign. He made no less than four profits: (1) on the sale of Wellington's paper (which he bought at 50c on the dollar and collected at par); (2) on the sale of gold to Wellington; (3) on its re-purchase; and (4) on forwarding it to Portugal. This was the beginning of the great fortune." (p. 494).

This was indeed much "less romantic and more businesslike." With this vast sum of money, branches of the House of Rothschild were established in Berlin, Paris, Vienna and Naples, with one of the brothers in charge of each of them. AH of these houses were exceedingly prosperous, particularly the London and Paris branches.

The founder of this huge fortune, Mayer Amschel Rothschild, established four fundamental principles for its government, which the sons and their descendents have observed, viz:

(1) The eldest son of the eldest son to be the head and ruler of the fortune. He became the head by virtue of his seniority unless the majority of the members of the family decided otherwise. There have been only two exceptions to this rule so far as revealed by history, and that was the appointment of Nathan, the third son of Mayer Amschel, as its head, and later the appointment of James the fifth son. By reason of his achievements Nathan was appointed the head of the fortune upon Mayer Amschel's death in 1812.

(2) The inter-marriage of cousins. This was for the purpose of preserving the family fortune intact and in the family. This rule has not been strictly observed, particularly by the female members of the family, due no doubt partially to rebellion on the part of some members of the family and partially to the fact that other Jews have become very rich and by reason of marriage the family fortune has been enhanced rather than depleted.

> "The number of marriages between cousins in the late history of the family is remarkable . . . Of 58 marriages, 29, or exactly one-half, have been between first cousins. It is noteworthy that these marriages have been fertile and that most of the children have been girls, which is what is anticipated by biological science."

(3) The unity of the family fortune and its concealment. No copy of Mayer Amschel's will has been published by any of the historians of the family. All that we are permitted to know about it is what the historians say of it, by the record of the family and by the reference to it in the will of one of his grandsons, Anselm, of Vienna. It contains the following provision:

> "In accordance with the exhortations of my father, the grandfather who so sincerely loved them (Anselm's children), as contained in Clause 15 of his will, may they and their descendants remain constantly true to their ancestral Jewish faith.
>
> "I forbid them most explicitly, in any circumstances whatever, to have any public inventory made by the courts, or otherwise, of my estate . . . Also I forbid any legal action, and any publication of the value of the inheritance . . . Anyone who disregards these provisions and takes any kind of action which conflicts with them shall immediately be regarded as having disputed the will, and shall suffer the penalties for so doing."[7]

[7] The Reign of the House of Rothschild, p. 405.

(4) A perpetual family partnership. At the time of Mayer Amschel's death, his entire estate was in the form of a partnership composed of himself and his five sons, each having an equal interest, under the firm name of M. A. Rothschild & Sons. Both the partnership agreement and Mayer Amschel's will provided that the partners and their male descendants should forever constitute the firm and manage it. The will provided also that the female members of the family and their heirs and husbands should have no part in the management of the firm and that they should receive their interest in the estate subject to the management of the male members; and that if any of them should contest this arrangement that they would lose their interest in the estate.

Later, Nathan organized the London firm of N. M. Rothschild & Sons on the same plan. This firm was probably owned in equal proportions by him and his brothers and governed in the same manner as the parent partnership.

Originally the partnership agreement provided that no important decision should be made without the approval of all the partners. As the fortune grew in magnitude it became impractical to hold partners conferences upon its numerous undertakings. It is probable that Nathan's firm was organized in part to meet that situation and for the purpose of separating the activities of the London house from those of the continental houses.

It was probably Mayer Amschel's purpose in the beginning to establish a Jewish dynasty with his male descendants as rulers. Whether that was his purpose or not, it was the effect of his will. He established the kingdom of the Jews that has since been governed by his male descendants. Wherever a Jew is located, whatever nationality he may claim, he is a subject of this kingdom; his allegiance and duty to it supersedes his allegiance and duty to the country in which he dwells.

If a conflict develops between the government of his adopted country and his racial government, the Jew will always be found on the side of his race. He may not know the personnel of his racial government, its decisions may be unwritten, but they will reach him in some form, through his rabbis and through secret societies, and he is always obedient to them. That fact furnishes the explanation of all this Jewish war propaganda which is supported blindly and without dissent by all Jews.

At the time of Mayer Amschel's death he was by far the richest man in the world or that had ever lived. The magnitude of his fortune at that time is unknown. It was growing by leaps and bounds at such a rapid rate that it probably could not be estimated. He knew the power of money and the wisdom of secrecy. He believed with religious fervor that the Jews were the "chosen people" and that God had promised them that they should rule the world.

We cannot know whether at that time he had in contemplation a Jewish world empire. Apparently this was a later development. There is good reason to believe that this ambitious enterprise was initiated by Theodore Herzl a short time before the publication of the protocols in 1905. Herzl was an active, ambitious Jewish rabbi-politician and an intense hater of the Gentiles. He was given credit for organizing modern Zionism at a conference of the leaders of the Hebrew race in Basle, Switzerland, in 1897. It is thought that at that time and at that meeting some of the protocols were adopted as precepts for the establishment of the contemplated Jewish empire.

Herzl probably organized two important Jewish organizations: (1) a secret super-organization to be composed of 300 men whose identity should be kept secret and who would constitute the super-government for the Jewish race; (2) a popular religious organization to be composed of 450 delegates selected by the rabbis and the Hebrew churches.

At that time the Rothschild estate had grown to enormous proportions but the family had grown soft with luxury and had deteriorated by inbreeding. Moreover the fortune at that time had already effected the emancipation of the Jews and established the Rothschild kingdom. Apparently it then had the power under efficient management to establish a Jewish empire. Apparently also the management of the vast political power of the estate needed to be reinforced with outside blood. It is likely that at that time and through Herzl's activities, the Secret Committee of 300 was established for the management of the political power of the huge estate with the consent of the Rothschilds. It is known that Theodore Herzl was an intimate personal friend of Lord Rothschild, II.

The protocols themselves, or the gist of them, appear to have existed for a long period of time prior to their publication in 1905. In fact the intent and purpose of them are in substance contained in the Talmud. They were also in substance stated in 1869 in the Funeral Oration of Rabbi Reichhorn (set out in Appendix II). They evince a clear conception of the weakness of Gentile governments and institutions, and the best method to attack and destroy them. They set out the most effective method of establishing a dictatorship of the proletariat, which is the first step toward World Empire.

The protocols themselves describe in great detail the powers of the King-Despot of their proposed empire, and the objectives of such empire. Stated briefly they are the absorption of the wealth of the Gentiles and their slavery, both politically and economically. They have already accomplished the debt slavery of the goyim; their present objective is his political slavery.

V.

THE ROTHSCHILD DYNASTY

> "Our power in the present tottering condition of all forms of power will be more invincible than any other, because it will remain invisible until the moment when it has gained such strength that no cunning can any longer undermine it."— From Protocol I.

King Amschel Rothschild I, was succeeded upon his death by his third son, Nathan, of London, on account of his uncanny and unscrupulous financial ability, and because of his achievements. He had, prior to Amschel's death, established the private banking house of N. M. Rothschild & Sons, and added enormously to the family fortune. It appears that the elder brother, Mayer Amschel, jr., who continued in charge of the Frankfort branch, recognized the superior qualifications of Nathan and was willing to waive his right by virtue of primo geniture. Nathan was therefore chosen by the four brothers as his father's successor.

KING NATHAN ROTHSCHILD II.—1812-1836.

Nathan married the sister-in-law of Moses Montefiore, "thus coming into association with the heads of the Sephardic community then ruling the financial world of London through their connection with Amsterdam."[8] Nathan is described by the historian John Reeves, a Rothschild partisan, as being a very shrewd, unscrupulous and uncouth man, and exceedingly close-fisted. He says that "he never paid his employees a farthing more than was necessary for their bare subsistence or at least not a farthing more than they could compel him to pay."[9]

The Jew, Benjamin Disraeli, in his novel "Coningsby," denominates Nathan and also his son Lionel as "Sidonia." He says of the elder "Sidonia":

> "He arrived here (London) after the peace of Paris with his large capital. He staked all that he was worth on the Waterloo loan and the event made him one of the greatest capitalists in Europe . . . He reaped the due reward of his sagacity. Europe did require money and Sidonia was ready to lend it to Europe. France wanted some, Austria more, Prussia a little, Russia a few millions; Sidonia could furnish them all. The only country which he avoided was Spain; he was too well acquainted with its resources."

[8] Jewish Ency., Vol. X, p. 494.

[9] "The Rothschilds,—Financial Rulers of Nations."

Disraeli says of him further:

"He established a brother or a near relative in whom he could confide, in most of the principal capitals. He was lord and master of the money markets of the world and of course virtually lord and master of everything else. He literally held the revenues of southern Italy in pawn, and monarchs and ministers of all countries courted his advice and were guided by his suggestions."

John Reeves, in his book "The Rothschilds," says:

"One cause of his (Nathan's) success was the secrecy with which he shrouded, and the tortuous policy with which he misled those who watched him the keenest." (P. 189).

And this principle, it may be added, has governed the management of the Rothschild fortune from its beginning to this hour.

The historian Reeves describes vividly how upon Nathan's return from near the battle of Waterloo (the Jews are usually observers of battles, not participants), he went post haste to the English Channel and there hired a boat at excessive cost and crossed the English channel in stormy weather, and from there rushed to the London stock exchange, appearing muddy and dejected, where he passed out the word that Wellington had been defeated at Waterloo, and reinforced this by ostentatiously dumping stocks on the market. This created a great panic upon the exchange and everybody dumped their stocks at sacrifice prices. In the meantime Nathan, through his agents, was secretly buying them.

There were no telegraphs or telephones or radios or fast posts in those days. It was several days before the news reached London that Wellington had won the battle of Waterloo. There was then great rejoicing and the stock market rebounded and stocks went to unprecedented heights, when Nathan unloaded his stocks.

This is precisely the method that the Rothschilds have followed since, and is one of the methods by which they have amassed their huge fortune. "Nathan boasted that he had multiplied their capital 2500 times in the course of five years."[10]

If this is true, it means that at that time (about 1820) the capital of the English branch had been increased from $3,000,000 to about $7,500,000,000.

Nathan established the private banking firm of N. M. Rothschild & Sons in London, with branches in Paris, Berlin, Vienna and Naples. This firm operates on the exchanges, underwrites government and other loans; it is the agent and manager of banks, railways, steel, munitions, and other corporations. It has branches under many names. In America it is represented by Kuhn, Loeb & Co., and formerly by August Belmont & Co. It is probable also that J. P. Morgan & Co., Seligman & Co., Speyer & Co., Lehman & Co., and other private Jewish banks are its under-cover branches.

Lionel Rothschild, the eldest son of Nathan, succeeded him as the head and managing partner of N. M. Rothschild & Sons. He is described by his fellow tribesman, Disraeli, as follows:

> "He perceived himself a lone being, alike without cares and without duties; his religion walled him out from the pursuits of a citizen . . . He was a man without affections . . . The only human quality that interested 'Sidonia' was intellect . . . No minister of state had such communication with secret agents and political spies as Sidonia; he held relations with all the clever outcasts of the world. The catalogue of his acquaintance in the shape of Greeks, Armenians, Moors, secret Jews, Tartars, gypsies, wandering Poles and Carbonari, would throw a curious light on those subterranean agencies of which the world in general knows so little, but which exercise so great an influence on public events."[11]

[10] "The Rothschilds, Financial Rulers of Nations," p. 167.

[11] "Coningsby," by Benjamin Disraeli, p. 180-181.

The Jewish Encyclopedia states:

> "Lionel was the friend and counselor of the Prince Consort and of Disraeli, whose Sidonia in "Coningsby" is an ideal portrait of him . . . that he brought about in 1858 the enactment of the disabilities bill which permitted the Jews to hold office in England . . .
>
> "He advanced the British government the money for the Irish famine loan (about $40,000,000) and also for the Crimean war (about $80,000,000), and that for twenty years he acted as agent for the Russian government.
>
> "He had a large share in the successful funding of the United States national debt, provided the funds for the immediate purchase of the Suez Canal shares; he was also active in facilitating the payment of the French indemnity to Germany, in directing the finances of the Austrian Empire, and the Egyptian loan of 8,500,000 pounds. (About $40,000,000)."[12]

The statement is in error as to the funding of the United States National debt. This funding operation which was handled by the firm of Morgan & Company and the Rothschilds was the retirement of greenbacks during Cleveland's Administration. It brought about the hard times of that period. The "facilitating the payment of the French indemnity to Germany" was the demonetization of silver in 1873 which has been correctly called "the crime of '73."

Lionel was elected a Member of Parliament from Aylesbury but refused to take the oath of office upon a Bible containing the New Testament, and consequently was refused his seat. He ran and was elected a second time, with the same result. Upon his third election the oath was waived as to the New Testament and he was sworn in on the Old Testament. He was the first Jew to hold office in England. Thus began the pollution and deterioration of the British Government.

Lionel's eldest son, Nathan Mayer (Lord Rothschild 1st) succeeded him as head of N. M. Rothschild & Sons on his death in 1879. The Jewish Encyclopedia states that:

---

[12] Jewish Encyclopedia, Vol. 10, p. 501-2.

"In 1885 he (Nathan) was raised to the peerage and was the first Jew to take his seat in the House of Lords, an event which was regarded as completing the emancipation of the Jews . . . Lord Rothschild is a governor of the Bank of England and a presiding officer of many great corporations . . . In 1902 he was appointed a member of the Royal Commission on Alien Immigration, an office that brought him in touch with the late Theodore Herzl."[13]

Nathan's promotion from the House of Commons to the peerage was recommended by Prime Minister Wm. E. Gladstone and Lord Grenville. Queen Victoria at first objected on the ground that "to make a Jew a peer is a step she could not consent to; it would be ill-taken and would do the government great harm."[14]

Unfortunately, she yielded against her woman's intuition and her sound judgment. This was the beginning of the transformation of the British House of Lords from a Gentile landed aristocracy to a Jewish plutocracy, and of the government from a Gentile to a Jewish government. It is reported that there are now sixty Jews in the House of Lords without counting the hybrids that should in fact be included.

The intermarriage of the impoverished landed aristocrats with rich Jewesses has polluted the bloodstream of the British aristocracy and to that extent weakened the government. While the Jews wish to preserve their racial integrity they also seek to have their women marry titles, for such marriages increase their prestige and power.

The Jew and the hybrid infest the House of Commons as well as the House of Lords. Many of the members of that body are Jewish owners of large estates elected by the tenants of such estates, as was Lionel. The present decadent British Empire and government (Churchill, Eden, Cooper, et al.) are due primarily to the Jew and Jewish blood pollution. It is a Jewish government.

The protocols were published by Nilus in 1905 but they themselves bear no date. They purport to be minutes of many meetings, some of which no doubt occurred long prior to 1905. Theodore Herzl is thought to be the author of one or more of them, which were promulgated at the Basle meeting of the Elders of Zion (Council of the Jewish Agency).

---

[13] Jewish Ency. Vol. 10, p. 503.

[14] The Magnificent Rothschilds, p. 122.

Whether this is true or not, the protocols represent the moral and political philosophy of the rulers of the Rothschild fortune. Mayer Amschel Rothschild hated the Gentiles with an intense religious hatred and that hatred has been handed down from generation to generation. It is hatred that demands vengeance upon the Gentile race—"an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth." It is shown in every paragraph, every sentence and every word in the three codes of the family, viz., the Talmud, the protocols, and the code of the communists.

Perhaps in the beginning it was justified, for the age in which Mayer Amschel lived was a cruel age and the Jews were undoubtedly despised and oppressed by the various peoples among whom they lived; this was particularly true of the German and Russian peoples and governments. This hatred of the Gentile is still kept alive by the Council of the Jewish Agency, their protocols, and the rabbis and their Talmud.

Nathan Mayer Rothschild died in 1915 and was succeeded by his eldest son, Lionel Walter, the second Lord Rothschild, as the head of the banking firm N. M. Rothschild & Sons. He appears to have been a member of the Council of the Jewish Agency. He died in 1937 and was succeeded as head of the London branch of the banking firm by his eldest son, Nathan Mayer Victor (third Lord Rothschild) who is the present gold agent of the Bank of England.

The history of the second and third Lord Rothschild is current and not yet recorded. It may be safely assumed that all of the active male members of the Rothschild family are members of the Council of the Jewish Agency, for that is the agency that controls the political policy of the Rothschild fortune.

KING ROTHSCHILD, III (Baron James), 1836-1868.

Upon Nathan's death in 1836 the scepter and the line of descent passed from Nathan's eldest son Lionel, head of the London house, to James Rothschild, fifth son of Amschel, head of the Paris House. This despite the fact that Lionel was then 28 years old, had married in orthodox fashion his first cousin Carlotta, the daughter of his uncle Solomon, was the manager of the richest banking branch of the family, and was the ablest of them all. All of the Jewish historians agree that this change was made but none of them assign any reason.

Count Cherep-Spiridovich states the reason as follows:

> "James Rothschild, born in 1792, misruled from 1836 until 1868. He married ugly Betty, the daughter of his brother Solomon of Vienna. Because of the "crime" of Nathan the latter's son Lionel was deprived of the World's Throne. James became Rothschild III, Thus decided Amschel (Anselm) Salomon, and Karl Rothschild, who all gathered in July 1836 at Frankfort in order to judge and presumably to execute Nathan, possibly the only Rothschild, who through total lack of principle, wished to become a Christian, only that he could the easier deceive and enslave the English people."[15]

All of the Jewish authorities agree that there was a general family reunion and a great banquet in Paris on the occasion of the marriage of Lionel; that Nathan was taken violently ill and seized with spasms indicating poisoning; that the doctors were unable to diagnose the trouble and that he died within a few hours. Whether he was poisoned or not, the kingship of the Rothschild fortune passed from Nathan's heirs to his brother James and his heirs.

History reveals but little about the reign of James. He appears to have been a cold, cruel, shrewd, unscrupulous man who contributed materially to the wealth of the Paris House. His personal wealth at the time of his death was estimated at 45,000,000 pounds,—or more than $200,000,000,—but this was only an estimate, since no inventory of his estate was filed.

KING ROTHSCHILD, IV., (Baron Alphonse D.) 1868 to------- .

The most recent history of the Rothschild family is that of the Jewish Cecil Roth, published in 1939. It brings the history of the English branch down to that date, but not that of the Paris branch. Therefore we can know but little about the reign of this monarch.

John Reeves, in his book published in 1887, said:

"The present head of the firm in Paris is Baron Alphonse D. Rothschild, the eldest son of Baron James. He inherits much of his father's financial talent and is acknowledged by the rest of his relatives as the shrewdest and most able man of business among them. He is the head of the family not only on account of his ability but on account of his seniority, as he is the oldest of Mayer Amschel's grandsons."[16]

---

[15] "The Secret World Government, or The Hidden Hand," p. 138.

[16] "The Rothschilds, Financial Rulers of Nations," p. 54.

KING ROTHSCHILD V or VI (Jeroboam Rothschild, alias Georges Mandel).

Georges Mandel [Jeroboam Rothschild] and Paul Reynaud.

The reign of this monarch is current and therefore nothing is known of it except what is revealed by current literature. We do not know when it began or whether he succeeded Alphonse, or whether there is an intervening ancestor, but he appears to be the present head of the Paris House, and King of the Rothschild fortune, and it appears that such was his position and power in 1918, when the Versailles Peace Treaty was written.

There is here presented a picture of him and his puppet Paul Reynaud, Premier of France, reproduced from the May 27, 1940, issue of "Time Magazine," a Jewish publication. His countenance reveals his character. He appears to be a crafty, cruel, greedy, mean man, with not a single redeeming virtue; He is the product of four generations of treachery and inbreeding, and a true descendant of "ugly Betty." We can now better understand the infamous peace treaty, the Brussels Financial Conference, the depressions of 1920, 1930 and 1937, the election of Franklin D. Roosevelt, the New Deal, and the present World War.

We do not know why he changed his name from Jeroboam Rothschild to Georges Mandel unless it was for the same reason that other Jews change their names, viz: to deceive. But why should he want to deceive unless it is to conceal the fact that he is the present ruler of the welfare of all of the people of the world?

We can understand why Isidore Isokowitz would change his name to Eddie Cantor. But the name Rothschild is eminently respectable and carries more weight than Mandel. Surely no Rothschild would be ashamed of a name that represents the political and financial power of the world, and that is graced by many honorary titles. The only apparent reason for his hiding behind a fictitious name is his inbred secretiveness, which is in keeping with the time-honored Rothschild system.

The author of "The Hidden Hand" states that Edward Rothschild of Paris, France, was at the date of the publication of his book in 1925, the ruler of the Rothschild fortune. I have not accepted this view for the reasons that Jeroboam Rothschild was at that time and prior and subsequent thereto, an influential member of the French cabinet and that he was Clemenceau's adviser when the Versailles peace treaty was written. This was an occasion of such great importance to the Jewish race that the head of the family would no doubt have officiated.

VI.

THE WEALTH OF THE ROTHSCHILD FAMILY

"Gold always has been and always will be the irresistible power. Handled by expert hands it always will be the most useful lever for those who possess it, and the object of envy for those who do not."—From "Funeral Oration of Rabbi Reichhorn."

According to the boast of Nathan Rothschild he increased the family fortune from $3,000,000 to about $7,500,000,000 within five years time, which would be in about 1820. In 1848 the Paris house was reckoned at 600,000,000 francs as against 362,000,000 for all of the other Paris bankers. We have no historical information as to the wealth of the Berlin, Vienna and Naples branches. We do, however, know that they were strong enough to dominate the money markets of those capitals.

At the rate of speed that Nathan traveled, viz., an increase of 500% a year, the fortune of the London branch alone would have been more than $100,000,000,000 by 1840. It is not likely, however, that he continued to multiply the family fortune 500% a year, but it is probable that he continued to increase it at the rate of 10% or more, annually. At this rate it would have amounted to approximately $20,000,000,000 by 1840, just 100 years ago.

The imagination can scarcely conceive the immensity and power of such a fortune. The three greatest American fortunes have been the Rockefeller, Carnegie, and Ford, which together would not exceed $2,000,000,000. If those fortunes should be loaned at 5% compound interest the mere accumulation of interest would in the course of time, and not a very long time at that, consume the wealth of the world. But compound interest is only a small element of the Rothschild fortune; it has been developed by speculation on the exchanges preceding and following wars and depressions as well as by the accumulation of interest.

We can take pencil and paper and figure accurately the increase of $20,000,000,000 at 5% compound interest in 100 years time, but it is impossible to even approximate the profits from the manipulation of the exchanges. The Rothschilds, during that entire period of 100 years, have been active manipulators of every important stock and commodity exchange of the world.

By virtue of their immense financial power they have been able to raise or lower prices at will, to create a boom or bring on a depression, to buy when stocks and commodities are cheap, and to sell when they are high. It is by these crooked manipulations that they and the members of their race have acquired the greater part of the wealth of the world.

The authority mentioned[17] reports that from 1817 to 1848 they made loans to various countries, aggregating 654,487,200 pounds. It reports also that they financed both Napoleon and the allies during the Napoleonic wars, and that they financed the American wars.

> "But in the two great wars Jewish financiers played a considerable role owing doubtless to their European connections. Hamym Solomon in the revolutionary war, while Seligman Brothers and Speyer & Company financed the North and Messrs. Erlanger the South in the great civil war. More recently, in the great development of railway finance the firm of Kuhn, Loeb & Company have taken a prominent part."

It will shock the American people to learn that Hamyn Solomon, whom we have regarded as a revolutionary hero, was the agent of Rothschild, and that Rothschild financed both sides of the American Revolution and the civil war. This is true to form. They acknowledge allegiance to no country; they are out for the money, and it matters not how or where they get it; they wish to destroy all governments in order to establish their own, and their method is to promote and finance wars.

It was stated by the Russian Major General, Count Cherep-Spiridovich, that the Rothschild family fortune in 1925 was $300,000,000,000, and that they made $100,000,000,000 of that sum out of the late world war, now called World War I.[18]

This appears to be a very conservative estimate. We have had a number of minor wars since that (late and two major depressions, viz., the disaster of 1929-1930 and the Roosevelt debacle of 1937, as a result of which stocks have fluctuated violently in value. It is likely that the Rothschild family fortune is now in the neighborhood of $500,000,000,000, which is about twice the value of the wealth of all the people of the United States.

---

[17] Jewish Ency., Vol 10, p. 493-495.

[18] "The Secret World Government, or The Hidden Hand."

The aggregate wealth of the present several hundred members of the family is only a matter of conjecture for it is kept as a sacred, profound secret. It is rare that we get even a glimpse of the wealth of any individual member of the family.

It is the history of the Rothschild family that all of its members conceal their wealth in every possible way. This is done not only in pursuance of the will of the founder of the fortune, but also to enable them to accomplish their purposes as set forth in the protocols.

It is estimated that the Jews have absorbed four-fifths of the wealth of Germany, Austria, Poland, and Czechoslovakia, and more than one-half of that of England, France, and Italy. They practically own the banks, railways, steel and munitions plants of these countries, to say nothing of the Press and other minor industries.

They undoubtedly own approximately one-half of the wealth of America. With one or two possible exceptions they own the huge New York banks (which implies the control of the New York Federal Reserve Bank), the insurance companies, the railroads, 70% of the steel and munitions industries, 80% of the metropolitan press, the news and advertising agencies, the cinema, and 80% of the radio broadcasting companies. Wherever there is a monopoly a Jew will likely be found in control of it.

J. P. Morgan & Company, with assets of $640,000,000, about one-half of which is cash and the other one-half tax exempt bonds, has always been regarded as a Gentile firm that was practically owned and controlled by the Morgan family. The recent testimony taken by the Temporary National Economic Committee discloses[19] the fact that J. P. Morgan only holds 9.1% interest in that firm; it also discloses that H. B. Davison had only 1.2%, George Whitney 1.9%, and that the other partners had interests of from 1/10 of 1% up to 6.1%, with the exception of the Chas. W. Steele Estate and Thos. W. Lamont who held 36.6% and 34.2% respectively.

J. P. Morgan is a man of great wealth; Thos. W. Lamont has never been regarded as a very rich man, and Chas. W. Steele was unknown to the public. In proportion to their interest in the Morgan firm they are due to be more than three times as wealthy as J. P. Morgan. It is not likely that Lamont and Steele own in their own right the percentages as shown. It is probable that these respective interests are held in trust for the Rothschilds and that J. P. Morgan & Company is but a Rothschild "front." If true, it explains the fact that there is never any competition between Morgan & Company and Kuhn, Loeb & Company; on the other hand, there is always the closest cooperation.

[19] "Verbatim Record of the Proceedings of the Temporary National Economic Committee," Vol. X, No. 9, p. 262, Washington, D. C, Dec. 20, 1939.

It is a circumstance worthy of note that the Temporary National Economic Committee has not investigated the firm of Kuhn, Loeb & Company and that this firm was not investigated by the former senate investigating committee. Is it only an accidental circumstance that Kuhn, Loeb & Co. are always left out of the investigations? This firm is the author of most of the devilment and we are entitled to know about its secret operations, such as the financing of Lenin and Trotsky.

The firm of Kuhn, Loeb & Company is reported to be a Rothschild firm, owned "lock, stock and barrel" by the Rothschild interest. An investigation of this firm will no doubt reveal that fact; it will no doubt reveal the further fact that its capital is largely cash and tax exempt bonds. The Rothschilds appear to be willing, in order to appease the public demands for information, to sacrifice the bank wherein they have only a 70% interest, and to make it the "goat" for public investigations.

It appears from the former senate committee investigation that neither J. P. Morgan nor Thos. W. Lamont pay any income taxes. They adopt the scheme of selling securities at a loss just before the first of January to friends or relatives, which losses are offset against their profits, with the result that they have no profits. It is likely that the members of the Kuhn-Loeb firm do likewise. With the Gentiles paying income taxes and the Jews owning tax exempt bonds and dodging them, it will not be long until they absorb the greater part of the wealth of the country—if they have not already done so.

There are many other rich Jews in addition to the Rothschilds, but the huge Rothschild fortune represents the greater part of the wealth of all the Jews of the world. The authority mentioned says:

> "The Rothschilds were not without competitors; other Jewish families, the Lazards, Sterns, Speyers, and Seligmans adopted the Rothschild plan."[20]

The "Rothschild plan" referred to was to establish private branch banks in the capitals of Europe and America with some member of the family in charge of these branches. It is likely that the Rothschilds finance and control the majority of these firms for they need many agencies to handle their immense fortune. The "Rothschild plan" is an excellent tax dodging scheme. There is no inheritance by heirs and hence no inheritance taxes. Moreover, the Rothschild interest will usually be found in control of the national treasury with the power to interpret and administer the tax laws.

[20] Jewish Ency. Vol. 2, p. 496.

VII.

THE MIGHTY ROTHSCHILD POWER

> "Therefore we must not stop at bribery, deceit and treachery when they should serve towards the attainment of our end. In politics one must know how to seize the property of others without hesitation if by it we secure submission and sovereignty."— From Protocol 2.

The first manifestation of the power of this concentrated wealth was to free the Jews from the bondage in which they had been held by the various governments of Europe. When William of Hesse placed his money in the hands of Mayer Amschel Rothschild the Jews were without the privilege of citizenship in Germany and all other countries, and were subject to all manner of burdensome taxes. It is said that they were the unofficial tax gatherers for the British kings during the reign of the Norman monarchy—the Jews squeezed the people and the kings squeezed the Jews.

The historian Reeves graphically states the achievements of the Rothschild fortune as follows:

> "Little could Mayer Amschel have anticipated  that his sons would in after years come to exercise such an unbounded sway that the peace of nations would depend upon their nod; that the powerful control they exercised on the European money markets would enable them to pose as the arbiters of peace and war, since they could at their pleasure withhold or furnish the pecuniary means required to carry on a campaign.
>
> "But this, incredible as it may seem, was what their vast influence, combined with their enormous wealth and unlimited credit, enabled them to do, for no firms existed strong enough to oppose them for any length of time, or rash enough to take up a business which the Rothschilds had refused. To reach this exalted position Mayer Amschel and his sons required the co-operation of the States, but, when once he had climbed over their backs and reached the height of his ambition, he was independent of all aid and could act with the greatest freedom, whilst the States remained in a suppliant attitude at his feet."[21]

---

[21] The Rothschilds," by John Reeves, p. 104-105.

This power brought about the establishment of the gold standard, first in the British Empire and then in other countries, as stated in a succeeding chapter of this volume. They acquired the controlling interest in the Bank of England for which the late Lord Rothschild acted as gold agent and governor. The Bank of England is one of their many "fronts." They no doubt have the controlling interest in most of the other central banks of issue.

In strict keeping with the secrecy, which has been one of the cardinal principles of the Rothschild rulers from the beginning, the Bank of England refuses to reveal its stockholders. There have been many investigations which have sought to gain this information, among others a direct order of Parliament, but it has never been disclosed. It is my information that the ownership of the other banks of issue of Europe is also kept a profound secret.

They sent one of the Rothschild agents, Paul Warburg, as their representative to America just prior to World War I, to change our banking systems. They knew that we would acquire the greater part of the gold of the world in payment of our exports and they wanted to sterilize this gold in order to control our economy and that of other countries. Under the pretense of organizing a credit expanding system to meet the demands of commerce, they in fact organized a credit contracting system to hold it in leash and to increase the power and value of money.

Through their ownership and control of their Morgan & Co., and Kuhn, Loeb & Co., private banks, they own and control the principal New York national banks and trust companies, and through them own and control the New York Federal Reserve Bank. This branch of the Federal Reserve System according to a recent statement has resources of $10,035,211,000 as against the resources of the other eleven F. R. banks of $11,744,034,000. It has gold certificates of $8,934,442,000 as against the gold certificates of the other eleven F. R. banks of $10,094,036,000.

According to pro-Jewish Senator Carter Glass this gold belongs to the certificate holders. It should be observed that the United States government issued gold certificates for the gold held by foreigners and the Reserve banks but did not issue such certificates for gold held by other banks or individuals; they received Federal Reserve Bank notes which are withdrawable and subject to cancellation at the pleasure of the Federal Reserve management.

The explanation is simple: Such certificates if issued to individuals and banks generally in the United States would be in circulation and therefore enhance the value of property and service and would cheapen money, but the certificates issued to the Federal Reserve Banks are locked in their vaults and thereby kept out of circulation, and the certificates issued to foreigners are sent out of the country.

The Rothschilds, through the Sassoons (one of the female branches of their family), own and control the banks of China and India. They also own, control and operate the immensely profitable, illicit opium trade.

A number of rich Catholics undertook to organize a competitor bank to rival the Rothschild power. I have been unable to discover when this enterprise was launched, but it was sometime about 1830. The Rothschilds crushed it. The Jewish Encyclopedia admits that

> "Following the failure of the Catholic bank, Union Generals, leaving the Rothschilds still more absolutely the undisputed leaders of French finance, but leaving also a legacy of hatred which had much influence on the growth of the anti-Semitic movement in France."

It says further:

> "It is a somewhat curious sequel to the attempt to set up a Catholic competitor to the Rothschilds that at the present time (1905) the latter are the guardians of the papal treasure."[22]

If this latter statement is true the Rothschilds control in addition to their own fortune the immense liquid resource of the Catholic Church, which is second only to the Rothschilds' in wealth and power. It is probably not literally true since the private banking firm did not do commercial banking. It is likely that the papal treasure is deposited with the Bank of England or some other bank "front," but even so it contributes to the Rothschild power.

It should be observed from the above quotation that the Rothschilds brought on a major depression which provoked anti-Semitism. I identify this as the catastrophe of 1839-1840, known as the "hungry forties," which our American historians have wrongfully ascribed to the veto of the charter of the Second Bank of the United States by Andrew Jackson in 1836.

The next major depression in this country and throughout the world was in 1873—"the crime of '73." This was brought about by the demonetization of silver. The Rothschilds had already brought about the demonetization of silver in Germany as a part of their plan to "facilitate the payment of the French indemnity to Germany," but it was necessary to the perfection of this plan that the gold standard be established in America. Through bribery, they caused to be clandestinely inserted a clause in the Coinage Act of 1873 that demonetized silver.

[22] Jewish Ency. Vol. 2, p. 497.

The next major depression in America and throughout the world was the panic of 1893 which was brought about by the competition between the Jewish House of Rothschild and the Jewish rival firm of Baring Brothers. The ruler of the Rothschilds determined to crush the Baring firm. The Jewish Encyclopedia says of this operation:

> "Similarly it is stated that the financial crisis of Germany and Austria (and America and the world) was also a source of anti-Semitism because the shrewdness of the Jewish bankers had foreseen the crash and they were enabled to evade it."[23]

The Jews are always able to foresee and evade these depressions because they create them. They not only evade these crises but they sell their securities in advance of them and buy them back when values have been destroyed, at a fraction of their former worth, and thereby make immense profits. It is by the repetition of this process from panic to panic that they have so rapidly acquired the wealth of the world. The Jews do not lose on a panic, for the word is passed down when it is to happen. They usually profit by it; a panic is their rich harvest.

The next major panic was that of 1907 which the Rothschild controlled banks created by refusing to pay their customers and their bank correspondents the money due them and which was held on deposit. They simply coldly and brutally said to the other bankers having deposits with them: We cannot and will not pay you your money, and you must take care of your own customers the best way you can. This resulted in all the banks throughout the country clamping down on their customers and refusing to pay them their money, which in turn resulted in checking all commercial enterprises and a great fall in the wage and price level and a disastrous panic.

It resulted also in the people and the bankers getting together for the purpose of organizing a currency and credit expanding system to prevent a recurrence of such a panic. And worst of all the outcome was that the Rothschilds organized this system for us and created one that they could manipulate in bringing about future panics and through which they could fix and regulate the wage and price level. That system has been responsible for the depressions of 1920, 1930 and the present Roosevelt depression of 1937 (still with us now, in 1940) which resulted in the "New Deal" and general bankruptcy.

---

[23] Vol. 2, p. 493.

We have had these depressions so frequently and regularly that we have come to regard them as natural phenomena. There are economists who attempted to predict them. They usually occur about every ten years, but F. D. Roosevelt was a little impatient to put over his "New Deal" and his communistic program, and he brought the last one on us ahead of time in order to complete the job which he started in 1933. They have all been manipulated, and for the same purpose, viz., thievery and robbery and to establish the Kingdom of Judah throughout the world.

As cruel and destructive as these panics are, they are not as bad as war. The Rothschild power was responsible for World War I and for the present world war, as will be shown later in this volume. They have been responsible for most of the wars that have occurred within the last 150 years. They usually finance both sides of these wars, not because they are interested in either side winning but because wars are demoralizing and destructive to the Gentiles and because they bring the Jews nearer their ultimate goal, viz., rulers of the world.

Wars are their shortest and quickest route to the throne. The accumulation of compound interest is entirely too slow for them. The robbery of the people through their manipulation of money and credit, as effective as it is, is also too slow. War, with all of its attendant human misery, is their surest and best route—and so we have wars and will continue to have them so long as this power dominates the world.

In 1844 "Sidonia" (Rothschild) said, in "Coningsby":

> "No penal laws, no physical tortures, can effect that a superior race should be absorbed in an inferior, or be destroyed by it. The mixed persecuting races disappear; the pure persecuted race remains . . .
>
> "The first Jesuits were Jews; that mysterious Russian diplomacy which so alarms Western Europe is organized and principally carried on by Jews; that mighty revolution which is at this moment preparing in Germany . . . is entirely developing under the auspices of Jews, who almost monopolize the professorial chairs of Germany."

"Sidonia" further says:

"I had on my arrival (at St. Petersburg) an interview with the Russian Minister of Finance, Count Cancrin; I beheld the son of a Lithuanian Jew . . . I had an audience on my arrival at Madrid with the Spanish minister; I beheld one like myself, the son of a Nuovo Christiano, a Jew of Aragon. In consequence of what transpired at Madrid I went straight to consult the President of the French Council; I beheld the son of a French Jew . . . We fixed on Prussia . . . Count Arnim entered the cabinet, and I beheld a Prussian Jew. So you see, my dear Coningsby, that the world is governed by very different personages to what is imagined by those who are not behind the scenes."[24]

If Sidonia should now, in 1940, make the rounds of the capitals of Europe, he would find a considerable change in the situation. He would find the Jews struggling to maintain their political power and their sacrosanct gold standard, using Gentile "fronts" and Gentile armies and navies for that purpose.

He would find that Hitler had driven the Jews from the capitols of Germany, Austria, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Denmark, Norway, Holland, Belgium, France, and Roumania—and that he was engaged in a struggle to drive them from England. He would find that Mussolini had driven them from Italy, Albania, and Ethiopia. But he would still find them at the helm of the British Government-—and I regret to say the United States Government also.

A country engaged in war must buy from other countries many products required for its prosecution. That requires money that is acceptable to the seller, which has heretofore meant gold, because the moneys of the principal exporting countries have been based on gold. It has therefore been necessary to apply to the Rothschilds for this firm has, until recent years, been in control of the gold of the world, either directly or through their banks. They have therefore had the power to make or unmake wars. It is the universal gold standard coupled with their universal press ownership and coupled with the secrecy of their operations that have made them masters of the world.

---

[24] "Coningsby" by Benjamin Disraeli, p. 207-209.

VIII.

THE "KEPT" PRESS

"In the hands of the States of today there is a great force that creates the movement of thought in the people, and that is the Press. The part played by the Press is to keep pointing out requirements supposed to be indispensable, to give voice to the complaints of the people, to express and to create discontent. It is in the Press that the triumph of freedom of speech finds its incarnation. But the goyim States have not known how to make use of this force; and it has fallen into our hands. Through the Press we have gained the power to influence while remaining ourselves in the shade; thanks to the Press we have got the gold in our hands, notwithstanding that we have had to gather it out of oceans of blood and tears. But it has paid us, though we have sacrificed many of our people. Each victim on our side is worth in the sight of God a thousand goyim."—From Protocol 2.

It is true that the Press in the "goyim States" has fallen into the hands of the Jews; it is also true that through the Press the Jews have "gained the power to influence while remaining in the shade." It is also true that they have "got the gold" in their hands and that they have "had to gather it out of oceans of blood and tears"—but not their blood and tears; they have gathered it from the "blood and tears" of the gullible and despised goyim. The only method by which they could have gained this gold, through the Press and through "blood and tears" is by creating wars, which the Press have helped create through their propaganda.

It is difficult to prove to what extent the Jews are directly interested in the Press, for they conceal it. They are reputed to own 100% of the metropolitan newspapers of both England and France, and likewise 100% of the news and advertising agencies and the cinema of these two countries.

In America the ownership is not so complete. It is estimated that the Jews own 80% of the metropolitan press and 100% of the news and advertising agencies and cinema. Fortunately, their ownership of the small daily papers and country papers appears to be negligible; their influence with these papers is through their news agencies from which the country press obtains news, and their advertising agencies through which they obtain advertisements.

The Jews also own about 80% of the radio broadcasting stations through their ownership of Columbia Broadcasting System, Radio Corporation of America, and Mutual Broadcasting Company. The Jew Sarnoff is at the head of RCA which controls the National Broadcasting Company, and the Jew Paley is head of CBS, and the Jew Strauss is the reputed owner of the Mutual, The Jews have been acquiring the periodicals so rapidly in recent years that it is impossible to estimate their present holdings. They acquired the very informative and useful "Literary Digest" and junked it, and instead gave us the jazzy "Time" and "Life." They are reputed to have acquired the "Saturday Evening Post" and perverted its high standards and principles.

The Post was founded by Benjamin Franklin and it has always been free and independent and bold in its editorial expression. It was an outstanding critic of the New Deal and the perversion of the government by the Roosevelt Administration, but it has been silenced by its present Jew owners; they have put it to sleep permanently. There is not now in this broad land of ours a single periodical or metropolitan newspaper that stands for constitutional government as it has been handed down to us by our ancestors.

The Press has degenerated under Jewish control and influence into lying propaganda agencies whose chief mission appears to be to deceive and to befuddle the people. In Protocol 12 the Elders of Zion say of the Press:

> "Not a single announcement will reach the public without our control. Even now this is already being attained by us inasmuch as all news items are received by a few agencies, in whose offices they are focused from all parts of the world. These agencies will then be already entirely ours and will give publicity only to what we dictate to them."

It is literally true that all "news items are received by a few agencies." It is also true that these agencies are "entirely ours." It is also true that they only give publicity to "what we dictate to them." It is also true that all of the news that reaches us is under their control.

This protocol was promulgated prior to 1905. The situation there described is precisely the condition that now prevails. We are getting only such war news as they choose to give us, and they choose to give us only that which will favor England because they (the Jews) are waging this war through Britain for the Jews and their restoration of Poland and Czechoslovakia and for the maintenance of their gold standard and their power.

The British Press manifested its mighty power in Great Britain by overthrowing the Chamberlain government and establishing in place of it the pro-Jewish Churchill-Eden-Cooper government. The Press of England with one accord demanded a more vigorous prosecution of the war and made Chamberlain the "goat" because of the reverses of the Allies in Norway. There is reason to believe that the people of the British Empire, like the people of America, don't want war but it is the Jews and their Press that are demanding it, and through their control of the government are waging it.

In the Funeral Oration of Rabbi Reichhorn pronounced in Prague in 1869 over the tomb of Grand Rabbi Simeon-ben-Ihuda, he said:

> "The other great power is The Press. By repeating without cessation certain ideas, the Press succeeds in the end in having them accepted as actualities. The Theatre renders us analogous services. Everywhere the Press and the Theatre obey our orders."

That furnishes an explanation of all of this war propaganda to which we are now being subjected. It will be observed that by repeating a falsehood from time to time they say it will be "in the end accepted as an actuality." We constantly have before us the proof of that statement.

Every member of the Congress who has any knowledge of the money question knows that the only remedy for the existing depression is what the Jews and their columnists and "kept" Press call inflation; they know that inflation means high prices and wages and cheap money, but there is not one of them who will dare publicly announce that he stands for inflation—not one. On the other hand he will hold his hands up in holy horror against it, will talk about its abuses in Germany, France, etc.

Why? Simply because the Jews have held inflation up to scorn so often and ridiculed it so repeatedly that it has become anathema, and it is accepted as an "actuality" that any sort of inflation would be a great misfortune; this, despite the fact that they know there can be no relief from deflation without it. It is fear of the Jew press.

Why have the Jews acquired the Press and other publicity agencies in America and other countries unless it is for the purposes as stated in the protocols? Has it just so happened without any sort of design that the Jews have acquired all the agencies in all of the countries of the world that direct and influence and control the "movement of thought in the people?" The Press is presumed to voice the sentiment of the people but it in fact voices only the sentiment of the Jews.

The Press has a very important influence in the election of our public officials. No man can be nominated or elected President of the United States without publicity, and he must go to the Jews and their Press, their cinema, and their radio to get it; it can be obtained nowhere else. He can't get to first base without it.

The result is that some of the presidents of the United States have been selected and elected by the Jews; that is true of at least two democratic presidents, but it may not be true of any of the republicans, except Hoover. The result is also that congress and the President are subservient to Jewish control. The result is also that no politician will dare criticize the Jewish race and that all with one accord praise it and denounce racial prejudice.

The power of the press was forcefully stated by Richard B. Sheridan in Parliament:

> "Give me the Liberty of The Press and I will give to the minister a venal House of Peers; I will give him a corrupt and servile House of Commons; I will give him the full swing of the patronage of offices; I will give him the whole host of ministerial influence; I will give him ALL the power that place can confer upon him—to purchase submission and over-awe resistance.
>
> "Yes, armed with the Liberty of The Press, I will go forth undismayed; I will attack the very fabric of that mighty engine. I will shake down corruption from its height, and bury it beneath the ruins of the abuses it was meant to shelter."

In Protocol 7 attached as an Appendix, they say, "We must compel the governments of the goyim to take action in the direction favoured by our widely conceived plan, already approaching the desired consummation," by that "great power, the press, which with a few exceptions that may be disregarded, is already entirely in our hands." That is precisely what they are now doing. They are seeking to compel all governments to join in their "widely conceived plan" of a universal war. Through the "oceans of blood and tears" of such a war they will again gather much gold and may seize political power and establish their "King-Despot of the blood of Zion."

We have the evidence here before our very eyes and yet we refuse to see and recognize it, and the danger of it. We know that the leading newspapers and magazines of this country are in Jewish hands. We know that most of the journalists are Jews and that Jews are the publicity agents of both political parties. We know that the Jews own and control the cinema and radio. We know that the Jew press and the Jew columnist and the Jew radio and the Jew cinema are with one accord conducting a malignant campaign to involve us in the present war. Why? Is it to promote the public welfare? No. Is it to promote the Jewish "widely conceived plan"? Yes. There can be no other answer. Our officials are tongue-tied and bound hand and foot, and there appears to be no way to obtain legislative relief.

They say in the same protocol (No. 7), "the principal factor of success in the political is the secrecy of its undertakings." In other words, it is humbuggery and deception. How lamentably true. If we knew the truth and the whole truth we might correct it, but so long as they can deceive us there is but little chance for it. They conceal the fact that they own the leading newspapers and magazines and banking institutions. They hide behind corporate names and dummy stockholders. When the truth is stated they deny it.

In their protocols they say "with a few exceptions that may be disregarded, it (the press) is already entirely in our hands." This has reference to the press of the whole world. This was prior to 1905, but it appears to still be true, with the exception of Germany and Italy. (The governments of France and Romania have recently disfranchised the Jews and decreed that they shall have no sort of connection with the press). It is unthinkable that the Rothschild power manufactures public opinion throughout the entire world through their ownership of the press, and that they are using this power to create wars and gather gold from "oceans of blood and tears."

They say they own the press and the known facts verify the truth of that statement. They say they have acquired it "to compel the governments of the goyim in the direction favored by our widely conceived plan;" and they are using it for that purpose. They say that through it and through "oceans of blood and tears" they have acquired the gold of the world, and that is true. What stronger evidence can there be of the authenticity of the protocols? How long, oh how long, will we submit to the rule of this vicious alien power?

The following are some of the leading Jewish journalists:

> F. P. Adams ("F.P.A."), Walter Lippmann, David Lawrence, Louis Lipsky, Isaac F, Marcosson, Charles Michaelson, Joseph Pulitzer, Marcus Eli Ravage, George E. Sokolsky, John L. Spivak, Herbert Bayard Swope, Walter Winchel, James Waterman Wise, Frederick William Wile, Morris Fishbein, Emil Ludwig-Cohen, and many others.

The following are some of the known Jewish publishers:

"Moses Annenburg of Philadelphia; David A. Brown of Detroit; Lowell Brentano of New York; Paul Block; J. H. Biben of New York; Abraham Caban of New York; Levand Bros., of Kansas; Adler Chain, in Northwest; Eugene Meyer, of Washington, D. C.; Arthur Newman of New York Journal; Liberty's Bernarr McFadden of New York; J. David Stern of New York; Arthur Hays Sulzberger of New York Times; David Shapiro of New York. Editorial departments of the newspapers are controlled chiefly through Jewish advertising influence. Many Jews are in the Associated Press and United Press Assn., and the Hearsts papers are Jew-directed."[25]

There are also many other under-cover stockholders and bondholders.

The columnist, Boake Carter, stated in one of his syndicated articles that "recently a considerable block of stock was opened to public sale by the Chicago Daily News (Col. Knox's paper). Among the largest buyers was Kuhn, Loeb & Co." This reveals one of the methods by which the Jews have obtained control of the press. The Jews also own the International Paper Co., which extends credit to many newspapers and owns the stock and bonds of many of them. Whenever a leading newspaper gets in financial distress or comes on the market, the Jews grab it up.

It is a significant fact that every Jew columnist is for war against Germany and every Gentile columnist is against it; it is also significant that every Jew congressman is for war, and the Gentile congressmen are practically unanimously against it; it is also significant that the city Jew press is for war and the country Gentile press against it.

We Gentiles have not yet forgotten the ingratitude shown us by the Allies following World War I. They said that we did not win it, that they did. They said also that they were fighting for us and that we should bear the expenses of the war and they refused to pay the loans made them since the war, on that flimsy ground. They called us "Uncle Shylock" because we expected payment of these debts, amounting to over $12,000,000,000.

The present Prime Minister of England, Winston Churchill, published a statement saying that we did the Allies more harm than good by entering World War I, because they would have made peace two years sooner if we had not done so. Well, now "Uncle Shylock"—or at least the Gentile part of him—wants to decline to underwrite the present war. He disclaims all interest in it or responsibility for it.

[25] R. E. Edmondson Bulletin.

Let them fight to their hearts content and make peace whenever it suits them. The chances are it would soon be made except that our humane (?) President encourages them to fight on, and they hope that by some hook or crook the Jews through their control of press and radio will influence us to the point that we will forget the past and again rush to the rescue.

If the real truth were known there would be no intervention sentiment in this country, and there would be very little pro-British sentiment. If the real Jewish names of these journalists and the fact that they are Jews were stated in connection with their columns, their views would carry but little weight; and if "our widely conceived plan" were widely understood, they would carry none.

The following is a list of some of our prominent cinema stars, viz:

> Eddie Cantor (Isidore Isokowitz) ; Edward G. Robinson (Emanuel Goldenberg) ; Paul Muni (Muni Weisenfreund) ; Jack Benny (John Kubelsky) ; Ben Bernie (Benjamin Anzelovitz) ; John Garfield (Julius Garfinkle) ; Ricardo Cortez (Jack Krantz) ; George Burns (Nathan Birbaum) ; Bela Lugosi (Bela Blasko) ; Ed Wynn (Ed Leopold) ; Nick Stuart (Nikolas Pratza) ; Bert Lahr (Irving Lahrheim); George Sidney (Sammy Greenfield) ; Joe Penner (Joseph Pinter) ; Raquel Torres (Paula Osterman) ; Fanny Brice (Fanny Borach Arnstein Rosenberg) ; Sophie Tucker (Sophie Abuza) ; Harry Green (Harry Blitzer) ; Harry Richman (Henry Reichman) ; Ted Lewis (Theodore Friedman) ; Kenneth MacKenna (Leo Mielziner) ; Ina Clair (Fagan); Douglas Fairbanks, Jr. (Ullman) ; Sylvia Sidney (Jason) ; Al Jolson (Yoelson) ; Charlie Chaplin (Thonstein) ; Paulette Goddard (Levy) ; Elaine Barry (Jacobs) ; Ethel Merman (Zinnerman) ; Sybil Jason (Jacobs); Luise Rainer; Bobby Breen; Joseph Schildkraut; Lionel Stander; Gregory Ratoff; Tony Martin; Jack Pearl; George Jessel; Irving Pichel; Ritz Brothers, Marx Brothers, and many others.

The movie stars in themselves are by no means so important as the journalists, but the Jewish degradation of the cinema is important. We and our children must be entertained with Jewish humor, reconciled to racial equality by Jewish propaganda, and deceived by Jewish lies. Our children would not find Eddie Cantor quite so entertaining if they knew that his real name is Isidore Isokowitz; nor would they find Edward G. Robinson's acting so thrilling if they knew him to be the Jew Emanuel Goldenberg.

The cinema is for war. Why? Because it is Jew-owned and controlled. The radio is for war. Why? For precisely the same reason. The metropolitan press is for war. Why? For identically the same reason. The Jew is for war. Why? It is for the prosecution of "our widely conceived plan;" it is to gather in more gold through "oceans of blood and tears;" it is for the destruction of the Gentiles and their governments.

The radio and cinema are not mentioned in the protocols for the very good reason that they were not then in use. As soon as these two methods of influencing the public mind and creating sentiment were developed, they were both acquired by the Jews—not only here in America but in every country of the world. Why?

This is not a mere accidental circumstance. It is in pursuance of their "widely conceived plan" and for the purpose of accomplishing it. And the radio and cinema are being used for that purpose continuously, consistently, and relentlessly.

There can be no reasonable doubt about the authenticity of the protocols. Every statement of fact contained in them is found to be true. The Jews own the gold, the exchanges and the press, as they claim. They have the political influence that they boastfully claim; they create wars as they propose, and world history and current events have developed and are developing in strict conformity with the plans outlined in the protocols.

IX.

THE MURDER GANG

"Death is the inevitable end for all. It is better to bring that end nearer to those who hinder our affairs than to our selves—the founders of this affair. We execute masons in such wise that none save the brotherhood can ever have a suspicion of it, not even the victims themselves of our death sentence, they all die when required as if from a normal kind of illness . . . Knowing this, even the brotherhood in its turn dare not protest. By such methods we have plucked out of the midst of masonry the very root of protest against our disposition. While preaching liberalism to the goyim we at the same time keep our own people and our agents in a state of unquestioning submission."—From Protocol 15.

It may be true, as the Jews claim, that they originated masonry. There are many signs and symbols of masonry, as we Americans know it, that indicate it, but our masonry, as has heretofore been pointed out, is entirely separate and different from theirs; theirs is a secret clannish political agency to preserve their solidarity, to act as a unit, and to carry into effect the orders of their rulers.

The B'nai B'rith appears to have been founded in America and to be the American branch of the Jewish continental masons; there is no occasion here for another openly avowed benevolent Masonic order since the Jews are permitted to join the American masons.

"What is the B'nai B'rith?"

"An international secret Jewish 'masonic order' known among the tribes as 'Sons of the Covenant' (circumcision), of which Henry Monsky of Chicago is President. It was founded in New York in 1843. Jewish Author Ludwig Lewisohn says 'B'nai B'rith represents Jewry the world over'."

"What are its objectives?"

"To promote what it calls 'The Jewish Common Purpose,' which is domination of Gentiledom. 'Kinship is to be found between the aims which President Roosevelt exemplifies, and the purposes for which B'nai B'rith carries on,' said Jewish Gov. Henry Horner of Illinois, in B'nai B'rith Magazine for April 1934."[26]

The French Illuminati was also a branch through which they murdered Gentiles without discrimination and without mercy—men, women and children, in Paris during the French revolution. The Nihilists of Russia was reputed to be another branch through which they murdered the Czars of Russia and the rulers of other countries.

It was probably the Continental Masons who selected Herschel Grynszpan to murder Von Rath, the German attaché in France, for the Jews have made a hero of him; they have throughout the world applauded this dastardly act, raised huge sums of money and employed many lawyers for his defense. The Jewish French government never arraigned him for trial but the present government will likely do so. He proposed to volunteer to fight for France, which was headlined in the Jewish press all over the world. Adolf Hitler accepted this political assassination as being a racial murder in pursuance of their racial plans and accordingly imposed a fine of $400,000,000 on the Jewish race in Germany.

It is estimated that when the Jews obtained control of the Russian government they put to death 3,000,000 of the best and most important Gentile citizens of the Russian Empire, and later starved to death more than 20,000,000 of them. When the Jew Bela Kuhn (Aaron Cohn) obtained control of the Hungarian government, his first act was to murder 20,000 of the leading Gentiles of that country. It is reported that 700,000 Hungarians were killed during his 133 days of rule of Hungary and immediately preceding and following it.[27]

The same thing occurred in Germany. Adolf Hitler is authority for the statement that between 4,000 and 5,000 of the best people of Germany were promptly executed when the Jews obtained control of the government.

This is all in pursuance of their protocols and their Talmud and their communist code. Their Talmud teaches them that "the life of a goi and all his physical powers belong to a Jew," and their protocols tell them that death is the "inevitable end for all and that it is better to bring that end nearer to those who hinder our affairs than to ourselves—the founders of this affair."

---

[26] R. E. Edmondson's Bulletin, "Counterfeit Americans," Apr. 15, 1940.

[27] "Answer to Father Coughlin's Critics," p. 119.

The Jews are descended from a nomadic Asiatic people who banded themselves together like packs of wolves, and roamed the plains of Palestine, Persia, Arabia and adjoining countries, and pillaged the people of those countries. Money is their God and it has been so since they repudiated the divine Law of Moses and bowed down before Aaron's golden calf. They have always imagined themselves superior to the peoples of the countries wherein they dwelt. They have outwitted and cheated and despoiled other peoples until it has become a part of their nature.

The present Jew is the product of his ancestors; he has inherited many of their characteristics. His civilization is but veneer, and a thin one at that. He ill-conceals his vanity and egotism and deceitfulness and cruelty and grasping nature.

Murder is difficult to prove at best, and it is impossible when it is done in such manner that "none save the brotherhood can even have a suspicion of it—not even the victims of our death sentence; they all die when required, as if from a normal kind of illness." This can explain the alleged murder of President Harding; and also the alleged murder of the late, blind Senator Schall of Minnesota who was an able and outstanding critic of the present Jew administration and "Jew Deal." He was run over on the street by a "hit and run" driver whose identity has never been discovered. It may also explain the alleged assassination of Senator Bronson Cutting who was also an able critic of the "New Deal," and likewise guilty of "hindering our affairs." He was killed in a plane crash. It was stated at the time that the plane had been tampered with and that an investigation would be made, but that was the end of it.

We have had a singular fatality among our Presidents. None of them was murdered during the approximate ninety years prior to the civil war when the Jewish influence was negligible; three and probably four of them have been murdered during the 75 years since: Lincoln by the Jew Booth; Garfield by Chas. Jules Guitau, nationality unknown; McKinney by the Jew Leon Czolgosz; and probably Harding.

During the years since the civil war the Jews have financed the campaigns of Woodrow Wilson and Franklin D. Roosevelt, and have consequently contributed very largely to the election of two of the three democratic presidents since the war. The Jews have not so far as known, financed and brought about the election of any of the republican presidents except Hoover,—and perhaps Coolidge who had his Jew sponsor, Stearn. Of the other five elected republican presidents three of them were murdered; a strange fatality of the non-Jewish republican presidents.

All of this may have just happened and not been brought about by any sinister organization or power. There is, however, at least one murder of a prominent senator who "hindered their affairs" that is definitely known—viz., the late Senator Huey Long of Louisiana who was shot down in the Louisiana State House. His friend, Governor Allen, who succeeded him and who was investigating his death, himself died "as from a normal kind of illness"—suddenly and mysteriously.

We also know that prior to Senator Long's death the Jewish federal government refused federal aid to the people of Louisiana, for relief or in any other form. Immediately after he was murdered the federal treasury was opened up and money flowed into Louisiana. It has been aptly called "the second Louisiana purchase."

At the time of Senator Long's murder a number of federal indictments were pending against Sol Weiss, his Jew treasurer, and other leaders in the Long political machine; soon after his death these indictments were dismissed. These men were evidently promised security and felt secure, because their misconduct afterward became so flagrant that they were re-indicted and have recently been tried and convicted.

It has been frequently stated in the press that the killing of Senator Long was an "inside job." It is probable that the dismissal of these indictments and his murder were arranged beforehand. He was killed by a man by the name of Weiss, supposedly a Jew and a relative of Sol Weiss, his treasurer.

Henry Ford first opened the eyes of the people of America to the Jew menace. He caused to be published three volumes entitled "The International Jew," which revealed the fact that the Jews are the real financial power that controls America. He also published "The Dearborn Independent," which was estimated to have a circulation of almost a million, and which informed its readers about the machinations of the Jews. Among other things, it attacked the Jew Aaron Shapiro because of his graft in connection with the organization of the farmer co-operatives. Shapiro filed suit against Mr. Ford for libel for several million dollars, his attorneys being the Jew firm of Untermeyer & Marshall, New York lawyers for the Rothschild interest.

Late one night while returning home from his office, a "hit and run" driver sideswiped Mr. Ford's car and forced it down a steep embankment and he was seriously but not fatally injured. Shortly thereafter he evidently compromised with the Jews on the basis of discontinuing the publication of The Dearborn Independent. The Shapiro suit was dismissed, the press ridicule of Mr. Ford ceased; they even speak of him kindly now.

The "hit and run" driver was never discovered. Mr. Ford probably received their "death sentence." If he had been killed it would have had the appearance of "a normal kind of accident," as the deaths of Senators Schall and Cutting appeared to be. We cannot know whether Mr. Ford saved his life by this settlement but we do know that he saved himself from a lot of Jewish persecution.

Martin Luther is credited with saying that the Jews are "liars, thieves, and murderers." They are taught to be by both their Talmud and their protocols. It is a terrific indictment against the Jewish race. It is undoubtedly true of the "Learned Elders of Zion." We prefer to believe that the Jews with whom we come in daily contact are different. But we cannot close our eyes to the disagreeable fact that this indictment is confirmed by the Talmud, the protocols and the history of the Jewish race.

We have just witnessed another tragic death of a great American Senator who "hindered our affairs," viz: Senator Lundeen of Minnesota. He was murdered in the same way they murdered Senator Cutting. They were both travelling in airplanes out of Washington, and in both cases the plane developed engine trouble a short distance out of the city. There were other passengers on both planes (24 on the last) but that small circumstance was a matter of no consequence to the murderers.

These are murders that appear to be from a "normal kind of accident," and they are well hidden, for there was no one left in either case to tell the story. They are not "normal" for the Cutting and Lundeen plane crashes are the only accidents of that character that have occurred in the fifteen years of passenger air travel.

There are not many senators of the Lundeen type left. Four of them have met violent deaths, viz: Senators Long, Schall, Cutting, and now Senator Lundeen. And one has been "purged" by the lavish use of money, viz: Senator Holt of West Virginia.

X.

WORLD WAR I

"We shall force the Christians into wars by exploiting their pride and their stupidity. They will massacre each other and clear the ground for us."—From Funeral Oration of Rabbi Reichhorn.

Kaiser Wilhelm of Germany was a very vain man who loved publicity and imagined himself an autocrat, but in fact he was only a figurehead, as King George VI of England now is, and as most of the European monarchs are now and were at that time. The Jews encouraged him in this delusion and fed his vanity, while they operated his government.

The important ministers of Germany—those that really ran the government—were all Jews. Bethmann Holweg, chancellor and spokesman, was a descendant of the Rothschilds, Walter Rathneau, treasurer, and Felix Warburg, head of the spy system, together with five other members of the Kaiser's cabinet, were Jews. The Jews in 1914 were more completely in control of the governments of Europe than they were in 1844 when Disraeli's "Sidonia" (Rothschild) visited the various capitals of Europe. Sidonia then with words of prophecy visioned the world war:

"That mighty revolution which is at this moment preparing in Germany . . . is entirely developing under the auspices of Jews who almost monopolize the professorial chairs of Germany."

It was, however, a world war that the Jews developed, and not a mere revolution. The assassination of Archduke Ferdinand and his wife was given as the excuse for it but that was not the cause; it was only a pretext. There was no redress or attempted redress of this assassination; the Duke and Duchess were soon forgotten. The real cause of the war was Jewish ambition and avarice; it had been planned for a long period of time; they merely seized upon this circumstance to fool the gullible goyim.

We are all presumed to intend the consequences of our acts. We judge the cause by the effect. The effect of the war was the League of Nations, the establishment of the gold standard throughout the world, and Palestine for the Jews. This would probably have been the effect of the war if Germany had won, for the Jews even in that case would have written the peace treaty just as they did at the conclusion of the victory of the Allies. The accomplishment of these three things was the purpose of World War I—and, with the exception of Palestine, is the purpose of World War II.

These things did not just happen by accident; they were all pre-arranged. The cunning of the Jew is uncanny. It is the result of centuries of imagined superiority and suppression and scheming and nursed vengeance.

The war-plotters knew in advance that practically all of Europe would be engulfed in World War I. They probably reckoned that they would inveigle America into it. They did not care who won. They knew that they would write the peace treaty and gather in the spoils.

The German government sought to alienate Russia from the Allies during World War I, and accomplished it through the Jews. The German Jew government furnished a train and transportation for Lenin and his gang through Germany to Moscow, and the Jews financed the enterprise. Among the Jews that put up the money were Paul Warburg, governor of our Federal Reserve System, and the Rothschild firm of Kuhn, Loeb & Co. These gentlemen now deny it. When their rascality is discovered the Jews always "deny the allegation and defy the allegator."

Father Coughlin made this charge in one of his radio addresses and it was challenged by Kuhn, Loeb & Co. In a book entitled "An Answer to Father Coughlin's Critics" the truth of this charge has been established beyond any reasonable doubt. This book further establishes beyond a reasonable doubt that the Jews not only overthrew the Czarist government in Russia, but that they executed the Czar and his family, and established their own government in place of it.

Of the 25 leaders of that revolution all of them were Jews except Lenin whose mother and wife are reputed to have been Jewesses—this would make him a hybrid and a "Jew-in-law."

The following are the names of the Jewish leaders of the Russian revolution as appears from the American Official Services Report, Section III:

Assumed Name	Real Name	Nationality
Lenin Oulianow	(Ulianoff)	Russian[28]
Trotsky	(Trotzky) Bronstein	Jewish
Steckloff	Nakhames	Jewish
Martoff	Zederbaum	Jewish
Zinovieff	Apfelbaum	Jewish
Kameneff	Rosenfeld	Jewish
Dan Gourevitch	(Yurewitsch)	Jewish
Ganetzky	Furstenberg	Jewish
Parvus	Helpfand	Jewish
Uritzky	Padomilsky	Jewish
Larin	Lurge	Jewish
Bohrin	Nathansohn	Jewish
Martinoff	Zibar	Jewish
Bogdanoff	Zilberstein	Jewish
Garin	Garfeld	Jewish
Suchanoff	Gimel	Jewish
Kairmelff	Goldmann	Jewish
Sagrersky	Krochmann	Jewish
Kiazanoff	Goldenbach	Jewish
Solutzeff	Bleichmann	Jewish
Piatnitzky	Ziwin	Jewish
Axelrod	Orthodox	Jewish
Glasunoff	Sehultze	Jewish
Zuriesain	Weinstein	Jewish
Lapinsky	Loewensohn	Jewish

It appears that the Jews deceive the Russians as to their identity by adopting Russian names, in the same way they deceive us by adopting English names.

The Jewish Russian revolution occurred in 1917 when we were in World War I and Russia was our ally. Paul Warburg, Jacob Schiff and other members of the firm of Kuhn, Loeb & Co., were naturalized citizens of the United States and therefore subject to prosecution for treason. They were guilty of high treason but the power of the Jew in our government at that time and since, was and is such that they have escaped the consequences of their crime. On the other hand, despite this treasonable conduct the Jews were given Palestine upon President Wilson's insistence.

[28] The present writer wishes to add that some authors are convinced that Lenin's mother was a Jewess.

It has taken 22 years to find out the whole story of our betrayal into World War I. We are indebted to Senator Gerald P. Nye of North Dakota for digging into the records and bringing to light the Balfour-Lansing correspondence by which President Wilson is shown to have agreed to enter the war long prior to the sinking of the Lusitania.

This correspondence, however, did not disclose the real reason for our action, the motive for President Wilson's change of front and how the change was brought about. In his tireless effort to keep this country out of war, Senator Nye discovered and revealed the truth, and the real reason for President Wilson's change of front.

Prior to these revelations we thought we entered the war because of the sinking of the Lusitania and the violation of our rights as a neutral. That was the reason assigned by President Wilson in his dramatic message to Congress, but it was not the real reason, as conclusively shown by the Balfour-Lansing correspondence. It was only a pretext to secure the support of Congress and the people.

There can be no doubt about the fact that prior to President Wilson's second election in 1916 he "kept us out of the war." There can likewise be no doubt about the fact that he was reelected upon that slogan. Why did he change his position soon after his election? Why did he make an agreement with the British government to help the Allies? That has been, until now, an unexplained mystery.

The answer is the Jew and Palestine. "Believe it or not," President Wilson sacrificed 50,000 of the flower of our youth, caused 200,000 more to be maimed and crippled, and gave $50,000,000,000 of our wealth, in order to restore Palestine to the Jews—a small barren country that probably could have been bought for a billion dollars or less. Worse than that, he took us into the war for the purpose of treacherously taking the homeland from one of our own Allies, the Arabs, who were fighting side by side with our soldiers. Never have a brave, confiding people been so treacherously double-crossed.

In a speech in the Senate on April 25th, 1939,[29] Senator Nye said:

> "There has been published a series of works under the title "The Next War.' One of the volumes in this series is entitled 'Propaganda in the Next War.' This particular volume was written by one Sidney Rogerson. I have been unable to obtain any trace of his background or of his connections; but the editor-in-chief of all these works, including" the one entitled 'Propaganda for the Next War,' is a man whose name is recognized the world over as an authority in Great Britain. He is none other than Capt. Liddell Hart, associated with the London Times, a writer and a military authority in Europe."

The following are quotations from this authority:

> "For some time the issue as to which side the United States would take hung in the balance, and the final result was a credit to our propaganda (meaning the British propaganda) . . .
>
> "There remain the Jews. It has been estimated that of the world Jew population of approximately 15,000,000, no fewer than 5,000,000 are in the United States; 25% of the inhabitants of New York are Jews. During the Great War we bought off this huge American Jewish public by the promise of the Jewish National Home in Palestine, held by Ludendorff to be the master stroke of allied propaganda, as it enabled us not only to appeal to Jews in America but to Jews in Germany as well."

They "bought off the huge American Jewish public" with the promise of Palestine and with them they bought the powerful metropolitan Jewish press and the Wilson Administration. That is not my language, nor is it my assertion; it is the language and the statement of fact of an eminent British authority writing for the benefit of the British public, and particularly for the British propagandists of the "next war"—now in progress.

He says of this Propaganda for the Next War, that we (the American people) have been "fed up" on atrocities and that this form of attack will not work next time and that they must adopt new methods. He says that we are an emotional, gullible people and that despite the fact that there is now some prejudice against the British Government because of its refusal to pay its debt to us, that we can again be worked provided the proper approach is used. He suggests the following:

[29] See Congressional Record, 76th Congress, Vol. 84, No. 82, pages 6597-6604.

> "To persuade her (the United States) to take our part will be much more difficult, so difficult as to be unlikely to succeed. It will need a definite threat to America, a threat, moreover, which will have to be brought home by propaganda to every citizen, before the Republic will again take arms in an external quarrel . . .
>
> "The position will naturally be considerably eased if Japan were involved, and this might and probably would bring America in without further ado. At any rate, it would be a natural and obvious object of our propagandists to achieve this, just as during the Great War they succeeded in embroiling the United States with Germany.
>
> "Fortunately with America, our propaganda is on firm ground. We can be entirely sincere, as our main plank will be the old democratic one. We must clearly enunciate our belief in the democratic form of government and our firm resolve to adhere to it. Our minor propaganda will aim at attaching the support of important sections, such as the Jews, probably by the declaration of a clear-cut policy in Palestine, and of our intention, if victorious, to put an end to anti-Semitic persecutions; and of the Roman Catholic community in similar terms . . .
>
> "In the realm of the moving picture industry we may be able to depend on the natural bias of the United States film manufacturers in favor of Great Britain as opposed to Germany, Japan, or Italy, and on their command of the machinery of international film distribution. This will be an asset both with the stock entertainment picture and the news reels."

So their plan was to line up the Jews and "Catholic community" by "promising" if victorious to "put an end to anti-Semitic persecutions; and of the Roman Catholic community in similar terms." The Jews, the Jew press, the Jew cinemas, and the Jew President and his Jew administration, are already lined up; no promises or propaganda were needed for that purpose.

But the protestant American has been badly burned, he has had enough of their wars, and it will be difficult to get him into another one by talk and propaganda—which they realize. They propose to appeal to his prejudices and fears by getting Japan in on the other side. The British Government will probably adopt this course and provoke Japan to war in order to obtain the more powerful support of the United States.

The President has dispatched the fleet to the Pacific Ocean. This is for the purpose of war with Japan: It can be for no other purpose. If Japan will only torpedo one of these boats, the Jewish press, the Jewish radio, and the Jewish cinema will do the rest. The Jew Admiral Taussig stated to a Congressional Investigating Committee that "war with Japan is inevitable."

The worst of it is that these slick Jew war-makers will probably themselves torpedo the boat and blame the Japs through their press, cinema, etc., and the result will be the same. We may fight, and investigate later, and may again learn the truth twenty years afterward.

They also propose to appeal to us Protestants on the "old democratic plank" that they are democracies and "believe in the democratic form of government and our firm resolve to adhere to it." To hell with such democracies!

The British Empire is governed by a King and a Jewish Privy Council and a hereditary House of Lords, was acquired by conquest, is held together by military power, and is the greatest in area ever known,—upon which it is said the sun never sets. The French Empire, with a Rothschild in her cabinet, and governed ordinarily by a bunch of Jews,—was also acquired by conquest, and is the third largest area in the world.

The Jewish influence now governs the British Empire. They have many representatives in the House of Commons through the Labor party. In the House of Lords they predominate thru their purchase of titles and intermarriage with the nobility. Formerly a King selected and appointed his lords and nobles from his brave warriors and landed aristocracy; now he sells these titles to his rich subjects who are principally Jews, and this is a source of considerable revenue to the Crown. The present heads of the British cabinet, viz., Churchill, Eden, Cooper, et al., are all strongly pro-Jewish and are all intense haters of Hitler because he is anti-Semitic.

America is not a democracy and never has been, and God forbid that it ever shall be. It is a republic whose powers are clearly defined by the Constitution.

Referring to the propaganda by the British and German governments during the First World War, the writer correctly observes: "I repeat it is unthinkable that such a dog-fight between non-Americans will again be permitted in the United States." It is indeed "unthinkable," but such propaganda is nevertheless being carried on right now by the Jews in the newspapers and cinemas and over their radios. It should be suppressed even if we must close them all up.

Senator Nye said of this book:

> "I understand that this particular volume, Propaganda in the Next War, published last fall and placed in circulation, instead of having its circulation enlarged, now is suffering at the hands of those who desire to retire it from circulation. A few days ago I came on the floor of the Senate with the volume itself. I am sorry I have not it with me today. I am told that it is the only copy of Propaganda in the Next War available in the United States. It can be had; I can borrow it again if there is occasion and need for it in the Senate; but it is no longer easy to obtain. I wish the entire work might be read by every Member of the Senate."

Apparently it is a semi-official book of the British government. The destruction of these copies of the book was probably by order of her Jew Secretary of War, Hore-Belisha, or other Jewish "Elders," following an ancient Jewish custom.

That is what they did to the protocols and to Pinckney's diary and probably also to the American Official Services Report mentioned above.

XI.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS

> "By all these means we shall so wear down the goyim that they will be compelled to offer us international power of a nature that by its position will enable us without any violence gradually to absorb all the State forces of the world and to form a Super-Government. In place of the rulers of today we shall set up a bogey which will be called the Super-Government Administration."—From Protocol 5.

When World War I ended, the Rothschilds and their agents were there to administer upon the wreckage. "Elder" Bernard Baruch, who succeeded E. M. House as President Wilson's advisor, induced the President, contrary to all precedent and the advice of his cabinet, to attend the peace conference in France in person. "Elder" Baruch was, during the entire period of the war, Chairman of the War Industries Board which was invested with despotic authority over the production and sale of everything.

In his memoirs, Ike Hoover, Chief Usher at the White House during ten administrations, including the Wilson administration, said:

> "The President and Mrs. Wilson went to the country place rented by Mr. Baruch for lunch today (Sunday) and all of us scattered. The strange part is that each went alone, as if dodging the others. The fact is that we are all tired of looking at one another. At dinner time we had a good laugh when I charged them all with being bored with the others, and all manfully agreed."—Saturday Evening Post, July 7, 1934.

Why should this wily Jewish gambler rent a house and make his headquarters near Versailles during the peace conference, which gave birth to the League of Nations,? What interest had he in the League of Nations?

The terms of the peace treaty and the League of Nations were ostensibly agreed upon and fixed by Woodrow Wilson representing the United States Government, Lloyd George representing the British Empire, and Georges Clemenceau representing the French Empire,—but they were in fact largely the work of men behind the scenes, viz., the "King-Despot of the blood of Zion" and his agents representing the Jewish race and money power. It is obvious that Baruch was then and is now the political representative of the Rothschilds in America. Ile was then President Wilson's adviser.

The Jew mentor of David Lloyd-George was Sir Philip A. G. D. Sassoon, Bart., a direct descendant of Mayer Amschel Rothschild, and a member of the British Privy Council. He served Lloyd-George during the peace conference as private secretary which enabled him to "sit in" on the secret deliberations of the conferees.[30] Jeroboam Rothschild (Mandel) appears to have held a similar position with Clemenceau. Baruch's position with Wilson was that of an intimate friend and adviser.

I quote the magazine "Time" as authority for the statement that Georges Mandel, (Jeroboam Rothschild), until recently France's Minister of the Interior, was Clemenceau's "right bower." It says:

> "To the vital Ministry of the Interior, Premier Reynaud appointed energetic, 54-year-old Georges Mandel, till then Minister of Colonies. This was no new job for the sharp-nosed, stocky little Clemencist, who as the Tiger's chef de cabinet during the last war ran the country's domestic affairs and kept up civilian morale. Born Jeroboam Rothschild, Mandel has often been called France's Disraeli, is a super-politician in a country of politicians, lately showed in the Colonial (and Post Office) Ministry that he had lost none of the drive and administrative flare that made him indispensable to Clemenceau. He was so close to the Premier that the Rabelaisian Tiger once quipped: "Quand je pete, Mandel pue."[31]

We can now properly appraise this treacherous, criminal peace treaty, out of which has grown the present war. It was not Wilson who betrayed the German government by the promise of his Fourteen Points, nor Lloyd George who was false to the promises made the Arabs to induce them to enter the war. It was Jeroboam Rothschild, Sir Philip Sassoon, and Bernard Baruch. Wilson, Lloyd George and Clemenceau are culpable only to the extent that they acted in obedience to a power that they did not dare oppose.

These three Jews, representing the money power of the Rothschild family, determined the essential provisions of the infamous peace treaty. They established the International Labor Board; they made provision for the Reparations Commission and the Brussels Financial Conference; they gave Palestine to the Jews; and established without our membership the League of Nations and the

---

[30] Congressional Record, Aug. 21, 1940, p. 16368.

[31] *"Time," May 27, 1940, p. 34.

World Court. It was our refusal to join that prevented the consummation of their grandiose elaborate machine for the government of the world.

These three Jews are responsible for the abandonment of President Wilson's fourteen points and for the flagrant violation of the promises upon which Germany laid down her arms. If President Wilson's pledges had been observed we would have no World War II. Perhaps if we had joined the League of Nations there would be none, for we would be the subjects of this "King-Despot" who would rule us with an iron hand. They then and there sowed the seeds that have germinated into the present war.

Jeroboam Rothschild (Mandel) was a member of the Reynaud cabinet and resigned with him and fled with him when France refused to be "merged" into the British Empire but decided instead to surrender. The people of France now appear to realize, according to the press reports, that they are the victims of these warmongers.

It will be recalled that on his return to America President Wilson started upon a speaking tour to convert the American people to the League of Nations and that it was during this campaign that, fortunately for America, he had his break down; otherwise he might have put it over. It should also be recalled that due to the opposition of Senators Borah, Johnson, Lodge, Reed, and other stalwart Americans, this grandiose scheme was defeated. It should also be recalled with pride that there was enough Americanism left in the Senate, led by Borah and Johnson and Huey Long, to defeat our entry into the League of Nations through its back door, the so-called "World Court," during the Hoover administration and again during the Roosevelt administration, despite the powerful pressure brought to bear on the Senate by both of these presidents.

The League of Nations scheme did not originate with President Wilson. He made no such claim. Its precise origin is unknown, but the Jews claim credit for it. It is no doubt their baby, for it has all the ear-marks of their craftiness.

Its pretended purposes were to form a league or coalition of all the nations of the earth for the purpose of preventing future wars, but that was not its real purpose. It was a slick scheme to establish a Super-Government to which all the nations of the earth would be subordinate and subservient.

There was no authority under our constitution for our government to become a party to it, even though its purpose had been a worthy one. That small detail, however, "cut no ice" with the "Elders" and apparently none with President Wilson. The London Daily Mail said of it that it is "the most elaborate sham which history has yet perpetrated." It has now discharged all of its employees and closed up its shop.

The peace conference appointed Gustav Cassel, a noted monetary authority of Stockholm, Sweden, to advise them, which he did. He wrote for that purpose two memoranda (published in his book entitled "World's Monetary Problems,") in which he set forth logically and conclusively that it was absolutely necessary to maintain high prices and wages and cheap money in order to enable the people and nations of the world to pay their debts. He showed convincingly that the restoration of the gold standard was impossible, that it would bankrupt the people and governments of all countries, create great distress and unrest and probably lead to war.

In the face of the solemn warning prepared especially for the Brussels Financial Conference, this conference decreed the return of the gold standard, with its cheap prices and wages. Professor Cassel told in words of prophecy precisely the results that have since happened. The shrewd monetary experts of the Brussels Conference knew what would happen without such advice and they intended the very consequences that followed and that now prevail.

Under the pretense of writing a peace treaty with Germany this peace conference established Palestine as a home for the Jews and invested the British Government with a mandate for the government of the country. The Jews have been at war with the Arabs since and the situation has become so intolerable that the British Government sought to divide the country between the Jews and Arabs and to surrender its responsibility, which pleased neither Jew nor Arab.

The Arabs want all of Palestine because it belongs to them and the Jews want it all, although they have not settled it and do not expect to do so. Less than 500,000 Jews have moved there during the twenty-two years since the establishment of this alleged Jewish home. Many of them, after locating there, have moved to America and other countries. More Jews have migrated to America during that period than have settled in Palestine. America is now the "Palestine" of the Jews. They don't want to be farmers and craftsmen;—that is not their ticket. They prefer that the "Goyim" do the work and themselves to live among them and trade with them and manipulate their currency systems.

The establishment of this "Jewish home" was not involved as an issue in the world war or in the peace treaty with Germany. The Arabs were our allies and they fought side by side with the soldiers of the allies. It was cold blooded, indefensible robbery perpetrated at the instance of the "Elders" by Lloyd George and Woodrow Wilson and Georges Clemenceau.

There would have been some justification for it if the British Government had acquired the lands of the Arabs with their consent, paying for them and buying lands sufficient for the whole Jewish race and had thereafter forced all the Jews from all countries to migrate there; that would have done more toward preserving the peace of the world than all of their mandates, the Brussels Financial Conference, the International Labor Board, and the League of Nations combined.

The worst of it is that the establishment of this "Jewish home" was cold blooded treachery to the Arab Government and people. The Arabs claim that they were induced to enter the war on the side of the allies by the promise that what is known as the Balfour Declaration would be rescinded and that the Arabians would not be molested in the peaceable ownership and possession of their country. This contention is not denied by the British Government, but the excuse is made that Woodrow Wilson insisted that the Jews be given this home and that Lloyd George consented as a matter of policy and in order to get some other things in the peace treaty that he desired. Palestine is now properly called the "twice promised land." It is likely that Germany also promised it in consideration of the Russian deal.

The defenseless Arabs were treacherously ravished by their comrades in arms. If the Jews want this or any other home, let them buy it. That is the honest way to get it, and they have plenty of money for that purpose. Palestine does not belong to them because their ancestors lived there more than fifteen hundred years ago. The most of them have no sentiment about it, for sentiment is not a Jewish characteristic;—with them it is always strictly business.

In any event, this home of the Jews was not involved in a peace settlement with Germany; nor was the establishment of an International Labor Board to regulate the wages and conditions of labor; nor was the restoration of the gold standard; nor was the League of Nations. These are not international subjects, but they are local to each country. It is the province of each and all of the countries of the world to define their own national policies regarding each and all of these important matters. They were all projected into the peace treaty by the Jews."

XII.

GOLD

"With gold we can buy the most rebellious consciences, can fix the rate of all values, the current price of all products, can subsidize all State loans, and thereafter hold the states at our mercy."—From Funeral Oration of Rabbi Reichhorn.

"You are aware that the gold standard has been the ruin of the States which adopted it, for it has not been able to satisfy the demands for money, the more so that we have removed gold from circulation as far as possible."—From Protocol 20.

The fixed policy of the management of the Rothschild fortune is and has always been monopoly. They brook no opposition and they fix the tolls of whatever business they engage in. In the beginning their operations were confined to government loans, not only for the profit involved but for the political power that it gave them. As the fortune grew their field of operations expanded until it embraced everything. Originally, the Rothschilds had competition for these government loans and consequently were not always able to fix the rate of discount, but this opposition was soon crushed or absorbed.

Among their early competitors was the Bank of England, which was chartered in 1694 for the purpose of financing the British Government. In consideration of a loan of 1,200,000 pounds the British government granted the Bank of England the exclusive privilege of issuing currency in the City of London and within a radius of 65 miles thereof. Originally it was granted an annuity of 100,000 pounds a year for handling the government's business, and its property and operations were exempted from taxation.

Adam Smith says of the Bank of England:

"She acts not only as an ordinary bank, but as a great engine of state. She receives and pays the greater part of the annuities which are due to the creditors of the public; she circulates Exchequer bills; and she advances to the Government the annual amount of the land and malt taxes which are frequently not paid till some years thereafter."

These functions were in line with the operations of the Rothschilds and consequently they coveted the bank. There is no record of when they acquired it or how much they paid for it, for that is not the Rothschild way; it is one of their secrets. It was probably acquired by Nathan during the hey-day of his activity, sometime around 1830 and as a result of an assault that he himself made on it.

Pretending a grievance, Nathan Rothschild bought up its outstanding notes and personally presented them to the bank for payment day after day, and received coin in payment therefore until he practically exhausted the bank's supply. The management of the bank capitulated. From that time until this day the Bank of England has been one of the most effective agencies of the Rothschilds in promoting their plans.

The charter of the bank was amended eight times during the period from 1694 to 1844 when the Peel amendment was adopted; it has never been changed since. The original government loan of 1,200,000 pounds, instead of being paid, was increased from time to time until it had reached the sum of 11,015,000 pounds in 1844, when the Peel amendment was adopted.

This amendment provided in substance that the Bank of England might issue its currency notes up to 15 million pounds upon its general assets, and that all currency issued in excess of this sum must be secured by an equal amount of gold coin or bullion; it also provided that other banks of issue should thereafter increase the amount of their currency notes, and then as their charters expired the privilege of issuing currency should be cancelled.

The Peel amendment had far-reaching consequences apparent upon its face: (1) It demonetized silver, which theretofore circulated in England and throughout the world money; (2) it gave the Bank of England a monopoly of the rency of the British Empire; (3) it established the gold vertible note on the basis of a 100% gold coverage; (4) it made the Bank of England the clearing house of the British Empire and established the British pound as world currency; (5) it gave the management of the bank the power to fix and regulate prices and wages throughout the British Empire and to materially influence them throughout the world.

The Encyclopedia Britannica[32] states regarding the Peel amendment:

> "It was indispensable, in attempting to obviate the defects inherent in our currency, to proceed cautiously, to respect, as far as possible, existing interests, and to avoid taking any step that might excite the fears or suspicions of the public; but the measures . . . were so skillfully contrived as to provoke little opposition, at the same time that they effected most important and highly beneficial changes"

[32] Vol. III, p. 323.

Sir Robert Peel was then Prime Minister of Great Britain and no doubt favored the amendment to the bank's charter which bears his name, but it was his bill only in the sense that the Federal Reserve Act is President Wilson's bill. The apostate Jew Benjamin Disraeli was then at the head of the opposition party which overthrew the Peel ministry in 1848. Disraeli was subsequently Prime Minister of England.

Disraeli was then the intimate friend of Lionel Rothschild whose family at that time owned and controlled the Bank of England and the greater part of the gold of the world. It will be noted that the authority mentioned states that the act and its adoption "were so skillfully contrived as to provoke little opposition." Evidently it had the support of the leaders of both political parties, and evidently it was not understood by the members of parliament and by the people generally, and evidently Disraeli had much to do with it, if he was not in fact its author.

It is a singular fact that the bill was put over by the Rothschild agents in precisely the same manner that they put over the Federal Reserve Act. The setting for it was the same, viz: the catastrophe of 1840, which the Rothschilds precipitated;—the Federal Reserve Act grew out of the panic of 1907, which the Rothschilds also precipitated. It was similar in its obscure meaning to our Federal Reserve Act. It was put over as a result of a coalition of both political parties,—as was our Federal Reserve Act. It gave the Rothschild management complete dominion over the welfare of the British Empire and our Federal Reserve Act gave it to them over the people of America.

It is worthy of note that the Peel amendment was adopted during the same year that Disraeli published his book "Coningsby," which was intended to exalt the Rothschilds and the Jews. Disraeli then said of Lionel Rothschild: "He was lord and master of the money markets of the world, and of course virtually the lord and master of everything else."

The so-called Peel amendment enormously magnified the Rothschild power. If there was any question about the head of the Rothschild fortune being "lord and master of everything else" prior to 1844, there can be none about his power since.This amendment made him the absolute "lord and master of everything" since 1844,—and that was the secret purpose of its real authors.

The gold standard was designed to limit the volume of currency in order to enhance the power and value of gold and its owners. The currency cannot expand beyond the quantity of gold in circulation and it therefore presents an absolute artificial limit to the expansion of currency and credit and of business, which is based thereon. As a result the currency systems based on it always break down when there is an unusual demand for currency and credit created by war. All the nations of the world were compelled to abandon the gold standard during World War I, and consequently the Rothschild interest sought to restore it immediately thereafter.

The conferees at the peace conference, Lloyd George, Clemenceau and President Wilson, created two subordinate committees to work out the details of their schemes:—one called the Economic Section and the other the Financial Committee. President Wilson appointed "Elder" Baruch as the American representative on the Economic Section and Thos. W. Lamont, a partner of J. P. Morgan & Co., as our representative on the Financial Committee; both of them Rothschild agents.

The committee of the Economic Section held its session at or about the time of the Versailles Conference but the Financial Conference was held later at Brussels. The Economic Section's committee fixed the German reparations at $12,000,000,000 in flagrant violation of the terms of surrender as proclaimed in President Wilson's fourteen points.

The Brussels Financial Conference in the face of the official advice of Professor Cassel decreed that the world should return to the gold standard. This necessarily meant that all monies, including the dollar, would be greatly enhanced in value, and prices and wages would be reduced accordingly. The dollar has in fact been enhanced from two- to three-fold, and prices and wages and values have been reduced to the same extent. It also necessarily meant that it would be impossible for Germany to pay the reparations fixed by the Economic Section, and for the Allies to pay the monies borrowed from America.

Following the decision of the Financial Conference, the "Elders" sent Professor Kemmerer and their other lackeys to the principal countries of the world to reorganize their financial systems upon a gold basis. They even established the gold standard in poor old defenseless China that had always been on a silver basis and with a limited currency volume of only about $2.50 per capita of silver and a negligible quantity of gold, with the result that millions of Chinese perished from starvation.

The victorious Allies turned Germany over to the tender mercies of the Jews. After having fixed the German reparations at an impossible figure under the gold standard, they drove another nail in the coffin of prostrate Germany in order to make assurance doubly sure. They not only re-established the currency of Germany upon a gold basis but they imposed upon the German people our infamous Federal Reserve System, calling it the "Dawes Plan," by which they gave the Elders the power to control the volume of currency and credit and the level of prices and wages.

They likewise made it impossible for our Allies, Britain, France and other countries, to repay the loans we made them. It was probably never intended that they should be repaid. Elder Baruch is primarily responsible for them for at the time they were made he was President Wilson's right hand man and was directing his foreign policy. There is no authority in our constitution for loans or gifts to the Allies. They were made in utter and flagrant violation of law. They were made for the purpose of enabling foreign countries to remain on the gold standard and pay their debts to the Rothschilds.

Thus, for the pretended purposes of writing a peace treaty that would establish permanent peace among the nations of the world and of collecting German reparations, the "Elders" partially established their League of Nations and their International Labor Bureau, and re-established the gold standard,—but for only a brief period.

All countries have since been compelled to abandon the gold standard, but this was not done until after it had impoverished the people of the world and impaired their morale. The people in their despair have overthrown their governments and created dictatorships and semi-dictatorships; nations are at war with each other; and a general war is on. This is all precisely according to the program of the Elders as set out in their protocols.

Thos. W. Lamont knew that the return to the gold standard would be the ruin of all of the States that attempted it, for that result was clearly pointed out to him by the report to the Brussels Financial Conference of his specialist, Professor Gustav Cassel of Sweden. He no doubt knew it apart from this report, but this report made it clear and certain.

Professor Cassel was appointed to advise the committee and he did advise them that the restoration of the gold standard would make it impossible for all of the nations of the world to pay their respective debts; that it meant bankruptcy and ruin for all of them. He made an unanswerable argument in support of his thesis and yet Mr. Lamont and his fellow conspirators decreed that the world should pay its debts and base its values upon Rothschild owned and manipulated gold.

There could be but one purpose in view and that was to destroy all of the States of the world, for that was the necessary effect and it was the known effect. Their purposes were poverty and suffering and unrest and communism and war, for these were the necessary and known results. It was for the purpose of destroying all governments and establishing their Jewish world empire with their "King-Despot of the Blood of Zion" as emperor, for that is the plan of their protocols.

The present war has now developed into a struggle for the preservation of the gold standard. In the beginning Hitler sought only the restoration of pre-war Germany, but it has now passed that stage. It appears to be his present purpose to destroy the Jewish Empire which is so interwoven with the British Empire that the two apparently must go down together. The hybrid Churchill is ready to sacrifice the last Englishman to preserve the Jewish Empire;—the British empire is only an incidental consideration. With victory within his grasp Hitler proposed to negotiate a peace on the basis of preserving the British Empire, which Churchill rejected.

It is the Jewish Empire that is of such deep concern to our hybrid President. He appears to be willing to sacrifice the youth and wealth of this nation to preserve it. It was for that purpose that he caused to be acquired and stored more than 20 billion dollars of gold; that he sent Sumner Welles on his scouting expedition; that Secretary Hull called the Havana conference; and that he is organizing a huge army and navy.

XIII.

WORLD WAR II

"We must be in a position to respond to every act of opposition by war with the neighbors of that country which dares to oppose us; but if these neighbors should also venture to stand collectively together against us, then we must offer resistance by a universal war."—From Protocol 7.

The First World War deposed the Kaiser and Bethmann Holweg, but did not depose Rathnau and the other Jews; it transformed the German government from a Jew-controlled monarchy to a Jew-controlled democracy. It is true there was a different set of Jews in control of the democracy; different men, but the same old Rothschild influence, Rothschild ideals, and Rothschild program.

Their first act was to debase the German currency, the reichsmark. They issued many billions of it and continued to issue it until it had no value. They sold vast quantities of this money at heavy discounts in America and other countries, and then made it utterly worthless, thereby fleecing real money from the people of the world. They bought German properties, factories, lands, etc., on time at high prices and paid their obligations in worthless money. After all of this wild inflation and after having acquired and paid for their properties with nothing, this same malign Jewish influence through the Dawes Commission brought about a reorganization of the German Reichsbank, a restoration of the gold standard, and deflation.

Thus the Jews have oppressed and impoverished the people of Germany. They have had a great picnic and very rich picking, and they are now paying for their fun. It was estimated by Adolf Hitler that the Jews owned four-fifths of the wealth of Germany. Think of it. This alien race comprising less than 1% of the population owned 80% of the wealth of the country. The worst of it is that they stole it by the manipulation of the German currency system—in the same way that they have stolen the wealth of our country. The wonder is that Hitler has been so patient and forbearing.

President Wilson proclaimed his famous fourteen points to Germany and the world as a basis for a truce and peace.In substance they assured Germany that if she would cease hostilities that the German people and government would not be penalized. The terms of the peace were formally accepted by the Kaiser, and accordingly an armistice was declared which was later followed by the Versailles treaty.

When Germany had laid down her arms and was prostrate and defenseless she was turned over to the Jews to be dissected and sterilized. In a radio speech made by Adolf Hitler a few months before World War II, he recited the promises that were made to induce the surrender of the German army by President Wilson in his famous fourteen points, the flagrant breach of those promises although impliedly guaranteed by the American Government, the dismemberment of the German Empire and the imposition of impossible penalties, and the great depth to which the Jewish Administration of the German government following the, war had reduced the people. Of this he said:

> "Jewish parasites, on one hand, plundered the nation ruthlessly, and, on the other hand, incited the people when it had been reduced to misery. As the misfortune of our nation became the only aim and object of this race it was possible to breed among the growing army of unemployed suitable elements for Bolshevik revolution.
>
> "Decay of political order and confusion of public opinion by the irresponsible Jewish press led to ever stronger shocks to the economic life and, consequently, to increasing misery and to greater readiness to absorb subversive Bolshevik ideas. The army of Jewish World Revolution, as the army of unemployed was called, finally rose to almost seven million."

That is precisely what they are now doing in America, and for precisely the same purpose. That is the manner by which they gained temporary control of the Austrian government. It is their method of operation. Our people have not yet sunk to the depth of poverty and misery and despair suffered by the German people, following World War I, but they are rapidly approaching that condition, and even now they provide fertile soil for the seeds of communism and revolution.

Hitler's speech was not one of an ambitious, saber-rattling braggart, but it was that of a sober, deliberate, determined man, with a mission to perform, who abhors war.

He said of the war-mongers:

> "If the cry of 'Never another Munich!' is raised in the world today this simply confirms the fact that a peaceful solution of the problem appeared to be the most fatal thing that ever happened in the eyes of those war-mongers. They are sorry no blood was shed—not their blood of course—for these agitators are, of course, never to be found where shots are being fired, but only where money is being made! No, it is the blood of the nameless soldiers."

In his speech Adolf Hitler plainly and unequivocally said to Poland that Germany must have Danzig and the Polish Corridor, both formerly German, but he did not demand Silesia, also formerly German. He said that in the interest of World Peace he had made a treaty with France regarding Alsace, also formerly German, and he proposed to abide by it.

Hitler undertook to negotiate a treaty with Poland by which these fractions of Germany would be restored, by agreement. Pending these negotiations there was a pogrom against the resident Germans of Poland. Despite that fact Hitler made an appointment with the Jewish Polish foreign minister Beck to conclude the treaty, which Beck failed to keep. Instead of doing so he went to Downing Street in London for advice. Hitler then sent an army to suppress the Polish uprising and thereupon England and France declared war on Germany;—thus World War II began.

When war was declared the Allies sought to encircle Germany; to that end they sought to make an alliance with Soviet Russia and the Balkan states. Pending these negotiations Germany effected an alliance with Russia, the terms of which are not clear, but it appears to be an economic alliance and not a military one.

Both the Russian and German governments have been criticized for this alliance, which appears to be a misfit. The Germans claim that it was a matter of self-preservation on the part of Germany and that if she had not entered into an alliance with Russia the Allies would have done so,—which is probably true. The communists claim that it is entirely consistent with their principles, that it is to the advantage of communism to engulf the entire world in war and then administer on the wreckage,—which is also true, and which is in keeping with their principles and program. That no doubt accounts for the fact that communists of all countries approve this misalliance.

After conquering Poland Hitler again proposed to the Allies and to the world to make peace on the basis of restoring to Germany only that which was taken from her by the treaty of Versailles, with the exception of Alsace. The only difference in this and his original proposal was that it involved the return of the colonies which the treaty of Versailles awarded to Great Britain. The answer to this overture was that they would not treat with the Hitler government; that Hitler and Hitlerism (meaning anti-Semitism) must be destroyed.

True to her ancient strategy it was the policy of England to starve the enemy by blockade with her sea power. In violation of international law, which has been made largely by the British Empire, she imposed a blockade upon both German exports and imports. This Germany met with her submarines and air force, with the result that the starving has been "the other way round." Britain is now getting a dose of her own medicine and it Is evidently very distasteful to her.

Up to this time Germany has fought the war according to the rules of civilized warfare; she has not abused her superior power in the air by attacking with poison gas, as the British evidently expected; she has not attempted to assassinate any British leader; she has given shelter and transportation to the soldiers and seamen of Britain when her ships were destroyed.

There were a number of these prisoners of war on the "Altmark" which was anchored in a Norwegian port. By order of Churchill a British cruiser, in violation of the neutrality of Norway, attacked the Altmark, anchored in a Norwegian port, shot several of the crew who were unarmed and did not offer resistance, and released the prisoners. It is obvious that Germany could have left all of these prisoners to their fate when their ships were sunk. The dastardly, cowardly, murderous attack of the British upon the defenseless Altmark was applauded by the Jewish British and American press as a great British victory.

According to the Associated Press the distinguished Norwegian novelist, Knut Hamsun, addressing his countrymen, said of this banditry:

> "When the Britishers in their prodigious savagery forced a passage into Jossing Fjord and infringed our neutrality, you did nothing about it. But when the Germans occupied Norway to prevent war in our country you did something: You conspired with our runaway King and his private government and mobilized. Norwegians! Throw away your rifles and return home. The Germans are fighting for us and now are crushing England's tyranny over us and all neutrals."

Winston Churchill also violated the neutrality of Norway by mining her territorial waters.

It has been conclusively shown by official papers which fell into the hands of the Germans when they captured Oslo, as well as by other facts, that the British through the Jew Hambro, head of the Norwegian government, had previously arranged to send troops to Norway and to take charge of all of her strategic ports. They appear to have been actually en route when Germany, having a shorter distance to travel, and superior generalship, landed her troops in Norway first. She "beat them to the draw." Norway capitulated and is now under the control of Germany.

The Allies were very much disturbed by this victory. The Jewish press demanded a more vigorous prosecution of the war. Despite the fact that Lord Admiral Churchill, then head of the War Board, had been primarily responsible for the Norwegian defeat, the British government retired Chamberlain, and Churchill was made Prime Minister. Churchill re-organized the cabinet, bringing into it two other pro-Jews and Hitler-haters,—Anthony Eden and Duff-Cooper. They boldly announced that the Allies would take the offensive and would attack Germany; about the same time they transferred the British fleet from Scapa Flow to the Mediterranean.

This meant one of two things: either that the Allies meant to attack Germany through the Balkans or that they had moved the fleet for the purpose of deceiving Hitler into the belief that they would do so, while their real purpose was to attack through Holland and Belgium. If the fleet was moved for the purpose of deception the ruse was an ineffective one and probably an unfortunate one for the Allies. Hitler was not deceived.

The Germans claim that the Allies had made arrangements with the governments of Holland and Belgium to make the attack through those countries, and Germany again "beat them to the draw." We don't know the truth. It will likely be revealed later.

The Allies have not won a single battle or diplomatic victory, with the possible exception that they bought the support of Turkey with a loan of $140,000,000 which has proven to be a barren victory. The Germans apparently have had superior equipment and they undoubtedly have had superior generalship and morale of soldiers. The most important of these requirements is the morale and fighting spirit of the soldier.

The cause and results of the present war prior to the surrender of France are graphically stated by Newton Jenkins of Chicago, as follows:

> "What made Austria as an independent nation fall? Why did Czechoslovakia lose her independence? What made Poland pass out? What caused Denmark, Norway, Holland and Belgium to cease operations as free countries? Why are England and France likely to meet the same fate? German aggression, you say. Not at all. Organized Jewry is the answer.

"Organized Jewry made Schushnigg and others in Austria pursue a mad policy of national suicide and Germany rescued that nation from the unholy alliance. Organized Jewry made Benes, young Massaryk and others in Czechoslovakia pursue a policy of sheer madness. They lost their country. Organized Jewry drove Negrin, Del Vayo and other leaders in Spain along their mad course until the people under Franco rescued that nation. Organized Jewry drove Beck, Smigly Ridz and other leaders in Poland along the same mad course toward destruction.

In Norway organized Jewry, working through the part Jewish Hambro, drove that nation along a path of pro-British sympathy and it ceased to exist as an independent nation. The King of Belgium and the Queen of Holland played the game of organized Jewry and now foreign troops are in command of their towns and cities.

"England and France for decades have become the nesting grounds of organized Jewry. The Churchills, Edens, Duff Coopers, Hore Belishas and many others in England, and the Reynauds, the Daladiers and others in France have been the pawns of the Rothschilds, the Sassoons and others. Many of the political leaders themselves have a mixture of base blood coursing through their veins in all of these countries[33]. These two great empires under the lash and whip of organized Jewry are tramping straight and inevitably to their doom.

"The American foreign policy of the Hoovers and the Roosevelts, the Hulls and the Tafts, the Landons and the Frank Knoxes and Key Pitmans are heading us straight down the same path of despair. The Baruchs, the Kuhn Loebs, the Morgenthaus and others in our land are lashing our weak political leaders to unwittingly destroy our nation in the same way that European nations have been destroyed. America will not follow the dance of death. America will throw off the rule of Jewry and her bailiffs. America will remain the same glorious republic she has always been."

The Germans have experienced defeat once. They have been administered on by the Jews once and they know that defeat means another Jewish administration and the dismemberment of Germany. They know this from the private to the general and by bitter experience. They are fighting for their freedom. "Thrice armed is he whose cause is just."

[33] It is said that Churchill and Cooper are hybrids and that Eden's wife is a Jewess

The British and French soldiers are good soldiers and brave men; it is in their blood and sinew and bone,—but they fought half-heartedly. They are beginning to learn, if they have not already done so, that this war is a Jew's war for Jewish power and purposes.

The defeat of the Jews is now apparent. The Germans are moving with irresistible power toward London and they will likely reach their destination before Roosevelt will be able to inveigle America into the war. The Jews, as stated in their protocols, have met Germany's "act of opposition by war" but they have not been able to "offer resistance by a universal war." In the same protocol they say that they "shall respond with the guns of America or China or Japan," but China and Japan are now otherwise engaged, and "Uncle Shylock" wants to stay out of it.

XIV.

OUR DESPOT OF THE BLOOD OF ZION

"However, it is probably all the same to the world who is its sovereign lord, whether the head of Catholicism or our despot of the blood of Zion! But to us the Chosen People, it is very far from being a matter of indifference."—From Protocol 5.

The people of America do not want a super-government or to be ruled by the pope of Rome or a "despot of the blood of Zion." We barely escaped it when the republicans, with the aid of "twelve willful" democrats defeated the League of Nations project by a very small margin; for the League of Nations meant that very thing.

The Jewish press informs us that one of the original objectives of the present war, called World War II, was the creation of the United States of Europe,—in fact Prime Minister Chamberlain stated the same purpose in one of his speeches,—but it has gotten beyond that stage. It is now a struggle to preserve the British Empire and the gold standard.

The Jews have bled the British Empire white. They have exploited all of the colonies, particularly India and South Africa, but Australia, New Zealand and Canada have not escaped them. They impoverished Ireland to the extent that that country revolted. It is significant that India and Ireland have not come to the rescue of the "mother country, England," in this her hour of peril, and that she has had no support from Arabia, her former ally. The Arabians have been fooled once with the promise of Palestine, and while this has been renewed in a modified form they did not fall for the bait.

Nor has England had any support from the Jews of Palestine so far as we have been informed by the Jewish press. It is certain that if they had raised a corps of thirty men the press would have heralded it all over the world. The Jews prefer that the Gentiles do all of the menial work and all of the fighting. When one of them is drafted he is usually a "conscientious objector" or he finds his way to the commissary department. One of the troubles with the Allies is the graft of the Jews in their Ordnance and Commissary Departments which are in Jewish hands.

If we must choose between being ruled by the Pope of Rome and a "despot of the blood of Zion," the Pope is preferable. He at least will let us live and will not enslave us.

But there does not appear to be any ground for the implied charge in the protocols that the Catholic hierarchy is actively seeking to recover its lost political power and to reestablish its temporal dominion. Undoubtedly the Pope would be delighted to see a Catholic government in America and in every other country of the world. But there is no evidence known to me that the Pope is seeking to gain these ends in the clandestine, subterranean manner as set out in the protocols or that he is cooperating with the Elders for such ends.

The Pope is now having great difficulty in maintaining the status of the church in its ancient strongholds, viz., Mexico and Czechoslovakia. It is hardly conceivable that under these circumstances he or the Catholic hierarchy would be actively at work undermining the governments of other countries through the impoverishment of the people and the destruction of their governments.

On the contrary there is evidence that the Pope does not approve the present Jewishized administration. The most effective and boldest critic of it has been Father Coughlin of Detroit. If the press is to be believed, (and I do not swear by it), the Pope actually approved Father Coughlin's campaign against the Roosevelt-Jewish-deflation administration.

The Catholic Church ruled practically all the countries of Europe for a period of more than a thousand years following the fall of the Roman Empire. It is the period known as the "dark ages." The people were ignorant, superstitious, and desperately poor, and the church was at no pains to enlighten them and to help them. The church has surrendered its temporal authority grudgingly and after much bloody strife. Even now it maintains the semblance of a political government at the Vatican, to which some nations send their ambassadors. Contrary to the policy and tradition of our government the President appointed Myron C. Taylor, Chairman of the Board of the United States Steel Corporation, as our ambassador to the Vatican.

There was a political party in most countries of Europe known as the "Catholic Party," which was devoted primarily to the interests of the church. The Order of the Jesuits was formerly the political organization of the church, which appears to have had a code of political morality as cynical as that of the Jewish "Learned Elders of Zion." The Jesuit organization does not appear to be active in America.

The present war is a death struggle between Hitlerism (anti-Semitism) and Jewish imperialism. It is not primarily for the restoration of Poland or Czechoslovakia or any other country except insofar as such restoration contributes to Jewish imperialism. It is primarily to destroy Hitler and Germany because they are both anti-Semitic, and to preserve the gold standard because through it the Jews control the economic destiny of all countries.

Hitler abandoned the gold standard, since which date Germany has been prosperous and with no unemployment. Germany is fighting this war without gold and is thereby demonstrating to the world that it is not necessary to borrow gold from the Jews in order to wage war.

Hitler threatens the very foundations of the Jewish empire throughout the world and he now appears to seriously threaten the British navy which the Jews have used to preserve their empire. Our beloved (?) President Roosevelt is itching to get into this war to save world Jewry and to promote himself and not to save America. All of this war hysteria in the United States has been created by the Jewish press and F. D. Roosevelt to serve their fellow tribesmen and not to serve their fellow Americans.

In a speech delivered before the National Social Congress at Nurnberg, Germany, on Sept. 13, 1935, Dr. Joseph Goebbels, Mr. Hitler's assistant, said:

> "Where are the men behind the scenes of this virulent world movement? Who are the inventors of all this madness? Who transplanted this ensemble into Russia and is today making the attempt to have it prevail in other countries? The answer to these questions discloses the actual secret of our anti-Jewish policy and our uncompromising fight against Jewry; for the Bolshevik International is in reality nothing less than a Jewish Internationale.
>
> "It was the Jew who discovered Marxism. It is the Jew who for decades past has endeavored to stir up world revolution through the medium of Marxism.. It is the Jew who is today at the head of Marxism in all the countries of the world. Only in the brain of a nomad who is without nation, race and country could this Satanism have been hatched. And only one possessed of a satanic malevolence could launch this revolutionary attack."

Every word and every sentence of the above statement is true. It will bear reading a second time. It not only explains the "actual secret" of the anti-Jewish policy of Germany but it explains the "actual secret" of anti-Semitism in America and throughout the world.

The Jews have in times past been expelled from every country in Europe and some of those of Asia. They were expelled long before their scheme was brought to light by the publication of the protocols and perhaps before any protocols were written, but not before the Talmud. They were expelled twice from France and were expelled and kept out of England for 400 years after their expulsion. Why? It was not because of the ignorance and brutality of all peoples in all ages but because the Jews have been what they are, with the same characteristics and the same ideals and purposes throughout the ages. These characteristics and ideals are reflected in their Talmud and protocols and communist code.

Before any World Empire can be established it is necessary first to destroy the American form of government. The plan of the protocols for that purpose is to impoverish the people, impair their morals and nullify their constitution. There can be no dictator or king or emperor so long as the people are happy and prosperous and patriotic and adhere to their established form of government. The method set out in detail in the protocols is the only possible way to subjugate the American people to the "Despot of the blood of Zion" or any other despot. The destruction of our government has been the principal objective of the "Jew Deal" and the present Jewish administration.

XV.

OUR UNDECLARED WAR AGAINST GERMANY

> "We have harnessed them all to the task; each one of them on his own account is boring away at the last remnants of authority, is striving to overthrow all established form of order. By these acts all States are in torture; they exhort to tranquility, are ready to sacrifice everything for peace; but we will not give them peace until they openly acknowledge our international Super-Government, and with submissiveness . . . And the weapons in our hands are limitless ambitions, burning greediness, merciless vengeance, hatreds and malice."—From Protocol 9.

Soon after the German order of fine and expulsion of the Jews, President Roosevelt withdrew our Ambassador to Germany for consultation, (as announced in the press), but he is still at home. Quite a lengthy consultation. This is an act of war; it is usually the first step preceding a declaration of war, but Hitler refused to accept the challenge for the obvious reason that he does not want war with us, despite the fact that we are wholly unprepared.

The treaty of Munich was a sad disappointment to International Jewry and to Franklin D. Roosevelt. Mr. Roosevelt showed his resentment by imposing a 25% tariff on German importations and attaching the monies of the Reichsbank on deposit in New York banks. These were overt acts of war which Hitler has met with firmness and dignity. He could do no less than withdraw his own Ambassador and impose a like tariff upon our exports to Germany. If he desired war with our country he has ample grounds for it. It is probably a disappointment to the President that he did not accept the challenge and declare war.

In his first message to the 76th Congress, the President said:

> "Words may be futile, but war is not the only means of commanding a decent respect for the opinions of mankind. There are many methods short of war, but stronger and more effective than mere words, of bringing home to aggressor governments the aggregate sentiments of our own people."

It is significant that no other country of the world has imposed such a tariff upon German imports. Germany can get along without our wheat and corn and cotton and meat and dairy exports as well as we can get along without her market for them, but both countries are being injured. This argument, however, has no force with men who are seeking to impoverish our people and to destroy our government.

Apparently the President made some sort of a secret military alliance with the governments of England and France. At a secret meeting with the Senate Military Affairs Committee he is reported to have said that the "frontiers of France are our frontiers." That is the traditional position of Great Britain.

He denounced this report as a "deliberate lie" but he would not release the members of the Military Affairs Committee from their pledge of secrecy, and he suppressed an investigation. Senator Lundeen of Minnesota, who is a member of this committee and attended this conference with the President, said in a speech in the Senate that the President's statement to this committee, if revealed, would "shock and stun" the American people.

The President pretends that he does not want war and that he is trying to avoid it. He made two dramatic appeals to Hitler to halt,—the first by radio, the second by message. In the second he proposed to act as mediator and to call a conference of the nations of the earth to enter into a ten-year truce. On the day preceding this message he denounced Hitler in a much publicized speech, as an aggressor and a disturber of world peace.

This was not the way to bring about a conference and a ten year truce. If Mr. Roosevelt really desired such conference and truce he would have submitted his offer in the usual way through diplomatic channels, and not by proclaiming it from the housetops. He desired that the offer should be rejected, and made it as offensively as he could. It was made for "home consumption" and to rally the people of America behind him.

He does not appear to have fooled many people. Dorothy Thompson (Levy) and the other war mongers, all with one accord clapped their hands and applauded—not because they thought his offer was a step in the direction of peace, but because they believed it to be a step in the direction of war. Nor did it fool Hitler and Mussolini. Mussolini's paper said of it:

> "We deny the President any right to intervene in European questions because his country is not directly interested as well as because he personally has not the slightest claim to assuming the role of friendly and impartial mediator."

The article said President Roosevelt's appeal evidently was for internal use. It charged him with wanting to divert American opinion from "the unemployment which grows day by day."

When the Allies declared war on Germany President Roosevelt immediately got busy. His first act was to create an international commission headed by Myron Taylor, Chairman of the Board of the United States Steel Corporation, to assist in the migration of the Jews. We do not know what this commission has done or is doing, but it is still at work and we are putting up the money, and the Jews are landing here by the ship-load.

No country except the United States,—not even Russia—has volunteered a home for the Jews. They have been sent to various South American countries and have been turned back. But we are sending our ships for them and their gold, and congress has recently appropriated $50,000,000 for their maintenance.

In defiance of our immigration laws, which are entirely too lax, the President and Madam Secretary Perkins are admitting Jews, without limit, to America. It was reported that 3,000 per day are now being received without restriction, and the balance of them on a six months visit, which means permanency—at least so far as this Administration is concerned. They are evidently coming now at an even faster rate.

The immigration law provides for quotas for all races and nationalities except the Jew; there is no limit as to Jews. The immigration authorities class the Jew as a religion and not a race, with the result that the great majority of the immigrants we are now receiving from all countries are Jews.

They are in fact an alien people with alien characteristics—mental, moral, and physical—which are always the same and remain the same whether they are German, Russian, Spanish, American, or what not. They don't merge in the melting pot or by intermarriage except to bequeath their Jewish characteristics to the offspring. They are as distinct in their characteristics and as undesirable as are the Japanese and Chinese, which we exclude. The Jews should be excluded for we already have too many of them.

America is now the haven and refuge for the Jews of the world. We have more Jews in the United States than there are in England, France, and Palestine combined. If it is true that there are only 15 million Jews in the world then we have about half of the Jewish population of the world for we now have within our borders between seven and eight million Jews.

It is said that in the Constitutional Convention both General Washington and Benjamin Franklin opposed the admission of Jews into America. Robt. E. Edmondson is authority for the following quotation from the diary of Charles Pinckney of South Carolina, a member of that convention. The Jews deny the authenticity of this historical memo but that is characteristic of the Jews. It is their custom to destroy documents of this type and then deny their authenticity. The statement is evidence of the vision and wisdom of Washington and Franklin:

" 'I agree fully with General Washington—that we must protect this young nation from an insidious influence and impenetration. That menace, gentlemen, is the Jew.

" 'In whatever country Jews have settled in any great numbers, they have lowered its moral tone; depreciated its commercial integrity; have segregated themselves and have not been assimilated; have sneered at and tried to undermine the Christian religion upon which that nation is founded by objecting to its restrictions; have built up a state within a state; and when opposed have tried to strangle that country to death financially, as in the case of Spain and Portugal.

" 'For over 1700 years the Jews have been bewailing their sad fate in that they have been exiled from their homeland, as they call Palestine. But, gentlemen, did the world today give it to them in fee simple they would at once find some cogent reason for not returning. Why? Because they are vampires, and vampires do not live on vampires. They cannot live only among themselves. They must subsist on Christians and other peoples not of their race.

" 'If you do not exclude them from these United States, in this Constitution, in less than 200 years they will have swarmed in such great numbers that they will dominate and devour the land, and change our form of government, for which we Americans have shed our blood, given our lives, our substance, and jeopardized our liberty.

" 'If you do not exclude them, in less than 200 years our descendants will be working in the fields to furnish them substance while they will be in the counting houses rubbing their hands. I warn you, gentlemen, if you do not exclude the Jews for all time, your children will curse you in your graves.

" 'Jews, gentlemen, are Asiatic, let them be born where they will, or how many generations they are away from Asia they never will be otherwise. Their ideas do not conform to an American's, and will not even though they live among us ten generations. A leopard cannot change its spots. Jews are Asiatic, are a menace to this country if permitted entrance, and should be excluded by this Constitution.'

"Pinckney is further quoted as saying: 'We were amazed at the words of Mr. Franklin, especially as there are only about 500 Jews in the country. I know Mr. Franklin may be right. In less than 200 years, if we admit them the scoundrels will be calling US their ANCESTORS'."

Every word of the above statement is true. It is a pity they were not heeded.

It is not for us to get excited about Germany's treatment of the Jews. If the German government thinks that they brought about World War I with its frightful consequences to the German people; if they believe that they are responsible for the present war; if they believe the murder of Ernst von Rath was the act of International Jewry; if for these or other reasons they consider the Jews undesirable and wish to fine and expel them,—that is their affair and not ours.

When World War II was declared the Americans in Europe hurried home. About 1500 of them were on the Athenia which was torpedoed and sunk in British waters. The Germans claim that they had no U-boats in that vicinity and that the ship was sunk by the British themselves for the purpose of influencing our government to declare war on Germany,—which Churchill denies.

There was no reason for Germany to sink the ship for it was en route to America, and it had no provisions or war supplies or soldiers on it. There was good reason, however, for the British to sink it because of the American passengers on it—which was the casus helium of our entry into World War I.

We cannot accept Mr. Churchill's statements at par. He is the Jewish-type of politician that only says and does those things that will promote his own purposes. In fact he has publicly stated, boastfully, that he only gives out such information as he thinks it is good for the public to know,—of which he is the exclusive judge.

President Roosevelt sent his envoy, Sumner Welles, abroad for the pretended purpose of sounding out the warring countries and the Pope of Rome on the subject of peace. There was much secrecy attending this mission. It was stated in the press that the President wanted to get first hand information about the situation and about the terms of peace. The real purpose was to effect a truce until we were better prepared for war.

More recently still the President, according to press reports, appealed to Mussolini not to enter the war. We do not know what he said to Mussolini and what Mussolini said in reply further than that he made a courteous reply. It may be that his last note to Mussolini contained a threat in accordance with suggestions of the British press,—that the United States would enter the war if Italy did so.

We do not know the truth. We do know, however, that Mr. Roosevelt is meddling in European affairs to the full extent of his ability, and that he is rendering every possible aid to Britain and is feverishly preparing to join her in the present war.

We know furthermore that Germany is not now threatening us with war and has never done so. Germany has not searched our mails or impounded our ships as have the British. In our whole history Germany has never made a warlike demonstration against this country,—while we have had two wars with Great Britain.

XVI.

PLAN OF MOBILIZATION

"It is only with a despotic ruler that plans can be elaborated extensively and clearly in such a way as to distribute the whole properly among the several parts of the machinery of the State; from this the conclusion is inevitable that a satisfactory form of government for any country is one that concentrates in the hands of one responsible person. Without an absolute despotism there can be no existence for civilization which is carried on not by the masses but by their guide, whosoever that person may be."—From Protocol 2.

We are now preparing for war on a gigantic scale. With an admitted national debt of $45,000,000,000, with the taxpayers taxed to the point that industry is no longer attractive, and with poverty and distress stalking throughout the land, Congress has authorized about 17 billions of dollars for war purposes.

In a speech in the United States Senate on March 6, 1939 (see Congressional Record of that date, page 3224), Senator Lynn Frazier of North Dakota said:

"No one can make me believe that all these war preparations are for defense. In my opinion they are preparations for war, and a foreign war at that. Does anyone know what nations are expected to attack us? Does anyone know who is going to invade our shores? Surely all the great nations of the world have their hands full at home at the present time, and there is no imminent danger of any attacks upon the United States . . .

"We have recently heard about secret conferences and secret sessions here at home. The question naturally arises, Are we ourselves already involved in foreign entanglements and secret treaties? Who knows? If there is anyone who knows, he will not tell, because we have been unable to find out what these secret agreements are, if any, and whether or not we have any."

Surely the members of the United States Senate should be advised of "foreign entanglements" and "secret treaties." The Constitution provides that they must be ratified by the senate. If the President made such commitments he has already assumed the powers of a dictator.

Upon conclusion of the military compact between England and France, England's King and Queen visited the President of France, which visit he later returned. Magnificent receptions of mediaeval splendor were held in both England and France. The King and Queen then came to America, visited President Roosevelt at the White House and also at his Hyde Park residence. These visits, both to Paris and Washington, were evidently arranged by the Jewish administrations of the three countries to effect the triple alliance they were attempting to make in preparation for the war.

It is likely that President Roosevelt is responsible for the Russian invasion of Finland. Soviet Russia sought in advance to obtain from Finland by negotiation, the territory that was taken from Russia by the Treaty of Versailles. This failed upon the advice of the Allies and upon their promises to help Finland in case of war. They no doubt made these promises believing that if Finland was attacked that the United States would come to her aid because Finland alone of all European countries had recognized her obligation to the United States to repay the moneys loaned her. They no doubt made them on assurances that had previously been given by the President.

Although deeply sympathizing with Finland, the people of America were not willing to go to war in her behalf. "Uncle Shylock" has become "gun shy;" he has been worked once too often. If it is true that Finland was made a sacrifice to get us into the war, as appears to be the case, then she is another "Athenia" and another victim of British diplomacy and duplicity.

Senator Frazier said further, in the speech mentioned:

> "There is agitation for the passage of the so-called industrial mobilization bill. According to my information, the bill has not been introduced at this session of the Congress, but it was introduced at the last session, and a great deal was said about it. It was modified somewhat at the last session, and still there is much agitation about it . . .
>
> "This industrial mobilization bill was introduced in the last Congress—it was an administration measure—so that in the event of war the President of the United States would be given the power to draft about 4,000,000 young men for war purposes."

This mobilization plan was gotten up about five years ago by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, which indicates that they have been contemplating war for at least that length of time. Indeed, all of this regimentation of the laborer and the farmer and the industrialist has been priming us for war, and with war as the objective.

The plan has been amended, making it a little less drastic, and in its final form appears in a government document called "Industrial Mobilization Plan, Revised 1936." As soon as war is declared a bill embodying it will be introduced in both houses of Congress and rushed through as an emergency measure under whip and spur of the Administration.

The following are some of its salient provisions:

> "With respect to any product, foodstuff, material, real property, or right declared by him essentially for the national security and defense in the prosecution of war, to fix and establish just and reasonable maximum, minimum, or absolute prices or rates or rentals at which such product, foodstuff, material, commodity, real property, or right may be bought, sold, rented, or otherwise contracted for, whether such transaction be with the Government or between persons of the civilian population or between any other parties whatsoever . . .
>
> *"(i) To regulate, limit, or prohibit the purchase, sale, use, IMPORT, EXPORT, * * * transportation, manufacture, or distribution of any product, foodstuff, material, commodity, real estate, or right;*
>
> " (j) From time to time, whenever he shall find it essential to license the 'production, manufacture, sale, USE, IMPORT, EXPORT, storage, distribution, or transportation of any product, foodstuff, material, commodity, real property, or right . . .
>
> "(1) To requisition and take possession of any product, foodstuff, materials, commodity, real property, or right, and on such terms as he may deem advisable to sell or otherwise dispose of such product, foodstuff, material, commodity, real property, or right . . .
>
> "The power and authority conferred by this title upon the President may be exercised in whole or in part under his direction and during his pleasures by such agencies or offices of the United States as he may designate, and he shall have power to appoint an administrator or administrators to exercise such designated pow- ers. Such administrator or administrators shall receive salary or salaries of $10,000 per annum. The President is authorized to create or provide for such additional agencies of the Government as he may deem necessary to execute the functions authorized under this title, and to appoint and dismiss at pleasure such officers and employees and to fix their salaries and compensation."

"It is," said Congressman Shafer of Michigan, "the most astounding document ever published in a democracy."

If it does not mean a dictatorship, what does it mean? The President is given absolute dictatorial power to conscript the people of America and all of their possessions, which means that this power will be exercised by the bunch of Jews that are now in control of the executive department of our government. It means that our constitutional form of government has been discarded,—not temporarily but permanently.

Barney Baruch or some other Jew will be Chairman of the War Industries Board, and he will not relinquish this post when the war terminates; nor will our President relinquish any of his war powers. There will be no more elections. It will be goodbye to our constitutional form of government, to our state governments, and to our freedom.

It was stated in the press that Bernard Baruch had lunch with the President and had a conference with him regarding the war situation. Baruch was noncommittal after this conference as to whether or not they had discussed the subject of his being appointed chairman of a War Industries Board soon to be created. It is likely that he wants the job and that he will get it in due time.

It is a matter of some surprise to have my conclusions fully confirmed by no less an authority than General Hugh Johnson, the President's former administrator of the N. R. A., and Baruch's former associate. He knows both Roosevelt and Baruch intimately, and his words are entitled to great weight. In a syndicated article in the press of April 18, 1939, he said:

"Freedom of speech and press, the right of assembly and petition and practically every guaranty of the bill of rights would go down automatically . . .

"If war comes soon, the Administration which has advocated these trends, if not these objects, would be continued another term, because of war. Having attained these objects because of war, how many of them would be relinquished at the coming of peace?

"Woodrow Wilson gave up most of his war powers immediately after the Armistice—because he detested them. Would the present Administration give them up, having greatly desired them? Has it ever willingly given up a single extraordinary emergency power since March 4, 1933? It would give up nothing of power . . .

"No matter who wins, the next world war will permanently destroy the democracy of every nation that gets into it. If we want to save democracy for the world, we will keep out of European war."

This is the key that explains the Jew deal, the Roosevelt deflation, and every act of the Roosevelt Administration. Mr. Roosevelt has been "On Our Way" up to now, but when war is declared he will have reached his destination. Congress and the State governments will then be cast aside and our dictators will be handed down to us instead of elected.

Whether our sympathy is with the British or not, we must recognize that the probabilities are that the President will drag us into the war unless Germany wins a quick victory. Even if we escape this war there is cocky little Japan, ready and willing to fight us at any time we want to fight. The Jews are saying that such a war is inevitable. There will undoubtedly be plenty of provocation for it, and if Mr. Roosevelt gets his third term we will soon be up to our necks in war.

All of these elaborate preparations mean war, and war means that Roosevelt will be dictator with Baruch and Morgenthau as his assistants. It means the destruction of our republican form of government and the loss of our liberties. Indeed, it must be admitted that our own morale is at the lowest ebb in our history. Hunger stalks throughout the land, and hunger has no patriotism; the farmer and the laborer have been corrupted by gratuities; the rich are notorious cowards, and the poor are discouraged and beaten. These are the logical and intended consequences of the "Jew Deal."

By act of congress the State Militia (396,000 men) have been drafted into the United States Army. The act requires that they undergo one year of military training, and it authorizes the President to impress them into service at any place in the western hemisphere. These patriotic men enlisted into the State Militia for service in their respective states, and congress is without legal authority to force them into the United States Army in time of peace.

At this time (August 17, 1940) President Roosevelt, the Rothschild- power, and the Jewish press are endeavoring to drive through congress a conscription bill known as the Burke-Wadsworth bill. This measure appears to have been written by one Grenville Clark of the law firm of Root, Clark, Buckner & Ballentine,—Morgan attorneys, and to have been inspired by the Jew, Julius Ochs Adler, general manager of the New York Times.

It appears that on May 23, 1940 the said Morgan attorneys and Henry L. Stimsom (our present Secretary of War and then attorney for Kuhn, Loeb & Co.), Julius Ochs Adler and others held a conference at the Harvard Club in New York City and organized a drive for conscription.

> "On the 3rd day of June they met again. They met to raise money . . . A quarter of a million dollars was raised at one time. Think of that—men raising a quarter of a million dollars to conscript boys in America."[34]

The Record does not show who put up the quarter of a million dollars but it is a safe guess that a substantial part of it was subscribed by the Rothschilds' banks of Morgan & Co., and Kuhn, Loeb & Co. What for? What did they expect to buy with it? Not propaganda, for the Jew press are for conscription and no money was needed to obtain that support. Five thousand dollars would have been more than enough to have covered all legitimate expenses of presenting the bill and the arguments in support of it, to congress. Another $10,000 should have been ample to have paid for the telegrams that they showered upon congressmen.

This $15,000 ought to have covered also the taking of the Gallup poll. This poll showed that 67% of the American people favored conscription,—which is simply preposterous. One of two things is true: either no poll was taken except of the few employees constituting the so-called "Institute of Public Opinion," or else the poll was confined to the Jews.

This Gallup poll is one of the greatest hoaxes that the Jew press has perpetrated upon the American people. It is usually given front page publicity in the "Jewspapers." A poll is taken upon every subject that is of current interest to the public. Nobody knows anything about the voting until the result is announced. Nobody ever received a ballot or heard of anybody who received a ballot. To take a poll of our 131,000,000 American people would require several weeks time and many thousand dollars. Apparently these Gallup polls are taken in 30 minutes time with an expense of less than 30 cents, and the result announced is always as the Jew press desire it to be.

---

[34] From Speech of Senator Holt, Congressional Record, Aug. 6, 1940, p. 15167.

My estimate of $15,000 to cover the legitimate expenses of the conscription drive, plus the Gallup poll, may be a trifle conservative but surely they would not exceed $25,000, which leaves $225,000, for other purposes. What are those purposes?

The corrupt purpose of these conspirators is obvious. I do not know whether they could or did buy any congressional supports hope not. I do not care to comment on the subject further than to say that it is a horrible thing to sell the liberties of 12,000,000 men for $225,000. It is as cheap and as detestable as the betrayal of Christ for thirty pieces of silver; and the money appears to have been furnished in both instances by the Jews.

This amazing revelation was scarcely discussed by the senators. Perhaps they were shocked speechless. It has not yet been denied, despite the fact that our present Secretary of War was one of the conspirators. Senator Minton of Indiana defended the meeting and made a vicious personal attack on Senator Holt. Minton appears to have been supported by Barkley of Kentucky, Pepper of Florida, and Lee of Oklahoma. And thus the matter rests.

The original conscription bill as written by Mr. Clark called for the registration of all men between the ages of 18 and 65, estimated at 42,000,000 men. From this vast number the President was authorized to immediately impress into training and service 4,000,000 men.

The measure was materially modified by the Senate Military Affairs Committee who fixed the age limit at 21 to 31, and the estimated number of men at 12,000,000, all of whom are subject to draft for training and service for a period of ten years. The measure contemplates training 1,000,000 men a year, at an estimated cost of $1,000,000,000.00 per annum for each 1,000,000 men.

We have never had conscription in this country except during brief war periods. All of the requirements for the army and navy in peace-time have been filled by voluntary enlistment. Conscription will never be necessary to repel invasion. It is not necessary now, nor is it legal now.

Canada did not resort to conscription for the first twelve months of the present war. Her very recent conscription measure limits the period of enlistment and training to thirty days instead of twelve months, and Canada is now at war with Germany and we presumptively are not.

Senator Norris, who heretofore has been a consistent supporter of the New Deal, says this of the conscription bill;

> "It will bring about a radical change in the historic course we have taken since the birth of our Nation. As I see it, Mr. President, that change, if it takes place, will inevitably lead us into a realm where we will have what we are complaining about in other nations—a dictatorship. I can see no escape from it. If we are to have compulsory military training in time of peace, we shall put ourselves on a level with the dictator nations of the world."[35]

It is reassuring that so trusting a supporter of the New-Deal as Senator Norris has heretofore been, has finally caught the drift of it. It is precisely for that reason—a dictatorship—that Henry L. Stimson, Frank Knox, Kuhn, Loeb & Co., Morgan & Co., and Julius Ochs Adler are spending their money for conscription.

It is for that reason that the President of the United States has endorsed this bill and in employing the full power of his high office to put it over.

[35] Congressional Record, Aug. 12, 1940, p. 15535.

PART II.

THE SUBJUGATION OF AMERICA

XVII.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

"In order that our scheme may produce this result we shall arrange elections in favor of such presidents as have in their past some dark, undiscovered stain, some "Panama" or other—then they will be trustworthy agents for the accomplishment of our plans out of fear of revelations and from the natural desire of everyone who has attained power, namely, the retention of the privileges, advantages and honor connected with the office of president."—From Protocol 10.

"The way we do things and not merely the way we say things is nearly always the test of our sincerity."-—Roosevelt's Speech, Butte, Mont., April 19, 1937.

There are certain unerring guides to a man's character, viz.: his associates and his work, "the way we do things." Generally speaking, a man is no better than the people he chooses for his companions, ("birds of a feather flock together,") and he should always be judged by what he does. None of us can be judged by our pretensions and our professions, and this is particularly true of politicians.

This chapter will discuss briefly the President and his pals; his work will be discussed in greater detail in later chapters. I do not personally know the President and his intimate associates, but the late Huey P. Long knew them well and intimately. His judgment of men and his estimate of them can be accepted with confidence, for he was fearless and honest, and capable in his appraisements. He was originally a strong Roosevelt man and he is said to have contributed more than any other one man to Roosevelt's first nomination;—indeed, such nomination appears to have been due largely to Mr. Long's support and effort. He often referred to this achievement as one of his greatest mistakes, regretfully saying that he swallowed Mr. Roosevelt with his blarney,—"hook, line and sinker."

He said of the President and his administration that it was but a continuation of the Hoover deflation administration under another name and in a slightly different form; that the difference between them was the difference between "tweedledum and tweedledee" and "low cockalorum and high cockalorum." He stated in an interview that was published throughout the country that President Roosevelt is a "liar and a four flusher" and he challenged an investigation by the United States Senate,—and no one accepted the challenge.

The "kitchen cabinet" is composed of the men behind the scene who actually run the government. The Roosevelt administration up to this hour has been directed by his "kitchen cabinet. No important step has been taken, no important appointment made, no important speech delivered, that has not first had the approval of one or more members of his "kitchen cabinet." They are here stated with their background, in the order of their apparent importance, as follows:

Barney Baruch, Jew; New York stock gambler;
Felix Frankfurter, Jew; New York; Judge U. S. Supreme Court;
Henry Morgenthau, Jew; New York; Secretary of U. S. Treasury;
Sam Roseman, Jew; New York judge; Roosevelt biographer;
Ben Cohen, Jew; New York attorney;
Harry L. Hopkins, New York; non-descript;
—all deflationists, warmongers, and un-American.

Baruch has often been called the assistant to the President. He is the most active and cunning of them all. It was reported that when Roosevelt was first elected Baruch planned to occupy one of the executive offices, but was advised against it; he had, however, just as well be there. Senator Long has furnished us a striking description of him and his methods:

"There is such a thing as a bird flying when he sees you are going to shoot at him. We boys used to go out in the woods and try to get another kind of bird that does :not wait for you to get ready to get a shot at him, but flies before you ever get a gun in your hand. I remember one time when I tried to shoot an old crow that I saw. I was riding along in a buggy and saw the crow on top of an old log off in the field, so I just rode up right behind a thicket so the crow could not see me at all, and reached into my buggy to get the gun to shoot, the crow. Thick as that thicket was, the minute my right hand got back near the gun the old crow flew away. (Laughter.) The minute Brother Barney Baruch saw this thing squiggling he "got his" and got out, and appeared before the committee and, oh, he was a good man, and we have not seen him since. (Laughter.) He stood with the Hoover Administration until it was wrecked, inside and out. Mr. Hoover was flattened out worse than a pancake, and took his crusade over to Palo Alto, Calif., where, under the shade of the umbrellas, and cooled by the breezes wafted by the palms, he could sit and watch the wreckage, as old Nero watched the burning of Rome,—but old Brother Baruch came right on back down to the White House and got hold of another President. "We have Presidents and Presidents, but Baruch goes on forever; and his clique, Baruch and Morgan, have managed to see to it that, notwithstanding the prerogatives and rights that have been granted to them, none have been granted to the two or three million soldiers who saved their hides."—Congressional Record, 75th Congress, p. 7592.

Elder Baruch was chairman of the War Industries Board during the period of World War I, and as such enjoyed the power and the delights and perquisites of being our Industrial Dictator. This rich, slick, wily and ambitious Jew stock-gambler aspires to again be our dictator, with political as well as economic power. He could now be Secretary of the Treasury, according to a press report, but he prefers to let Elder Morgenthau hold that job, and to bide his time for a bigger one. There is reason to believe that he is the political agent of the Rothschilds.

Morgenthau holds the most powerful and important position in the cabinet, viz: Secretary of the Treasury. There is the foreign Viennese Jew, Felix Frankfurter, appointed Justice of the U. S. Supreme Court by Roosevelt. General Hugh Johnson said of him that he is "the most powerful single individual in the United States." He estimated that Frankfurter is "responsible for the appointment of 125 men to key position in the government." The Jew Ben Cohen is one of his nominees. He actually writes the reform bills that are designated as "Administration measures" and that are tendered to Congress with presidential endorsement and usually adopted without material changes.

The President is himself of Jewish extraction. He admits it. It is immaterial whether he is one-fourth or one-half Jew, for the taint of blood is like the "leaven that leaveneth the whole lump." It is a biological fact that the hybrid inherits the characteristics of both breeds,—and Mr. Roosevelt is no exception to that rule.

The mule provides a striking example of the truth of this law of nature. There was never a mule that did not have the long ears and general appearance of the jack. It is said of the mule that he is without "pride of ancestry or hope of posterity." It is impossible to reproduce a race horse from a combination of a scrub with a thoroughbred.

We indulgent Americans do not appreciate the importance of preserving the purity of our race. We think and speak indulgently of the "melting pot" but to the extent we melt and merge with inferior races we deteriorate. No one can imagine that a mulatto or a hybrid China-man would make a good ruler. It is not in the blood and it is impossible. We instinctively regard the mulatto as a Negro, no matter how white he may be in appearance. The hybrid Jew is likewise a Jew and should be so regarded. A celebrated authority says on that subject:

> "Only one of (the great questions of the times) is of causal importance, that is, the question of the racial preservation of the nationality. In the blood alone there rests the strength as well as the weakness of man. As long as the people do not recognize and pay attention to the importance of their racial foundation, they resemble people who would like to teach the greyhound's qualities to poodles, without realizing that the greyhound's speed and the poodle's docility are qualities which are not taught, but are peculiar to the race . . . He who wants to redeem the people from the qualities and the vices which are alien to its original nature will have to redeem it first from the alien originators of these expressions. Without the clearest recognition of the race problem and, with it, of the Jewish question, there will be no rise of the German nation."[36]

Mr. Hitler has resurrected the German nation upon that firm foundation. Even more than that he has redeemed practically all of Europe. He has created a new order that may become world-wide. His achievements would have been impossible upon the basis of Jew government and Jew finance such as we now have.

The Jews and Communists seek to destroy this purity of blood. They preach and practice racial equality. There is never a children's movie that does not have one or more Negro pickaninnies in it. Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt is one of the leaders of the racial equality movement. She has had her picture taken with Negroes, entertains them in her home, and preaches Negro equality.

It was stated in the press that the President is the direct descendant of a Holland Jewish family named Rosenvelt. The President was, of course, not called upon to notice this slander, but he took the opportunity to do so. He said in substance, "What of it? The Jews are as good as anybody else."

It is unusual for a Gentile to admit Jewish blood. There was no reason for him to do so unless the charge was true. This taint of blood explains the President's Jewish companionships and Jewishized Administration. It explains many of his Jewish characteristics:—his bluff and his blarney, his "four-flushing" and his duplicity, and his religious adherence to the program of the "Learned Elders of Zion."

---

[36] "'Mein Kampf," p. 469.

The more important and unanswered question is whether or not he is, in fact, a communist. It will be recalled that Dr. Wirt, a reputable educator, published an interview in which he stated that by invitation he attended a secret meeting of the "brain trusters" in which the subject of "paving the way for a Communist Dictator" was freely and frankly discussed.

This caused a great "tempest in a teapot." The President was at the time on a fishing excursion in Southern seas on the private yacht, Normahal, with his friend Vincent Astor. He was met at the railroad station on his return by practically all of the democratic congressmen as a testimonial of their faith in him.

He made them one of his characteristic speeches in which he chided them with going from "Wirt to Wirt" in his absence. They appointed a Congressional Committee of Investigation, composed of the President's friends, who summoned before them several of the members of this meeting. They, of course, denied everything, the committee reported there was nothing to the charges, and the subject was laughed off. But it now appears from the report of the Dies Committee that there are more than 700 federal employees holding key positions who are members of a "communist front" organization, viz: the League for Peace and Democracy.

In a recent speech* Congressman Martin Dies, Chairman of the Dies Committee, said of this pretentious League:

> "Conceived in Moscow, delivered in Amsterdam, nourished in its infancy in America by the famous French Communist, Henri Barbusse, the American League for Peace and Democracy has from its beginning served the interests of the Soviet Government. It has been the chief "transmission belt" for drawing "innocents" into the united front network of the Communist Party. It has fostered sabotage in our basic and war industries. It was intended to serve as a reserve force for the espionage activities of spies of the Soviet Government in the United States."[37]

And so the brain-trusters, or a considerable number of them, are communists who are seeking to overthrow our government and to establish in place of it a dictatorship. In view of the disclosures of this report, the verdict of the Congressional Committee exonerating these communist office-holders should be reexamined.

[37] Congressional Record, Oct. 31, 1939.

The testimony before that committee was uncontradicted that they did have a meeting and that Dr. Wirt was invited to this meeting and attended it. It was also uncontradicted that they did discuss the subject of dictatorship. The principal difference between Dr. Wirt's testimony and that of the other participants in the meeting who testified was that Dr. Wirt testified that they said that Roosevelt was the "Kerensky" who would pave the way for a real dictator—a Stalin—which they denied. In view of the fact that it is a part of the code of the communists to lie and deceive, (as was found by the Dies Committee) we should accept Dr. Wirt's testimony as true.

Despite the revelations of the Dies Committee we still have at least 680 communists in Washington on the government payroll who are "boring from within" and seeking the destruction of our government, and paving the way for a dictator. By a word President Roosevelt could have them all removed from office, but he has not spoken that word. Why does he tolerate these traitors and their nefarious work? There is and can be but one answer and that is that he is in sympathy with what they are doing. They are there to take over when the occasion arises. This throws some light upon the efforts of the President and his wife to suppress and discredit the work of this committee.

Mrs. Roosevelt is also a very decided "pink" or a red. She withdrew from the D. A. R. because one of its chapters refused the use of its hall to a Negro singer. She made a speech at the convention of one of the communist "front" organizations in Birmingham advocating Negro equality and the repeal of the Jim Crow law. She also defended the Jewish race in the Dec. 31, 1938, issue of "Liberty Magazine," arguing that the Jews are smarter than the Gentiles and that the Gentiles are envious of them and persecutes them for that reason.

Mrs. Roosevelt appeared before the Dies Committee with communist leaders who were summoned as witnesses by the committee and were there for the purpose of giving testimony. This unusual procedure on the part of the "First Lady" was for one of two purposes: either to show her disapproval of the action of the committee and to intimidate them, or else to give the communists the benefit of her sympathy and support, and to encourage them.

Mrs. Roosevelt's maiden name was also Roosevelt, she is the President's cousin as well as his wife, and has the same Jewish blood in her veins. At a recent convention of the National Youth Congress, composed of communists of all ages from youths in their teens to aged men and women, she appeared on the stage with them and entertained many of them as guests at the White House.

The President has been a politician all of the years of his life and has had Jewish support during that entire period of time. By profession he is a lawyer but has never distinguished himself in that capacity. So far as the record reveals, he has never had a client or tried a lawsuit.

For a time Mr. Roosevelt was vice president of a "fly-by-night" insurance company, and for another period of time he was president of United States Investors, Ltd., a swindling syndicate that sold the public worthless Jewish-manipulated German currency. He inherited a fortune that was acquired by his Jewish ancestry, some of whom were money lenders. When out of office he has lived with mamma and been supported by mamma on Granpa Rosenvelt's money. This is a condensed true story of the life of our glamorous, ambitious, warrior President.

XVIII.

THE REDS IN THE SADDLE

"We appear on the scene as alleged saviors of the worker from this oppression when we propose to him to enter the ranks of our fighting forces—Socialists, Anarchists, Communists— to whom we always give support in accordance with an alleged brotherly rule (of the solidarity of all humanity) of our social masonry. The aristocracy, which enjoyed by law the labor of the workers, was interested in seeing that the workers were well fed, healthy and strong. We are interested in just the opposite—in the diminution, the killing out of the Goyim."—From Protocol 3.

There can be no understanding of Communism and Bolshevism without an understanding of the Jewish question, for they emanate from the Jew as truly as does our banking and currency system. Karl Marx and Frederick Engels, the founders of Communism, were both Jews. Communism is an essential part of the program of the "Elders" for the conquest of the world; just as essential as gold. They employ their banking and currency system to create poverty and unrest, and communism to wreck and destroy.

This explains the riddle of the Lamont family. Thos. W. Lamont, a partner of J. P. Morgan & Co., was our representative to the Brussels financial conference that sought to establish the gold standard throughout the world. His son, Corliss Lamont, is an active communist. Both father and son are working for a dictatorship; the father laid the foundation for it, and the son carries on the active work.

I do not mean to imply that all communists are Jews or that all Jews are communists, but I do mean to say that the communist leaders are Jews and the Jew leaders communists. How otherwise can we explain the financing of Lenin and Trotsky by Schiff and Warburg? How otherwise can we explain the "Jew deal" which was concocted by Baruch, Frankfurter, et al., and put over by Roosevelt? Take the Jews and Jew money out of the communist party and you take out its living, propelling force; it would die overnight.

The active campaign to communize America began immediately following the treaty of recognition of Russia. This treaty provided, according to press reports, which may or may not be true, that the Soviets would not attempt to sovietize America, but that meant nothing to them. It is one of their boasted, cardinal principles, that the end sanctifies the means, and that they may lie, steal and murder to accomplish their ends. Prior thereto our government and most of the governments of the world refused to recognize the Russian government because it supports the Third Internationale, a political organization for the propagation of communism. It is this organization which is financing the communist movement in this country, which means that the Russian government is doing so.

This infamous treaty was concluded between two Jewish communists, viz., Franklin D. Roosevelt and Maxim Litvinoff (Finkelstein), for the pretended purpose of trade but for the real purpose of undermining and destroying our republican form of government. It has not materially increased trade, but it has enormously increased communism and crime. Maxim Litvinoff is an avowed, full-blooded Jew, and a red communist; Roosevelt is a hybrid and a pink communist; the difference between them being only one of degree.

Mr. Roosevelt has recently made some important changes in his cabinet. He fired ex-Governor Woodring as Secretary of War because he was opposed to selling our army and navy war equipment to England, and was opposed to our declaring war against Germany. He appointed in his place, Henry L. Stimson of New York, for the reason that he favors our intervention in the war and our rendering every possible aid to England. He also appointed Col. Frank Knox of Illinois as Secretary of the Navy, for the same reason.

The following is Roosevelt's present cabinet, with their Jewish hook-up:

Secretary of State: Cordell Hull, Tennessee; wife, Rosie Mix, Jewess;
Secretary of the Treasury: Henry Morgenthau, New York, Jew;
Secretary of War: Henry L. Stimson, New York, attorney for Kuhn, Loeb & Co. (Rothschild Bank) ;
Secretary of the Navy: Frank Knox, Chicago; publisher Daily News (Rothschild paper);
Secretary of the Interior: Harold F. Ickes, Chicago; member "American Civil Liberties Union" (communistic);
Secretary of Labor: Madam Frances Perkins (nee Wutsky), New York; "pink;" nationality unknown;
Secretary of Commerce: Harry L. Hopkins, New York; "pink;" nondescript.

What a Rothschild aggregation! What a Jewish and pro-Jewish aggregation! What a warmonging aggregation! The cabinet is presumed to represent the people of the United States and to be selected from different sections of the country. Who is represented here except the Jews? And what sections except the cities of New York and Chicago?

What chance is there for us to keep out of the war with these Jews, Jew-in-laws and pro-Jews in charge of our government? The cards are stacked against us. It is not the people of England that they are seeking to rescue, but it is the Jews of Europe. It is not the British Empire they are trying to save, but it is the Jewish Empire they are seeking to preserve and promote. All of this war hysteria, war expenditure, and war taxes are primarily for that purpose.

It is reported that there are 18,000 Jews and many thousand communists holding government positions in Washington. It is not yet quite as bad as it was in Russia before the purge, where it said that 76% of the Jewish population held government jobs. The most outrageous of all the President's appointments was that of the Jew-Communist, Felix Frankfurter, to the Supreme bench. Frankfurter is the reputed author of the N. R. A. and other new deal legislation, and will, of course, as a judge, sustain their validity. Worse than that, he is an active "Elder" and an active member of the "American Civil Liberties Union," a communist organization whose object is to impair and destroy our government.

The United Mine Workers make the following report as to the purposes of the "American Civil Liberties Union":

> "Active among the 'intellectual' classes of the country, and posing as a champion of the 'liberties of speech, press, and assembly,' is the American Civil Liberties Union at New York. This organization is working in harmony and unity with the Communist superstructure in America, engaged in the dissemination of radical utterances and propaganda, and conducting a nationwide campaign for the liberation of Bolshevik agents and disloyal agitators who have been convicted under the war-time laws, or the syndicalist laws of different states, for unpatriotic or revolutionary activities."[38]

This report is fully sustained by the evidence reported by the Dies Committee. Roger Baldwin, the national director of this "Liberties Union," testified that it advocated the overthrow of our government "by force and violence," and "murder and assassination." It appears also from this evidence that both Felix Frankfurter and Harold Ickes are members of it. It also appears that it is allied with and supports the "International Labor Defense Organization" which is the legal department of the Communist Party. (See Report of the Dies Committee, pages 83-86.)

---

[38] Quoted from Senate Doc. 14, 68th Congress, Page 7.

It is this latter organization that defended Mooney, and Sacco and Van Zetti and the murderers of the officers at Gastonia,—Marion, North Carolina, and the Negroes in the Scottsboro case. They were all convicted communist murderers, except the Negroes, who were convicted for the rape of a white woman. These dastardly convicted criminals have been lionized by the Jew press as if they were persecuted heroes.

The President appointed Kamerads Frankfurter and Ickes to two of the highest offices in our government. He must have known when he appointed them that they were communists and advocate the overthrow of our government. If he did not have this knowledge in the beginning he has it now, and he has not called for their resignations. He must have had it in the beginning, for they are his intimate bosom friends and are frequent visitors in his home.

In its report filed Jan. 3, 1940, the Dies Committee reports the following findings:

> *"According to one of the recent minutes of the Washington, D. C, branch of the American League, it was decided to 'set up League committees in the units of Government agencies with our present membership in those agencies as a nucleus.' These nuclei of the League are now formed in more than a score of Government agencies. H. C. Lamberton, chairman of the "Washington branch of the League, testified under oath before the committee that there are 700 Government employees who are members of the American League for Peace and Democracy."

The committee further reports:

> "American League for Peace and Democracy.—The committee finds on the basis of overwhelming and conclusive evidence that the American League for Peace and Democracy is a Communist "front" organization . . .
>
> "These self-styled Social Democrats pledged themselves to work for civil war in their respective countries in the event of another international conflict."[39]

[39] Report 1476, House Representatives, 76th Congress, 3rd Session.

The committee further reports that this organization (American League for Peace and Democracy) is financed by the Communist Party. Thus it appears that this is a militant organization, not for peace but for war; that its real purpose is to promote a revolution to overthrow our government when we become entangled in war, which means that if Mr. Roosevelt inveigles us into World War II that this organization will then get actively to work to overthrow our government.

"There are 700 Government employees . . . in more than a score of Government agencies" who are set and ready to go when the occasion arises and the command is given. If Mr. Roosevelt did not know that these employees were communists and revolutionaries when they were appointed, he knows it now because this official report is available to him and his interest in the subject is such that he has undoubtedly read it.

The President has clandestinely subjected us to the jurisdiction of the "World Court," correctly called "the back door to the League of Nations," despite our refusal to join either the League or the Court. By proclamation issued August 24, 1924, the President accepted membership in the International Labor Organization on behalf of the United States.

This organization is a creature of the League of Nations, composed exclusively of members of the League. One of its purposes is to standardize the hours and wages of labor throughout the world, and its decisions are subject to review only by the world court and not by our Supreme Court.* It can hardly be called a coincidence that John L. Lewis now seeks to carry out in America the mandates of the I. L. O.

The President is now employing the full power of his office to communize the labor organizations of America. He called the officials of the A. F. L. and the C. I. 0. in conference at the White House and told them in substance to get together or else he would find means of forcing them to do so. So far the A. F. L. has bravely refused to yield to this pressure. Jno. P. Frey, a member of this conference, stated in the press that the terms of union offered the A. F. L, by the C. I. O. are precisely those proposed by the communists two years ago.

This is what the Special Committee of Investigation of the United Mine Workers of America said of the program of the Communists:

> "The major points in this revolutionary program of the Communists are:

(1) Overthrow and destruction of the Federal, state, and provincial governments, with the elimination of existing constitutional forms and foundations.

(2) Establishment of a Soviet dictatorship, absolute in its exercise of power, owing allegiance to, and conceding the authority only of the Communist, or Third International, at Moscow, as a "governmental" substitute.

(3) Destruction of all social, economic, and political institutions as they exist at this time.

(4) Seizure of all labor unions through a process of "boring from within' them, and utilizing them as a strategic instrument in fulfillment of their revolutionary designs upon organized and constitutional government." [40]

"The revolutionary leaders in America are making a nation-wide attempt to obtain control of the American Federation of Labor, reorganize the craft unions on the basis of 'one big union' in an industry, and weld them into the central revolutionary agency in America." (Senate Document No. 14, 68th Congress, pages 2 and 6.)

During this long and much publicized controversy between John L. Lewis and Wm. Green, we have heard a great deal about "one big union" and "crafts union"—Lewis' organization being a "one big union" organization and Green's a "crafts union." That is now, and has been from the beginning, the fundamental difference between them. But we did not know that the "one big union" is a communist scheme for sabotaging American institutions and the American government. This report of the United Mine Workers is cited with approval by the Dies Committee.

The Dies report mentioned says this of the C. I. O.

"With the formation of the C. I, O. the principal efforts of the Communists were turned in the direction of that organization . . . The evidence before the committee indicates, however, that the leadership of some 10 or 12 of the constituent unions of the C. I. O.

---

[40] See Government Document No. 874 and Senate Joint Resolution—Congress.

out of a total of some 48 unions is more than tinged with communism. The evidence shows that some of their leaders are either card-holding members of the Communist Party or subservient followers of that party's 'line'."

It is Stalin's plan to overthrow the American government through one huge labor organization. In order to bring this about it is necessary to communize the A. F. L., which he has in the past vainly tried to do. He promoted the C. I. O. as a rival organization, but since it has been unable to absorb the A. F. L., the next best thing is to amalgamate the two, and through "boring from within" to finally communize organized labor.

Is not that also the purpose of the President of the United States? If that is not his purpose then why has he sought to bring about a coalition between two rival labor organizations, not once but repeatedly and persistently? The answer and the only answer is that it is the program of the protocols, of the Third Internationale, and of the Communist party. They seek to create one huge labor organization and to gain control of it, and through it to overthrow our government. Ezra Chase, a communist organizer, testified before the Dies Committee that the Communistic plan for subjugating America was to bring about a general strike in case of war, and thereby to bring about revolution.

And who will be our dictator? Who now, and for the past seven years has been working feverishly to obtain the powers of a dictator? Who has bankrupted our national government and the people of America in order to bring about revolution and dictatorship? None other than the man who arose from a bad dream in the middle of the night to inform the American people that he was not suited for the job of dictator,—when nobody had accused him of it. None other than the man who for the first time in the history of our country now seeks to be elected President for a third term.

XIX.

REPORT OF THE DIES COMMITTEE

"Who and what is in a position to overthrow an invisible force? And this is precisely what our force is. Gentile masonry, blindly serves as a screen for us and our objects, but the plan of action of our force, even its very abiding-place, remains for the whole people an unknown mystery."From Protocol 4.

The House of Representatives appointed a committee to investigate "Un-American activities," known as the Dies Committee. This committee is composed of the following members, viz:

Martin Dies, Chairman, (Texas) ;
Joe Starnes (Alabama) ;
John J. Dempsey (New Mexico) ;
Jerry Voorhis (California) ;
Jas. E. Casey (Massachusetts) ;
N. M. Mason (Illinois) ; and
J. Parnell Thomas (New Jersey).

The first four named are Democrats and the latter three Republicans, but the committee nevertheless filed a unanimous report.

The committee started out by investigating Nazi activities. It appears from their report that there is a "German American Bund" that has some connection with the German government. It states that Fritz Kuhn places the membership at 20,000 to 25,000, but that the Department of Justice estimated it at 6500 in 1937. There is also an "American Italian Black Shirt Legion," about 10,000 strong. While the committee finds that the German Bund "must be classified as an agent of a foreign government" there was no evidence or finding to the effect that it is seeking the overthrow of our government. On the other hand, the purpose of the German Bund appears to be to develop loyalty to both their fatherland and their adopted country.

So long as the committee confined its investigation to Nazi activities everything was fine and lovely, but when it turned to the Communist what a howl went up from the Jewish press and leaders—led by Franklin D. Roosevelt, Harold Ickes, and Madam Perkins. In the beginning it was,

"O noble judge! O excellent young man!
O wise and upright judge!
How much more elder art thou than thy looks!
"Ay, his breast:
So says the bond:—doth it not, noble judge?—
'Nearest his heart:' those are the very words."

But when the committee began to examine the record of the Communists, the President, from his high office, denounced and belittled them; something unprecedented in American history. Why? Answer that to your satisfaction if you still believe in the sincerity of Franklin D. Roosevelt. There is but one answer and that is that the President wanted to suppress the investigation of the Communists and to disparage the report of the committee.

Why should he want to do that? No answer except that he is a Communist and he does not want the truth revealed. He wants the Communists to succeed in their secret, nefarious work. Whatever else may be said of Mr. Roosevelt, he is no fool. He and his Jewish advisers know what they want and how to get it, and they are working adroitly and secretly and relentlessly to accomplish their ends. If the President and Secretary Perkins do not stand for sabotage and communism, why do they so steadfastly refuse to deport the alien red, Bridges, and others of his kind?

Be it said to the everlasting credit of the Dies Committee and the House of Representatives that the committee was not swayed or intimidated by this fulmination of the President, and that the House by an overwhelming majority re-appointed them, and by a vote of 320 to 27 appropriated sufficient funds to continue their work.

I quote from the report of the Dies Committee liberally because the subject is one of such vital importance to us all:

"We have shown that communism is a world-wide revolutionary movement aiming ultimately at the setting up of a world union of soviet socialist republics. This is a proposition which is beyond dispute. It is substantiated by voluminous literature of the Communists themselves . . .

"The Communist code of ethics not only permits, but actually glorifies as virtuous, such immoralities as perjury, destruction of property, the beating and maiming of workers who refuse to follow the dictates of the Communists, shootings, stabbings, kidnappings, and bombings. It is even a matter of boasting among Communists that Stalin robbed banks in the days before the Communist regime was set up in Russia.

"To summarize: The Communist code of ethics is based upon the principle that the ends of revolution justify any means, no matter how lawless, violent, dishonest, or indecent from the standpoint of accepted American standards of morality."[41]

How familiar this sounds. This is the cruel, diabolical code of the "Elders" called the "Protocols." They represent the same plan for subjugating peoples and governments, and establishing their kingdom of the elders. They both originated in distorted Asiatic minds and are both founded upon the philosophy of the Talmud.[42]

The committee summarized their findings in part as follows:

"Whereas it once employed the frank slogan of "the Defense of the Soviet Union," it works today to embroil this country in a foreign war by the propagation of the doctrine of 'collective security.'

"It seeks ultimately the overthrow of the American form of government as established by the Constitution of the United States.

"It aims to set up a dictatorship of the proletariat in this country, notwithstanding its present tactical silence on this fundamental tenet of communism . . .

"It hides behind civil liberties in pursuing ends which will destroy civil liberties for all but the ruling few of the proletarian dictatorship . . .

"It stifles the creative impulses of the individual by its deadening regimentation . . .

"It seeks to sabotage and cripple our economy on every possible front, with a view to its profiting by the resulting economic crises . . .

---

[41] House Report No. 2, 76th Congress, 1st Session, pages 26 and 29.

[42] See "The Talmud Unmasked," by Col. E. N. Sanctuary.

"It has penetrated the Government itself, with the result that some Communists hold hey positions in Federal agencies and projects . . .

"It aims to incite race war by its special agitation among the Negro population of this country . . .

"It seeks to silence all hostile criticism by charging its critics with red-baiting, while, at the same time, it viciously baits those who dare oppose it . . .

"It dangles the promise of economic security before the victims of economic distress, offering them a new slavery in the name of emancipation."[43]

That is precisely what the New Deal is now doing.

The findings read like a chapter taken from the protocols. They have the same philosophy, the same objective, and advocate the-same methods as set out in the protocols. They represent the plan of the Elders and the "Jew deal," and of the present Jew administration for the destruction of our government in order to pave the way for their soviet dictatorship. The committee in fact finds that it is the purpose of the communists to "overthrow the American form of government . . . in order to establish a dictatorship of the proletariat."

This Jew-deal "stifles the creative impulse of the individual by its deadly regimentation." It "seeks to sabotage our economy" by maintaining deflation. Through its Resettlement Administration it has organized "the Negro population" and is seeking to communize them and "promote race hatred." It "seeks to silence hostile criticism by charging its critics with red baiting while at the same time it viciously baits those who dare oppose it."

This Jew-deal administration has knowingly employed 700 communists in "key positions in federal agencies," paying them salaries of from $1200 to $7500 per annum because they are communists and for the purpose of communizing our government. In spite of the exposure of the Dies Committee, all of them, except twenty who resigned, are still at work "boring from within" and ready to take over at the appointed hour.

---

[43] House Report No. 2, 76th Congress, 1st Session; pages 118-119.

The number of communists in the United States is variously estimated at from two to ten million. This report of the Dies Committee and the previous report of the Committee reveal the fact that the communists have many organizations under high-sounding and attractive names, in addition to the Communist Party which is avowedly communistic; that all of these organizations are abundantly supplied with money for their work, the greater part of which is furnished by Moscow.

It is reported that there are now 80 times as many communists in America as there were in Russia when the Russian government was overthrown, and three and one-half times more than there are in Russia today; that they have in the United States 800 national organizations with thousands of branches having an estimated membership of 6,500,000; that they have 600 newspapers and magazines printed in all languages and circulated regularly in the United States; that they own publishing houses, book stores, film laboratories and theatres, etc., that they maintain 200 national so-called cultural movements, 62 national communist youth movements and 33 national so-called defense movements; and that they spend an estimated $10,000,000 annually in the United States to promote civil war.[44]

In view of this menace to our country, it detracts from the report of the Dies Committee for it to devote several pages to a discussion of the German Bund and to classify this Bund with the communists. Even if it has 25,000 members, and even if they are actively at work (and the report of the committee does not disclose it) they are a mere bagatelle as compared with the activities of the communists. It is the contention of the Bund leaders that they are combating communism and that that is the purpose of their organization.

Undoubtedly George Deatheridge, Robt. E. Edmondson, James True, General George Van Horn Mosely, Col. E. N. Sanctuary, Gerald B. Winrod, Win. Dudley Pelley, and Chas. B. Hudson are fighting communism. They are not racketeers, as the committee intimates; they are not "selling religious and racial hatred," as the committee states. It does not add to the dignity and weight of this report for the committee to go out of its way to besmear these patriots who are endeavoring to render a service to their country in its hour of great peril.

General George Van Horn Mosely submitted a strong statement to the committes in which he showed conclusively that this communism that now confronts us and which the committee so clearly portrays and forcefully condemns is of Jewish origin and is financed and promoted by Jews. The committee knows that this is true but they refused to accept General Mosely's carefully prepared and truthful statement to that effect. In their two reports there is not a word that reveals the real authors of the deviltry that they condemn. Why? It is because of the "invisible power and its abiding-place."

[44] See Report of Walter S. Steele, of the National Republic, Washington, D. C.

I do not wish to detract in the least from the committee's very able report. They have honestly and courageously revealed a threatening situation that we did not know existed. In passing judgment upon their work we should take into consideration the invisible power that rules our country and our government. Already this power has publicly threatened to contribute $250,000 to defeat Martin Dies, chairman of the committee, in his present race for re-election. This invisible force "whose abiding place is unknown" has the power to defeat any member of this committee for office, and the power to elect a president of the United States.

This power is manifested in the effort of President Roosevelt to suppress the work of the Dies Committee, in the propaganda of the press and radio to drag us into war, and the distress and poverty that pervades the land. Its "abiding place" has been in Paris, France, and in the directing head of the Rothschild fortune, to-wit: Jeroboam Rothschild alias Georges Mandel. All of this pernicious activity by many agencies to subvert our government, in the final analysis reaches back to that head.

No foreigner should be admitted to citizenship or to hold office, whether Jew or Gentile. We, the American people are the "chosen people," and not the Jews and the foreigners. We are capable of running our own government in our own way without their help; and they are not capable of doing so. They have not had the necessary training, and a few years of residency here does not imbue them with our spirit of morality and government. They cannot be changed over night by merely taking the oath of allegiance.

We should classify the Jews as a race and bar them from entering the United States. We have barred other Asiatics,—Japanese, Chinese, etc. Why not the Jews? They are less desirable than the Chinese and Japanese because they are shrewder, more destructive, and their goal is to fleece us and to destroy our government. All Jews who have migrated here since 1914 should be deported, together with their progeny.

The foreigners have polluted our citizenship and our government. They are our communists and our gangsters. They are the authors and promoters of the new deal.

The effect would be to relieve us of Mr. Justice Felix Frankfurter, the author of the N. R. A., etc.; Congressman Sabath, chairman of the powerful Rules Committee of the House; Congressman Dickstein, chairman of the Immigration Committee; Congressman Sol Bloom, Chairman of the House Foreign Relations Committee, and many other foreign-born officials holding key positions, that we can very well spare.

XX.

CORRUPTION, EVERYWHERE CORRUPTION

> "We shall create an intensified centralization of government in order to grip in our hands all the forces of the community. We shall regulate mechanically all the actions of the political life of our subjects by new laws. These laws will withdraw one by one all the indulgences and liberties which have been permitted by the goyim, and our kingdom will be distinguished by a despotism of such magnificent proportions as to be at any moment and in every place in a position to wipe out any goyim who oppose us by deed or word."—From Protocol 5.

Tammany Hall is not the good old Irish Catholic organization that it used to be. Corrupt as it has always been reputed to be, it is infinitely worse now. There was some limit to its graft, even in the days of Boss Tweed, but there is none now.

Jno. J. Hines, recently convicted of graft, was the dispenser of relief funds for the Roosevelt regime in New York City. He was an appropriate and an artistic administrator of these funds. The corruption was so foul and rotten that it appears to have turned the stomach of even so tough a politician and so loyal a friend as Jim Farley.

It is the philosophy of the Roosevelt regime to "tax, tax, tax, and spend, spend and spend, and elect, elect and elect." According to the press reports Harry Hopkins, our former relief administrator and present Secretary of Commerce, actually boasted of it,—which he of course denied. Whenever they make a slip and give us a glimpse of what they propose to do to us it is always a "damned lie" or a "deliberate lie."

Everywhere it is bribery and corruption. Senator Tobey, in a speech in the United States Senate, said:

> "Shame on the American people! There is something the matter with us today. Are there any strings on us? Are we still free men? If so, we should cry out, 'Unclean! Unclean!' and determine that so far as lies within our power we will put the bars up against a repetition or recurrence of such practices."

Never before this regime have we had anything like it. We have never before had a President whose family personally profited or sought to profit through his prestige and power. The Roosevelt family are "out for the dough." They appear to be content for the balance of us to be poor, but for themselves they prefer "the fleshpots of Egypt."

The Saturday Evening Post (before the Jews bought it) published a series of articles revealing Col. Jimmy Roosevelt's enormous profits from the insurance firm of Sargent & Roosevelt. Insurance is a favorite method of graft because it is semi legitimate, easily concealed, and the "picking" is rich. A suit was filed by a firm of insurance brokers against a Boston bank for $25,000 for insurance premiums, alleging that they were entitled to these premiums and that the bank had diverted them corruptly to Roosevelt & Sargent in order to obtain favors from the Roosevelt administration.

The above quotation from Senator Tobey was about insurance that a shipbuilding company had been forced to place with the son of a powerful Washington official, without naming the father or the son. If it was not Jimmy there must be others in the same game, but the probability is that it was Jimmy.

Shortly before or after this exposure by the Saturday Evening Post, Jimmy was made secretary to the President and a Colonel in the Marines. The latter position is a sinecure since he performs no service, but it carries a salary of $10,000,—a rather generous gift from Dad, of the despised taxpayers money.

Jimmy held the position of secretary to the President only a short time when he resigned to become associated in some capacity with Samuel Goldwyn of the movies. (It is a matter of conjecture whether he resigned his position as Colonel of the Marines with its $10,000 salary.) The press reported that this change was made because of the affection recently developed between the Jew, Sam Goldwyn, and Colonel Jimmy. It appears to have been a case of love at first sight.

It has since developed that indictments were pending against Sam Goldwyn and others for violation of the anti-trust laws, and that Jimmy was made a defendant in these bills of indictment. Does anyone imagine for a moment that Jimmy will be prosecuted, convicted and punished? How can he be released without releasing the others? These slick Jews don't pay big salaries from love and affection; it is always quid pro quo with them. But Jimmy proved a disappointment. He did not get the anti-trust suit dismissed and the love match is over. Some coarse grained observer unfeelingly said that when Sam discovered that Jimmy was not president of the United States he fired him. Jimmy is now a producer on his own, or with his mother.

The Associated Press carried a story on August 6, 1940, that Jimmy and his mother (Eleanor) have been sued by the estate of Ernest Tollor (a notorious Jew communist who committed suicide) for using the play "Pastor Hall" without paying for the privilege. The play is an anti-Nazi propaganda play. It is evidently being produced for the purpose of promoting war hysteria and incidentally to realize a little coin in the operation, or vice versa.

When Col. Jimmy went with Sam he resigned his position with Sargent & Roosevelt; and his mother, Eleanor, was elected a director in his place; the business was too profitable to allow it to get out of the family. Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt is writing a daily column for the press under the caption "My Day,"—and surely it is her day and also that of her family. It is a profitable day and they are all "making hay while the sun shines." She is periodically advertising a cosmetic over the radio. From these activities she is receiving large emoluments;—not by virtue of her ability, for she is mediocre, but because she is the wife of the President of the United States.

The President's second son, Elliot Roosevelt, made a deal with the Russian Government to sell the soviet 50 Douglas military planes, from which he received or was to receive a commission of $500,000. Mr. Fokker, in testifying before the senate committee investigating the munitions industry, explained that he thought the price excessive but that he had been persuaded by Elliot and his associate Mr. Stratton, that Elliot had enough influence with the Export-Import Bank and the Russian Purchasing Commission to swing the deal.[45]

The Roosevelt family is thrifty people; they overlook no opportunities. It is in the blood. The New Deal regime is rotten from top to bottom and from, center to circumference. It is an alien regime;-—alien to our code of morality, to our system of government, and to the spirit of our institutions. It is a typical Jewish Administration.

It is reported that when the President visited Brazil in November, 1936, he made a speech in which he said:

> "I am leaving you tonight with great regret. There is one thing, however, that I shall remember, and that is that it was two people who invented the New Deal—the President of Brazil and the Pres- ident of the United States."—From Congressional Record, March 17, 1939, p. 4805.

[45] See Speech of Congressman J. C. Shafer of Michigan; Congressional Record, Nov. 1, 1939.

No, the Presidents of the United States and Brazil did not "invent the new deal" as Mr. Roosevelt boastfully says. It was handed to both of them by International Jewry, the "learned Elders of Zion." To Mr. Roosevelt through Elders Baruch and Frankfurter, and to Mr. Vargas through other Elders.

The President of Brazil was elected as a liberal. Soon after his election he overthrew the constitutional government of Brazil and assumed the role of a dictator. It was a mere "push over."

Two kindred spirits with the same plan and the same objective. The difference between them is that Vargas has got there and Mr. Roosevelt is still "On Our Way." We can well imagine what would have happened if the President had succeeded in his "purge" campaign; and it will happen anyway, if he is elected for a third term.

I fully endorse the sentiments expressed in the following anonymous verses:

"An applicant stood at the gates of hell,
And the devil himself had answered the bell.
He looked him over from head to toe
And said: "My friend, I'd like to know
What you have done in the line of sin to entitle you to reside herein.'

"Then Hyde-Park D., with his kosher guile,
Stepped forth and flashed his toothy smile.
'When I took charge in Thirty-three,
A nation's fate was mine,' said he.
'I promised this, I promised that,
Then calmed 'em down with a fireside chat.

" 'I spent their money on fishing trips,
And fished from the decks of their battleships.
I gave them jobs on the W. P. A.,
Then I raised their taxes and took it away,
I bossed their wages and closed their shops,
I killed their pigs and burned their crops.

" 'I double-crossed both old and young,
And still the goofs my praises sung.
I brought back beer, and what do you think?
I taxed it so high that they couldn't drink.
I supplied them cash with government loans;
When they missed a payment, I took their homes.

" 'When I wanted to punish the folks, you know,
I'd put my She on the radio.
I paid them to let their farms lie still,
And imported food-stuffs from Brazil.
I curtailed crops when I felt real mean,
And shipped in beef from the Argentine.

" 'My workers worked with the speed of snails,
While taxpayers chewed their fingernails.
When the Red-Jew mobsters needed dough,
I closed up plants for the C. I. O.
I ruined jobs by my New Deal stealth
And put the screws on rich men's wealth!'

"Now Hyde-Park talked both long and loud,
While the devil stood and his head he bowed.
At last he said: 'Let's make it clear,
You'll have to go—you can't stay here.
For once you mingled with my mob,
I'd have to look for another job!"

Mr. Roosevelt has built on his Hyde Park estate in New York a mausoleum or sanctuary in which all of his personal papers will be stored and his remains interred, and which will be open to the public. Evidently he anticipates that he will be worshipped as the founder or a new order and that there will be pilgrimages to his tomb, as there are to Lenin's. "Vanity, vanity, all is vanity" and conceit. In the language of Puck: "O what fools these mortals be!"

We are now suffering from a transitional period when the Jews are attempting to create an "intensified centralization of government," and to "regulate mechanically all the actions of the political life by new laws." They are seeking to bring this change about by lies and corruption. Everything they propose is explained with a lie and often sugar-coated with corruption.

The most dastardly form of this corruption is that of the youth of the land. Rabbi Reichhorn said in his oration to the Jews:

"But above all let us monopolize Education. By this means we spread ideas that are useful to us, and shape the children's brains as suits us."[46]

When the Learned Elders came to write out their plan of conquest, for their own instruction and guidance, they said on that subject:

"We have got our hands . . . into education as being the corner-stone of a free existence. We have fooled, bemused and corrupted the youth of the goyim by rearing them in principles and theories which are known to us to be false, although it is by us that they have been inculcated."[47]

It is a fact of common knowledge that Jews and reds now occupy many of the chairs in our colleges and universities. They appear to specialize on the chair of Political Economy where the students are taught to believe in the infamous gold standard. Many of our leading institutions of learning are now properly regarded as hot-beds of communism.

Our fine inexperienced young men and women, eager for knowledge, receive and absorb this insidious poison and their minds and characters are warped by it. These false political and financial theories are all a part of their plan for the subjugation of the people of the world. It was the plan pursued in Germany, even in the age of Disraeli, which culminated in World War I and finally World War II. Sidonia (Rothschild) then observed that most of the "professorial chairs are now in our (Jew) hands" and that the result would be revolution and war. That situation prevails here today.

[46] See Appendix II.

[47] From Protocol 9.

XXI.

FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM

"The present issue of money in general does not correspond with the requirements per head, and cannot therefore satisfy all the needs of the workers. The issue of money ought to correspond with the growth of population and thereby children also must absolutely be reckoned as consumers of currency from the day of their birth. The revision of issue is a material question for the whole world."—From Protocol 20.

The expansion and contraction of currency and credit is the method of the Elders for absorbing the wealth of the world, and it is the surest and quickest plan. Compound interest would eventually do so except for the increasing supply of the precious metals and increasing wealth. This method, as certain as it is, is too slow for the "learned," greedy, and ambitious Elders. By expansion and contraction of currency and credit the rich are always made richer and the poor are made poorer; and the possessions of the weak are acquired by the strong, and thus great wealth and great poverty are created.

Obviously, a country cannot be subjected to currency and credit manipulation that has a sufficient quantity of money or currency in circulation, for credit is directly dependent on the quantity of money in circulation;—the more money the greater the basis of credit; the less money the less the basis of credit. Credit is, of course, dependent upon the will of both the man who seeks the credit and the one who extends it, but it will not be sought or extended if there is thought to be an inadequate volume of money for its redemption. It is essential in order to control at will the expansion and contraction of credit that there be some supreme authority with the power to increase or decrease at will the volume of money in circulation.

Prior to the regime of the Rothschilds this power resided in the kings and emperors of the world, for they were then the supreme authority. In our country our National Constitution vested this power in the Congress of the United States. At the time of the adoption of our National Constitution state banks issued their currency notes payable in gold and silver which circulated as currency, and this system continued until after the Civil War. This state bank currency added materially to the volume of money in circulation and to the stability of credit and of values. Since the Civil War and until recently National banks issued their currency notes, based upon United States bonds and redeemable by the national government, which circulated as currency and which contributed materially to the supply of money and the stability of credit and of values.

Under the Rothschild influence the banking systems of the world were all radically changed. The supreme authority to issue money, as well as to extend credit, was transferred by the various governments to the bankers of their respective countries. The Bank of England became the model for other central banks of the world.

At the time of the establishment of the Federal Reserve System our government was the only one of any consequence that even pretended to exercise its sovereign right to issue and control the volume of money in circulation. The establishment of the Federal Reserve System operated as a complete surrender to the banking fraternity of the sovereign power of the American people to regulate values through their congressional representatives, as guaranteed to them by their national constitution.

The panic of 1907 was, like all of our other panics, a manipulated one. It was brought about by the refusal of the reserve banks of New York to pay currency to their country bank depositors, which in turn made it necessary for these banks to refuse to pay their depositors in currency. It was therefore due primarily to an insufficient quantity of currency in circulation and an inadequate method of increasing the supply.

There was universal demand for a change of the system and for an adequate volume of money to meet the demands of commerce. Congress appointed a committee, called the Monetary Commission, with Senator Nelson W. Aldrich of Rhode Island as chairman, to study the banking systems of the world and to report its findings. This committee made one or more trips to Europe and some two years after its appointment filed an exhaustive report of more than four thousand pages, which was never read by anybody. In the meantime the bankers and the various commercial bodies and the farmers and the laborers in their conventions, and the politicians and the press were all with one voice demanding a banking and currency system that would make future panics and depressions impossible.

The keynote of President Wilson's campaign for the presidency in 1912 was the reform of our banking and currency system and he was elected upon that issue. Immediately after his election he submitted that subject to Congress in a very strong message, pointing out the inadequacy of the existing system and the necessity for a system that would provide an adequate supply of currency and credit to meet the demands of industry and commerce and that would insure the full employment of labor, and high prices and wages. His message and his campaign speeches all indicated that he had a keen understanding of the money question and that he desired to establish a system that would afford an adequate volume of money and credit, and would sustain high prices and wages.

There then followed a great struggle, feigned or real, between the big city bankers and the Administration. The bankers sought to establish a central bank with power to control currency and credit and with themselves in control of the bank. They threatened that if this was not done that they would denationalize and would have nothing whatever to do with the system. The Administration apparently sought to reserve to the government its sovereign power to issue money and to establish a decentralized banking system to supply credit. The question of the conditions under which new currency would be issued and whether or not the currency note should be a bank note or a government note were important issues in the struggle.

The original Federal Reserve Act emerged as a result of this controversy. The big banks without a single exception were satisfied and accepted this system. President Wilson and Secretary McAdoo were apparently satisfied with it. President Wilson said of it, that it was a charter of freedom to commerce and industry and that men could go forward with their undertakings with assurance and without fear that their possessions would be taken from them by the contraction of currency and credit.

In the midst of this campaign for the reform of our banking and currency system Paul Warburg, a German Jew, migrated from Frankfort-on-Main, the original home of the Rothschilds, to America. He was at the time a member of the Rothschild banking firm in Frankfort-on-Main and he became a member of Kuhn, Loeb & Company in New York, the American branch of the Rothschilds, upon his arrival here. The following is the Naval Secret Service report on him in December, 1918:

> "Warburg, Paul, New York City, German; was naturalized an American citizen 1911, was decorated 1912 by the Kaiser; was vice-chairman of United States Federal Reserve Board; is a wealthy and influential banker; handled large sums furnished by Germany for Lenin and Trotsky; subject has a brother who is leader of the espionage system (of Germany)."

The brother here mentioned was Felix, who afterward migrated here and was a member of Kuhn, Loeb & Co., and Chief of the American Elders. Soon after his arrival in New York Paul Warburg called in conference the leading New York bankers and submitted to them a plan for the reform of our banking and currency system, which they enthusiastically endorsed. It was then submitted to the Aldrich Monetary Commission and approved by the commission, despite the fact that they had spent two years of study and filed a four thousand page report on the subject. It was in its essential features the charter of the Bank of England. The Aldrich Monetary Commission submitted this plan to Congress in the form of a bill known as the Aldrich Bill.

The Democrats immediately arrayed themselves solidly against it. There was great opposition to it throughout the land, because it was openly and brazenly a centralized banking system that vested the bankers with the sovereign power to issue and control the volume of money, and because also of our very sad experience with the First and Second Banks of the United States. Upon this issue primarily the Republican Party was defeated and President Wilson and the Congressional Democratic candidates elected.

It thereupon became necessary to revise and rewrite the Aldrich Bill and to at least camouflage it in order to make it acceptable to the country. Frank A. Vanderlip, then President of the National City Bank, gives an account of this revision in his memoirs. It appears therefrom that he and Henry Davison of J. P. Morgan & Company, and Paul Warburg of Kuhn, Loeb & Company held a secret conference on Jekyll Island (how appropriate the name) near Savannah, Georgia, and that they then and there rewrote the bill conforming it in appearance to the requirements of President Wilson and the Democratic Party, but preserving the substance of the Aldrich Bill.

The honor, such as it is, for this iniquitous bill is claimed by many people. The Republicans claim it because it was in fact the Aldrich Bill in disguise, and the Democrats because it was in fact endorsed and adopted by a Democratic Administration. Carter Glass claims it because he was then Chairman of the House Banking and Currency Committee and it bore in part his name. Paul Warburg claimed it because it was in fact his baby and he acknowledged it as such. He supplied the frame work of it, which was colored and mildly altered by Vanderlip and Davison. But President Wilson and McAdoo and Glass had practically nothing to do with it except to pilot it through Congress.

The Federal Reserve System is the product of the Rothschilds and its adoption was secured in the same underground, deceptive manner that they always employ to obtain their objectives. Paul Warburg evidently came to America to reform our banking and currency system and evidently he and the Rothschild interest then anticipated the world war, although it did not come about until some three years later.

They, of course, knew that such war would necessarily produce great expansion of currency and credit and of values and that money would be cheapened accordingly and that a "killing" could be made by contracting it. They also knew that America as the producer and seller of food and war materials would receive vast quantities of gold in payment for them. They also knew that under our financial system as it then existed this great influx of gold would enormously increase our volume of money and basis of credit, that money would be correspondingly cheapened and values increased and that great and permanent prosperity in America would be the inevitable result, and that this inflation and prosperity would likely extend to all other countries. It was, therefore, necessary to their plans to sterilize this gold and to put the American banking and currency system on a credit basis and to bring it under their own control.

This is the sordid story of the greatest disaster that ever befell the American people. We then surrendered to Jeroboam Rothschild and his successors, complete dominion over our currency and credit, over prices and wages, and over our welfare and happiness. Prior thereto he had great influence through his Morgan & Co., and Kuhn, Loeb & Co., banks and their subsidiaries and affiliates, but now his authority is made supreme and unlimited. This surrender perfected his control over the economy of all the people of the world.

XXII.

DEFLATIONS OF 1920 AND 1930

"Economic crises have been produced by us for the goyim by no other means than the withdrawal of money from circulation. Huge capitals have stagnated, withdrawing money from States, which were constantly obliged to apply to those same stagnant capitals for loans. These loans burdened the finances of the State with the payment of interest and made them the bond-slaves of these capitals . . . The concentration of industry in the hands of capitalists out of the hands of small masters has drained away all of the juices of the peoples and with them also of the states."— From Protocol 20.

The language and the phrases of the original Federal Reserve act were so obscure and ambiguous, that President Wilson and Congress may have been deceived into believing that it was in fact what it pretended to be. It may be that the President accepted it as being in his judgment an improvement over the then existing system and as being the best bill he could then get. It may be that he expected to later perfect it by amendment and to make it the reliable servant of commerce and industry and of the people, and not their tyrannical master.

If such was the President's purpose it has operated "the other way around." It has been perfected, it is true, but it has been perfected as a central bank with the sovereign power in the "Federal Reserve Board" to "issue money and control the value thereof" in plain violation of our National Constitution.

Every perfecting amendment that the Elders have wanted has been adopted by a complaisant Congress until it now has infinitely more power than either the First or Second Banks of the United States ever had and more than the Aldrich Bill proposed, and it has abused such power shamefully and to the irreparable injury of the American people. Senator Glass may be entitled to credit for these perfecting amendments though they bear the earmarks of the Rothschilds. It is he who has sponsored and piloted them through the United States Senate and through Congress.

Upon the adoption of the bill President Wilson appointed Paul Warburg as deputy governor and a few months later as governor of the system. He held that position until 1919 when he resigned and his assistant, W. P. G. Harding, was made governor. In the meantime William G. McAdoo had resigned his position as Secretary of the Treasury and David Houston, Secretary of Agriculture, had been appointed Secretary of the Treasury. In the meantime, also, Barney Baruch had supplanted Edward M. House as President Wilson's confidential adviser. This was the set-up when the deflation of 1920 was decreed.

It was a great shock to the bankers of the country when they found that they could not discount their "eligible" notes and bills at the Federal Reserve Banks. It had been proclaimed throughout the length and breadth of the land that agricultural and commercial notes could, by the endorsement and guaranty of member banks, be converted into currency ad libitum. The banks and the people were importuned by the treasury department and other government authorities to buy government bonds and to produce food in order to help win the war, and consequently the people had borrowed liberally and the banks had extended credit liberally, believing that the Federal Reserve System would extend credit if needed.

Then without previous warning the Federal Reserve management arbitrarily refused to extend credit to the member banks that served the commercial and agricultural interests of the country. The Federal Reserve authorities at first denied responsibility, claiming that the deflation was a natural reaction from high prices and wages that it originated in Japan, etc. After the publication of the minutes of the secret conference of May 15, 1920, of the Federal Advisory Council, Federal Reserve Board and the Governors of the Federal Reserve Banks, they then admitted that the job was theirs and admitted also that it was a mistake.

These minutes, which they thought no one could ever dig up, set out in detail what they proposed to do, the manner of doing it and the reasons therefore. They said in substance that the "vicious circle of increasing prices and wages must be checked;" that people were extravagant and that this must be corrected; and strange as it may now sound they said also that people were not working hard enough and not producing enough goods to meet the demands of the world!

They proposed to correct all of these things by refusing to issue currency and extend credit. Of seventy bankers, who attended this conference, only two voted against this unjust, illegal and destructive program, which demonstrates, if demonstration Is necessary, how unwise it is to invest an interested class, even as intelligent and righteous as the bankers profess to be, with the sovereign power to fix and regulate values and the prosperity of the country. No doubt some of the bankers who voted for this program suffered grievously as a consequence of it.

There followed one of the most destructive panics and depressions this country has even known. The borrowers who had extended their borrowings to meet the demands of their government, and the banks that extended credit most liberally for the same purpose, suffered most. Many of them became bankrupt and many of them, both borrowers and lenders, died by suicide and despondency and disease as a result thereof. Even government bonds were depreciated to such an extent that the original owners lost them and the banks that took them under foreclosure lost money on them.

The national wealth was estimated prior to this depression at from 500 to 600 billion, afterward at from 250 to 300 billion. This meant a general reduction in values of from 200 to 300 billion dollars. This huge sum is more than the expenses of our National Government, including all of its wars, from its establishment up to 1914.

With such terrible consequences and with proven and admitted responsibility for them it is difficult to believe that Congress would do nothing about it. But strange as it may seem no serious effort has ever been made to curtail the power that brought such disaster upon the country. On the other hand, it has been enlarged and amplified and legalized, as far as Congress can do so, by perfecting amendments;—always sponsored by Carter Glass.

It was, of course, necessary for the Federal Reserve banks to loosen up in order to prevent a debacle, with the result that there was considerable recovery in 1927, 1928 and 1929, and with the result also that there was considerable speculation in 1929 in anticipation of still further recovery. For the pretended purpose of checking this speculation the Federal Reserve management again decreed deflation, which they brought about in 1930 in precisely the same manner as in 1920, viz: by the contraction of currency and credit.

They made no "bones" about it this trip; it was done openly and above board and they have never denied it, Congress having condoned the crime once it was assumed it would do so again. And Congress not only condoned both crimes but it has legalized the methods employed; and not only that, it has granted an indefinite charter to the system and has given it additional power to deflate.

The 1930 deflation was a reproduction of 1920 with substantially the same results. Our national wealth which had increased during the ten years intervening to about 400 billion dollars was reduced 40 to 50 per cent. It bankrupted many men and many banks that had survived the depression of 1920 and many younger men who were in the midst of establishing themselves ; it transferred the property of the debtor to the creditor; it operated with the greatest severity on the farmer and the laborer and their families; it reduced the value of farm products below the cost of production, in consequence of which many farmers lost their homes and means of living; it closed factories, and thereby about twelve million laborers lost their jobs and means of living and many of them lost their homes and became public charges.

Both of these depressions were far more serious in their results than the short lived manipulated panic of 1907. The panic of 1907 was over almost as soon as the banks resumed their ordinary function of paying the checks of their depositors in currency. At that time it was beyond the control of the Elders to force a substantially lower level of values because our banking system was then on a currency basis and not wholly on a credit basis as it was in 1920 and in 1930 and is now.

Organized ostensibly to supply an adequate volume of currency and credit the Federal Reserve System has been perverted into a vast money and credit hoarding machine; organized for the pretended purpose of preventing panics and depressions, it has been employed to create the three most disastrous ones in the history of our country. Obviously, the remedy for the panic of 1907 was for the government to put into circulation a greater volume of money and to outlaw as traitors the conspirators who brought it about. Obviously, the remedy was not to turn over to these pirates the sovereign function of issuing money, as the Federal Reserve Act did.

The remedy for the catastrophes of 1920 and of 1930 was and is now to get more money into circulation and to free the country from the control of this iniquitous Federal Reserve System. Obviously it was not to extend the power and charter of the system; and obviously also, it was not the "new deal." The remedies suggested are so clear and simple, and those adopted are so inadequate and grotesque that even a congressman ought to be able to see and understand the sham and hypocrisy of it all. The methods employed in putting over the English Bank Act were almost identical with those used here in perpetrating the Federal Reserve Bank hoax. The British people did not understand that they were contracting their currency by demonetizing silver, and that their government was forever abdicating its sovereign right to control currency and credit and values, any more than we understood these things.

They, however, obtained two important advantages that we did not get: (1) They were paid for the charter and for every one of its eight renewals, whereas we gave the Elders the charter and then renewed it indefinitely and we did not recieve a "thin dime" for this valuable monopoly; (2) The Bank of England (and for that matter the central banks of issue of all other countries) lends money direct at a low rate of interest to the people, whereas the Federal Reserve bank is authorized to lend only to member banks;—a "banker's bank" they call it, and so it is—"lock, stock, and barrel."

XXIII.

DEFLATION OF 1937

'"The principal factor of success in political is the secrecy of its undertakings; the word should not agree with the deed." —From Protocol 7.

It should always be remembered that the Federal Reserve System was created for the avowed purpose of supplying the country with an adequate volume of currency and credit. At the time of its consideration and adoption the commerce of the country was in the process of recovery from the panic of 1907. This panic was, as has been stated, a manipulated panic, precipitated by the central reserve banks of New York City, and primarily due to the fact that we did not have a sufficient volume of money in circulation; the system was changed for the purpose of supplying such volume.

There was universal demand for such change, led by the bankers of New York City. So eager were they for a change of system that the elder J. P. Morgan and the elder Geo. F. Baker (president of the First National Bank of New York) testified before the Pujo Committee that there was a "Money Trust" and that it was in the public interest that it be controlled. This admission was at the time a matter of great surprise; the purpose of it is now better understood. In the light of subsequent events and of our present knowledge, we are justified in suspecting that the panic of 1907 was brought about for the purpose of establishing the system we now have.

I prefer to believe in the integrity and sincerity of Woodrow Wilson. I supported him for the presidency, in ignorance, however, of the fact that his campaign was financed by Jews. Despite my bias, I must admit that the Wilson Administration was responsible for the deflation of 1920.

President Wilson appointed Paul Warburg, a member of the Rothschild banking firm, as deputy governor and later governor of the Federal Reserve System. Warburg was the real author of the act and was also author of the Aldrich bill. He openly advocated a central bank, and publicly testified that the system could be transformed by administration into a central bank, and he proceeded to so transform it. He proposed the amendment that gave the system the power of deflation, which President Wilson approved. Warburg, however, resigned before the deflation process was begun and thereby escaped the odium of it.

When the Federal Reserve Act was adopted the Democrats thought they had won a great victory, but nevertheless many well informed Republicans claimed credit for the Act and that the bill was in fact the Aldrich Bill under a different name and in a different dress. The Democrats thought that the Federal Reserve Board was only a medium of contact between the twelve reserve banks and that the banks would be governed by their respective boards of directors and would function independently of it. It was originally provided that a member bank could at will convert its eligible notes into currency by simply endorsing them and sending them into the reserve bank of its district for discount; and the notes of the farmer and those given in the course of commerce were in the preferred class.

This method of issuing currency was intended to supply the adequate volume of currency and credit that the people of the country desired and were promised by the Democratic Party. It has all been changed since. The original purpose of the act has been entirely lost sight of and has been grossly perverted. Paul Warburg was right when he testified before the Senate Committee that the system could be transformed into a good system (for the Elders) by administration. It has in fact been transformed adroitly by administration but more radically by legislation.

Just prior to the panic of 1920 Congress adopted an amendment empowering the Federal Reserve Banks to limit the discount privileges of member banks and to refuse to discount eligible notes. This amendment changed the whole character of the system. It could no longer operate automatically in response to the demands of the people. Thereafter currency could only be issued at the discretion of the Federal Reserve Banks,—which was subsequently changed to the Federal Reserve Board.

The Federal Reserve Banks promptly exercised this power and promptly brought on the panic of 1920 in pursuance of the resolution adopted at the conference between their representatives and the members of the Federal Reserve Board on May 15, 1920. The depressions of 1920 and of 1930, and the present depression would not have been possible except for this change in the act.

Every step in the administration of the system and every act of Congress amending the law since its enactment, have been in the direction of a centralized banking authority with the power of life and death over commerce and industry. Without authority of law the Federal Reserve Board established an "open market committee" to fix and regulate the volume and value of money, with the Governor of the New York Federal Reserve Bank as chairman. It is and was the office of this committee to expand the currency by buying securities, etc., on the open market in New York and Chicago, and issuing in payment therefore the notes of the Federal Reserve banks. To contract the currency the process is reversed; they sell securities and receive currency in payment therefore, which is thereby withdrawn from circulation.

This supplanted the original system of issuing currency in payment of eligible notes discounted by member banks. The difference is that under the present system the "open market" committee determines how much currency is good for us; under the original system the demands of commerce and industry and the member banks determined the quantity of it; the one depends on the integrity and wisdom of the committee, the other responds automatically to the currency and credit needs of the people.

The depression of 1930 and the remedy for it was the issue in the 1932 campaign. Mr. Roosevelt charged that President Hoover was responsible for the depression and that he had adopted inadequate measures to restore prosperity. There was no demand by either political party or any candidate for office that the Federal Reserve System be converted into a centralized banking authority and that its powers be enlarged. No man could have been elected President of the United States on any such platform.

Under the pretense of protecting bank deposits and of creating a corporation for that purpose, for which there was some demand,—the Congress enacted the bill known as the "Banking Act of 1935." This bill completed and perfected the system as a centralized banking authority with much greater power than was provided in the original Aldrich Bill. Among other things it legalized the "open market committee" and provided that the members of the Federal Reserve Board and five members of the Federal Reserve banks (to be selected by their directors) should constitute this "open market committee."

The Bank Act of 1935 called for a new Governor, and new members of the Federal Reserve Board to be appointed by the president,—and Mr. Roosevelt named Marriner S. Eccles as Chairman of the Board and appointed an entirely new board. All of them were new members with the exception of Professor Miller who had been a consistent and trustworthy deflationist from the beginning.

The original Federal Reserve Act required the member banks to maintain reserves in the Federal Reserve Banks as follows: country banks and those in smaller cities, 7% of the amount of their deposits; banks in reserve cities, 10% ; and in central reserve cities, 13%. These reserves were not subject to check ad libitum by the banks, as under the former system, but could only be checked against "under the regulations and subject to the penalties, provided by the Federal Reserve Board." They were intended to be and were in fact, static and sterilized. To check against them meant the suspension of the bank,—and its insolvency. They served no purpose except to sterilize and impound that much currency and credit, and the country did not suffer from them except to that extent. There was no need, or public demand for increasing them.

The "Banking Act of 1935" authorized the Federal Reserve Board "in order to prevent injurious credit expansion or contraction" to double these reserve requirements. Obviously there could be no "credit expansion" by doubling the amount of sterilized money and credit, and obviously it meant only to empower the Board to bring about credit contraction. Such delegation of power was wholly unnecessary because the Board had absolute power to expand and contract the volume of currency through the operations of the "open market committee," which involved the power to expand and contract credit, for credit is dependent wholly on the supply of currency to support it. Moreover the Board had fully demonstrated its power to "prevent injurious expansion" in the catastrophes of 1920 and 1930.

Evidently the purpose of this amendment was to provide a new method for bringing about deflation,—a different one from the old plan of refusing loans and advancing the discount rate. The old plan had come to be too thoroughly understood, and discredited by too frequent use. Since Mr. Roosevelt had been elected to correct the evils of the Hoover administration, he could not bring about the same character of deflation in the same manner without the risk of having the whole "Jew Deal" upset by Congress; he must employ a different method and a more subtle technique.

The Federal Reserve Board did not permit this power to remain dormant very long. On August 26, 1936, they advanced these reserve requirements 50%, but the result was not satisfactory to them. On January 30, 1937, they adopted the following resolution:

> "Effective at the opening of business on March 1, 1937, the requirements as to reserves to be maintained by each member bank will be 75 per cent above the requirements prescribed by section 19 of the Federal Reserve Act, and effective at the opening of business May 1, 1937, the requirements as to reserves to be maintained by each member bank will be 100 per cent above the requirements prescribed by section 19 of the Federal Reserve Act."

That did the job, and the Roosevelt depression soon followed and is still on, and prosperity is not "around the corner" as the Elders and their sycophants tell you it is. There is now sterilized and hoarded in the "reserve accounts" of the Federal Reserve Banks the huge sum of $13,863,000,000. This is more than ten times the volume of money we have in circulation. It would furnish a sound basis for at least $70,000,000,000 of credit if this money was in circulation and in the vaults of the member banks. The depression would not have occurred if this money and credit had remained in circulation. It was withdrawn for the purpose of bringing on the depression.

This order of the Federal Reserve Board operates with the greatest severity on the small and weak banks. They, together with all other banks, have been forced by the Roosevelt Administration to subscribe for government bonds, with the result that they are loaded down with U. S. bonds. The government has now taken from them a large percentage of their liquid capital, which has left many of them with insufficient resources to meet the ordinary demands of their customers, or to earn reasonable profits. There is no precedent in other countries for such banking practice and for such abuse of governmental authority.

The "Bank Act of 1935," insofar as it provided for guaranteeing bank deposits, originated in the House and it was limited to that one subject. The amendments were added by Carter Glass when the bill reached the Senate. Glass was on the conference committee between the two bodies and succeeded in putting over these amendments and afterward boasted of the achievement in the press. This ever-faithful servant of the Elders is always on the job with his amendments when there is a banking or currency measure before the Senate, for it is much easier to tack them on to some popular measure than to get them through independently upon their own merit or lack of merit.

We may choose to believe in the good intentions of Mr. Roosevelt and to excuse him for this terrible crime, but we cannot close our eyes to the cold facts. The Federal Reserve Board is wholly of his selection and it has no doubt carried out his express orders. No official appointed by him will dare disobey him; should he do so he would be "fired," for Mr. Roosevelt brooks no opposition.

In one of his press conferences Mr. Roosevelt sought to excuse the order of the Federal Reserve Board on the ground that some unnamed prices were too high and out of "alignment," but even if that be true, it is a silly excuse for bringing such great distress upon the innocent people of the country. The fact is, some prices always have been and always will be out of "alignment" due to supply and demand.

There is this substantial difference between the Wilson 1920 deflation and the Roosevelt 1937 deflation: In 1920 prices and wages were high and money of course correspondingly cheap. We had $3 wheat, $2 corn, 40c cotton, $1.50 to $2 per hour wages, labor was fully employed and scarce.

In 1937 we had been suffering from the Hoover deflation for more than five years; we had spent billions of dollars upon Mr. Roosevelt's recommendations for the pretended purpose of relieving it; there was no substantial relief; prices and wages were still low and labor unemployed; we still had approximately 10,000,000 unemployed, and many millions on the dole. There was absolutely no excuse for the Roosevelt deflation. It was a deliberate effort on his part to wreck the country and to prepare the ground for revolution and dictatorship.

XXIV.

"ON OUR WAY"(WHITHER?)

"The political has nothing in common with the moral. The ruler who is governed by the moral is not a skilled politician, and is therefore unstable on his throne. He who wishes to rule must have recourse both to cunning and to make-believe. Great national qualities, like frankness and honesty, are vices in politics, for they bring down rulers from their thrones more effectively and more certainly than the most powerful enemy. Such qualities must be the attributes of the kingdoms of the goyim, but we must in no wise be guided by them."—From Protocol 1.

President Roosevelt, in his inaugural address on March 4th, 1933, said:

"Primarily this [the present depression] is because the rulers of exchange of mankind's goods have failed through their own stubbornness and their own incompetence, have admitted their failure, and have abdicated. Practices of the unscrupulous money changers stand indicted in the court of public opinion, rejected by the hearts and minds of men.

"True they have tried, but their efforts have been cast in the pattern of an outworn tradition. Faced by failure of credit they have proposed only the lending of more money. Stripped of the lure of profit by which to induce our people to follow their false leadership, they have resorted to exhortation, pleading tearfully for restored confidence. They only know the rules of a generation of self-seekers. They have no vision, and when there is no vision the people perish.

"Yes, the money changers have fled from their high seats in the temple of our civilization. We may now restore that temple to the ancient truths. The measure of the restoration lies in the extent to which we apply social values more noble than mere monetary profit , . . and there must be prevision for an adequate but sound currency."

Fine words, very, very fine, and very, very true. This was the program he deliberately promised the people of America in his inaugural address.

This message states clearly conditions that then existed, and the cause and the remedy therefor. There was great rejoicing among the people; for the people, while not understanding the money question, knew in a general way that their distressful situation was due to the corrupt management of our banking and currency system and here was promise of relief.

If the Elders believed the President's sincerity there must have been "weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth" among them, for here was a man, whose election they had brought about, calling them selfish Shylocks and incompetents, and accusing them of responsibility for the deplorable conditions he so graphically depicted, and threatening to destroy their control of the system which had caused so much wreck and ruin.

On the day following the delivery of this splendid speech the farm leaders, John N. Simpson, et at., called on the President and asked him to explain what he meant by the phrase "There must be provision for an adequate but sound currency." The President said, according to press reports, that he meant that the government would exercise its constitutional duty to issue money and control its value, that he would promptly cause enough money to be issued and put into circulation to restore wages and markets and values and prosperity to the country, and give a job to every man in the land who wanted to work.

One of two things is true: either the President did not mean a word of his speech and of his clarifying statement to the farmers, or else he changed his mind on the following day, viz., March 6th. We cannot know which is true. It is difficult to believe that the President of the United States would make such statements with his fingers crossed and for the purpose of deceiving his friends and supporters; but it is equally inconceivable that he would change his mind upon this important subject, upon which he had deliberately spoken after having evidently given it great thought, within the short space of twenty-four hours time.

It is of course possible that Brother Baruch or some of the other Elders interviewed him shortly after the farmers and changed his purpose and his program, but it is not probable. His message turned out to be mere "cunning and make-believe" and it was no doubt intended as such. Whatever the truth may be, on the following day, March 6th, he issued a proclamation closing all the banks of the United States,—state as well as national, and good as well as bad. This was arbitrary, high handed, destructive, and illegal.

Upon the point of its legality he says in his book, "On Our Way," page four, that "a friend of mine (probably Frankfurter) suggested that some of the war emergency legislation of 1917 had not been repealed and found for me a statute of that year covering the point." Even so, such statute could not be applicable to peace conditions, for Congress has no power to suspend the Constitution and laws of the land except as a military measure, and its power even then is limited to military necessity.

Besides, there was then no necessity for the grant or the usurpation or the exercise of such power. The banks of the country were as a rule sound and well managed. The trouble with them was that many of their customers had been bankrupted by an illegal deflation or were near bankruptcy, and as a consequence their collateral had been impaired. It was the direct and intended consequence of the contraction of currency and credit by the Federal Reserve management in 1930. They suffered from the further trouble that there was not enough money in their vaults and in circulation to enable them to pay their depositors in currency. The only place that they could get the money was from the Federal Reserve banks, which had the exclusive power of issue, which it refused to exercise.

The clear remedy therefore was not the closing of the banks and the utter destruction of many of them, but it was for the government to take over the Federal Reserve System or compel it to perform the service for which it was organized, or for the government to exercise its constitutional power to issue and put into circulation a sufficient quantity of money. The obvious and quickest remedy was for the President to remove the Federal Reserve management and appoint one that would discount the eligible paper of the member banks and issue them currency and thereby enable them to meet the currency demands and credit requirements of their customers.

The obvious remedy was to reverse the deflation program of the Federal Reserve System and to bring about just and reasonable inflation through the expansion of currency and credit. The President knew this to be the remedy and he promised to employ it, both in his inaugural message and in his statement to the farm representatives. If he had done so there would have been no occasion or excuse for his extravagant and unconstitutional reforms and his subsequent attack upon the Constitution itself.

My own view is that Senator Long's estimate of the President is correct, and that he did not mean a word of what he said in his message and to the farmers. I think that he intended his so-called reforms from the beginning and that he needed a bewildered and poverty stricken people in order to put them over.

As Senator Long so graphically said, it was "high cockalorum Roosevelt and low cockalorum Hoover," the difference between them being only the difference between "tweedledum and tweedledee." Mr. Roosevelt is only a "skilled politician who has recourse to cunning and make-believe."

In 1929 there were more than 30,000 state and national banks. The number had been reduced by deflation to 19,163 in 1932. As a result of this order 4,541 banks or approximately one-third of the remainder were permanently closed and their deposits aggregating $4,356,799,000 were thereby frozen and a large percentage of them lost. (See Comptroller of the Currency Report of 1936, page 112.) The President thus ruthlessly destroyed the property of the several thousand stockholders of the closed banks and of their several million depositors in flagrant violation of law and of our National Constitution, and later boasted of this achievement in his book "On Our Way."

The effect of this order was further deflation, and to make bad matters worse. It froze the life savings of many thousand depositors and transferred them from a state of comfort to one of poverty. They could have been saved, and the country could have been saved the expense of their maintenance, by the mere act of correcting the crime of 1930 in a legal way, viz., by reversing the process by which it had been perpetrated. The worst of it is that the President then knew that this could be done and promised to do it.

This does not tell the whole story. The banks had already been reduced in number by the 1930 deflation (for which President Hoover is justly held responsible) from 30,000 to 19,163. This further reduced the number to 15,806, or about half the number that existed in 1929. The human imagination can scarcely conceive such ruthless and reckless destruction of men and of values and it cannot estimate the injuries that the people sustained. It meant that the fortunes of approximately one-half of the thrifty men and women of the nation were either utterly destroyed or badly impaired;—and the other half did not escape without serious injury.

On January 15, 1934, the President submitted a special message to Congress, as set out in his book "On Our Way," in which he said:

> "Permit me once more to stress two principles. Our national currency must be maintained as a sound currency which, in so far as possible, will have a fairly constant standard of purchasing power and be adequate for the purposes of daily use and the establishment of credit.
>
> "The other principle is the inherent right of government to issue currency and to be the sole custodian and owner of the base or reserve of precious metals underlying that currency. With this goes the prerogative of government to determine from time to time the extent and nature of the metallic reserve."

John Stuart Mill or his disciple, David Ricardo, could not have stated the orthodox principles of monetary science more clearly and forcefully. The President cannot plead ignorance of the money question, for every message and speech that he has delivered on the subject shows that he understands it. There can be no restoration of values until there is a sufficient volume of money in circulation to support them. That is as certain and as inevitable as the law of gravitation. If this volume of money rests upon the discretion of the Federal Reserve Board then those values will be whatever this Board chooses to make them, and they will be as stable as the mind of the Board is stable.

Prior to the adoption of the Federal Reserve System the basis of our values rested upon the volume of money in circulation, and they were stable because the supply of money, except for hoarding, was stable,—but it has been unstable and erratic since, because it rests wholly upon credit and upon the discretion of selfish and designing men.

What has the President done to give effect to his brave promises? What has he done to wrest the control of our currency system from the Shylocks, charged in his inaugural speech with controlling it, except to leave them in control and to perfect their control ? What has he done toward increasing our currency supply in order to restore employment and prosperity except to further reduce it? What has he done to restore the solvency of our country except to enormously increase debts and taxes? Truly, the Elders have furnished us a ruler of their own kind, a "skilled politician who has recourse to cunning and make-believe," and whose "words do not agree with his deeds."

XXV.

LIARS AND THIEVES

"Gold always has been and always will be the irresistible power. Handled by expert hands it will always be the most useful lever for those who possess it, and the object of envy for those who do not. With gold we can buy the must rebellious consciences, can fix the rate of all values, the current prices of all products, can subsidize all State loans, and thereafter hold the states at our mercy."—From Funeral Oration of Rabbi Reichhorn.

The following is a facsimile copy of page 171 of the report of the Comptroller of the Currency for the year ending Oct. 31, 1938,—which is the latest published report:

"76th Annual Report of the Comptroller of the Currency covering the Year ended Oct. 31, 1938, (page 171). (Amounts stated in Thousands of Dollars)"

Stock of money in the United States, in the Treasury, in reporting banks, in Federal Reserve banks, and in general circulation, years ended June 30, 1914 to 1938

Year Ended June 30–	Coin and other money in the United States	Coin and other money in Treasury as assets[1]		Coin and other money in reporting banks[2]		Held by or for Federal Reserve banks and agents		In general circulation exclusive of amounts held by reporting banks, Federal Reserve banks and Treasury
		Amount	Per-cent	Amount	Per-cent	Amount	Per-cent	Amount	Per-cent	Per capita
	Millions	Millions		Millions		Millions		Millions
1914	$3,797.8	$ 338.4	8.91	$1,630.0	42.92	.....	.....	$1,829.4	48.17	$18.46
1915	4,050.8	348.2	8.60	1,447.9	35.74	$ 383.0	9.45	1,871.7	46.21	18.56
1916	4,541.7	299.1	6.59	1,472.2	32.41	593.3	13.06	2,177.1	47.94	21.24
1917	5,678.8	269.7	4.75	1,487.3	26.19	1,342.7	23.64	2,579.1	45.42	24.74
1918	6,906.2	363.5	5.27	882.7	12.78	2,061.0	29.84	3,599.0	52.11	33.97
1919	7,688.4	585.1	7.61	981.3	12.76	2,226.7	28.96	3,895.3	50.67	36.67
1920	8,158.5	490.7	6.01	1,047.3	12.84	2,200.2	26.97	4,420.3	54.18	41.50
1921	8,174.5	463.6	5.67	926.3	11.33	2,799.9	34.25	3,984.7	48.75	36.71
1922	8,276.1	406.1	4.91	814.0	9.84	3,406.8	41.16	3,649.2	44.09	33.18
1923	8,702.8	386.5	4.44	777.1	8.93	3,493.0	40.14	4,046.2	46.49	36.20
1924	8,846.5	359.4	4.06	900.8	10.18	3,637.8	41.12	3,948.5	44.64	34.69
1925	8,299.4	363.9	4.38	938.3	11.30	3,120.3	37.63	3,876.9	46.69	33.58
1926	8,429.0	353.2	4.19	975.2	11.57	3,190.5	37.85	3,910.1	46.39	33.35
1927	8,667.3	350.9	4.05	985.1	11.36	3,465.1	39.98	3,866.2	44.61	32.57
1928	8,118.1	351.3	4.33	866.5	10.67	2,970.2	36.59	3,930.1	48.41	32.72
1929	8,538.8	373.1	4.37	799.1	9.36	3,419.4	40.04	3,947.2	46.23	32.47
1930	8,306.6	247.2	2.98	853.8	10.28	3,537.3	42.58	3,668.2	44.16	29.76
1931	9,079.6	254.9	2.81	865.5	9.53	4,002.7	44.08	3,956.5	43.58	31.87
1932	9,004.4	278.2	3.09	774.1	8.60	3,031.1	33.66	4,921.0	54.65	39.41
1933	10,078.4	314.5	3.12	649.9	6.45	4,043.2	40.12	5,070.8	50.31	40.32
1934	13,634.4	2,955.9	21.68	689.6	5.06	5,305.0	38.91	4,683.9	34.35	37.03
1935	15,114.0	2,865.9	18.96	760.0	5.03	6,680.0	44.20	4,808.1	31.81	37.79
1936	17,402.5	2,496.4	14.35	987.7	5.68	8,664.9	49.79	5,253.5	30.19	40.89
1937	19,376.8	3,444.5	17.78	920.8	4.75	9,485.1	48.95	5,526.3	28.52	42.71
1938	20,096.9	2,302.6	11.46	991.5	4.93	11,333.4	56.39	5,469.4	27.22	42.02

1 Public money in national-bank depositories to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States not included

2 Money in banks of island possessions not included

NOTE —Population estimated at 123,250,000 in 1930 ; 124,135,800 in 1931 ; 124,881,806 in 1932: 125,753,206 in 1933; 126,485,606 in 1934; 127,233,106 in 1935; 128,475,000 in 1936; 129 399,000 in 1937, and 130, 147,000 in 1938

Please note the italicized figures opposite the years 1914 and 1938. They give you the detailed estimates of the Treasury Department of our stock of money for these years, and where it is located. You will observe that in 1914 all of the "reporting banks," which means all of the banks of the country except the Federal Reserve banks,—had in their vaults $1,630,000,000; and that in 1938 they had $991,500,000. Thus it appears that the banks had $638,500,000 more money in their vaults when the Federal Reserve System was established, 24 years ago, than they now have.

You will observe also under the last column of figures that they estimate that there was in "general circulation" $1,829,400,000,—or $18.46 per capita in 1914; and $5,469,400,000 or $42.02 per capita in 1938. You will observe also that they do not count money in the Treasury, in the reporting banks or in the Federal Reserve banks as being in "general circulation."

This method of estimating the money in "general circulation" is obviously true as to money in the Treasury and in the Federal Reserve banks, for these moneys are hoarded and are not subject to check. But it is obviously false as to the moneys in the "reporting banks" for these moneys are subject to check and they pass from the banks daily by check to the people, and are therefore in circulation.

Where is all of this money that they say is in "general circulation" and that they say is over and above the money that is in the Treasury and banks? There is only one place that it can be, to-wit: distributed among the people and in their "tills and pockets." Any man of common sense knows that the people have not now an average of $42.02 in their pockets, and that they did not have an average of $18.46 in 1914. Any man of common sense knows that now, with business stagnant and prostrate, and with half of the people in poverty that they do not now possess more than double the amount of money that they had in 1914, when people generally were prosperous.

The Treasury Department explains this obviously false report by saying that there has been no "corrected statement" of the money in general circulation since 1861 and that their estimate "includes all United States paper money in other lands, all money worn beyond possibility of redemption, and all money lost."

In other words, they count as money in circulation in the United States all moneys issued since 1861, whether in circulation or not. But even this lame explanation does not explain the fact that the moneys in the pockets of the people (according to the official report) have increased from $18.46 per capita in 1914 to $42.02 in 1938,—whereas during the same period the moneys in the banks have decreased from $16.30 per capita in 1914 to about $7.00 in 1938,—which is simply preposterous.

Vast quantities of money have been lost or destroyed by fire, ship wreck, and otherwise, in the 80 years since a "corrected statement" was made; and vast quantities of it are now in foreign lands. The all-important question to you and me is: how much of it is now in the hands of the people of this country?

And that is a matter of supreme importance to us for by all of the accepted authorities the quantity of money that circulates among the people, including the reporting banks determines all values and measures all values. Money is called the "yardstick of values"; the more money the higher values, and the less, the lower. We are entitled to know what that yardstick is, and to have a yardstick that will establish and maintain reasonable values.

Who can say what it is today? One man's guess is as good as another's. The only estimate that has ever come under my observation was made some years ago by a treasury expert by the name of McCoy who estimated it at $440,000,000, which at that time was about $4.00 per capita. It is probably less than that now, for the banks have less now than then, and conditions are much worse now than then, which indicate it.

You can make your own guess. What would you say the people have in their pockets in your town? Let us take for example a town of 1,000 population, with a bank and 20 business houses. It will be composed of about 300 men and women over 21 years of age, and 700 children less than 21 years. The 20 business houses may normally have an average of $50 each in their tills, amounting to $1,000; the 300 men and women may have $5 each, or 1,500; the 700 children may average $1 each, or 700.

A grand total of $3,200; or $3.20 per capita. If we add to that the cash in the vault of the bank, which I estimate at 5,000 we have a total volume of money in circulation in the town of $8,200 or $8.20 per capita.

But the Treasury Department does not count as money in circulation the $5,000 in the vault of the bank; they only count as money in circulation that which is in the hands of the people, and estimate it at $42.02 per capita. That estimate is not true and they know it. There is not a town or village or city in this broad land of ours where the people have an average of $42.02 of money in their pockets,—not one.

If their estimate is correct the figures given in the example above would be about fourteen times more. The 20 business men must have an average of $700 each, amounting to—$14,000; the 300 men and women must have an average of $70 each, or 21,000; and all the children, including the babies, must have $10 apiece, or 7,000.

This makes a total of $42,000 or $42 per capita for the people of the town. Would it not be fine if they had it! Talk about "buying power," the people would have it; of our surplus products and poverty and distress, there would be none.

"Oh," but they say, "Look at the $50,000,000,000 on deposit in the banks;" the banks are just "bulging with money." That is not money, and even the Treasury Department does not count it as such, it is only bank credit, which must be paid in money.

The banks, according to their sworn statements, only have $991,500,000 of real money with which to pay these 50 billion dollars,—which means that if all of them were called upon at one time they could only pay about 2 per cent of their deposits. They are in a helpless and precarious position, and they do not dare to extend credit liberally; too many of them have been ruined by doing so.

The moneys that measure values are bank notes and silver and gold and silver certificates,—primary money, as they call it. This primary money is our yardstick of value. We are entitled to know what this yardstick is. What is it? They have deceived Congress and the country with lying reports of it, to the very great injury of the people. Let us now have the truth, for "truth is mighty and will make us whole."

This report is true as to the monies in the banks on the respective dates mentioned, for it is based on the sworn reports of all the banks of the United States, which are in turn based on an actual count of the money.

In 1914 the people were prosperous and happy, and the dole and the C. C. C. camps were unknown,—and according to this official report the people then had in their pockets an average of $18.49. Now eleven million of our people are out of jobs, and one-third of our population (according to the President) is poorly housed and clothed and fed, and yet they have in their pockets (as stated by this official report) an average of $42.02.

I do not pretend to understand the trick or the system by which they count money in circulation that is not in circulation, but I do know that the people have not now and have never had an average of $42.02 per capita in their pockets. I assert that we now have in actual circulation less than $12 per capita, of which less than $4 is in the pockets of the people; and that there can never be any enduring prosperity or any stability of credit and values until this basis is broadened by an adequate volume of money in circulation.

This startling fact has been repeatedly called to the attention of the President and many members of Congress, but the lying statements of the Treasury and Comptroller of the Currency have been repeated from year to year since 1920 and accepted as true by Congress and the country. Prior to the creation of the infamous Federal Reserve System true and reliable reports were made. Evidently it is the purpose of the management of the system to deceive Congress and the country, and it has done so to our great injury.

They have recently taken a census of everything we have, including mortgages,—except our money. A census of the volume of money in circulation is the only information of any material importance to us; the other is all "fol-de-rol." A census or an inventory could just as easily be taken of the money in the pockets of the people, and would be of great value. It would show upon what an insecure and flimsy foundation all credit and values rest; it would blast the oft-repeated sophistry that there is plenty of money, that all we need is a little "confidence;" it would clearly reveal the absurdity of all the New Deal rot, for it would reveal the cause of our distress and the remedy therefore; it would, it is to be hoped, cause Congress to take the necessary steps to put in circulation a sufficient volume of money, with adequate measures to keep it in circulation.

If we had $42.02 per capita in actual circulation the prices of all products and wages—the price level—would be approximately that of 1920; we would have no relief rolls and C. C. C. camps, and no curtailment of production; no need for regulation of hours and wages, and no excuse for the destruction of our National Constitution. Instead of being a money and credit expanding system to supply the ever-growing need of expanding population and commerce,—the Federal Reserve System is a vast currency and credit hoarding machine. With its true character and purpose clearly revealed, Congress gratuitously granted it an indefinite charter five years prior to the expiration of the original charter, and by the Bank Act of 1935 gave it carte blanche authority to regulate our welfare.

There can be no stability of values that are dependent wholly upon credit, for there is no foundation for such values other than the will of the creditor. When it is to his advantage to reduce them, thereby increasing the buying power of money, he will do so. It is always to his advantage to have cheap commodities and dear money, and so it is normally that way. Let Congress exercise its constitutional duty and cause an adequate volume of money to be paid into circulation and kept in circulation, and values will adjust themselves to such volume and will be high or low in proportion to the volume, without the operation of an "open market committee" or any other committee.

At the time Hoover left off with his deflation and Roosevelt took over the job, we had in circulation $730,435,000 of national bank notes. By 1936 we had none. All of them had been retired and cancelled by the compulsion of the Roosevelt Administration. (See Report of the Comptroller of the Currency for 1936, page 112.) This meant a cancellation of about $5.50 per capita, or about 50% of the sum of money we now have in circulation. It is but $257,265,000 less than all the banks of the country had in their vaults, of money of all kinds, on June 3, 1936.

If the members of Congress cannot understand this lying deception after reading this very simple explanation of it, let them investigate it themselves. Let them take a census of the money in their respective districts, or better still, let them cause a Congressional investigation to be made of the money in circulation in the United States.

We have, as a matter of fact, about $1,400,000,000, or $11.00 per capita in circulation, composed of $991,500,000 in the reporting banks, and three or $400,000,000 in the pockets of the people, for the money in the "reporting banks" less their legal reserves, is in circulation.

Outside of the banks there is between $3 and $4 per capita in circulation and not $42.02 as they report it. It is utterly impossible to have reasonable prices and wages and prosperity with such a limited volume. China has about $3 per capita, with the inevitable result that her mandarins are exceedingly rich and her peasantry exceeding poor. That is the objective of the "Elders" here in our boasted "land of the free." All of this lying and deception is in accordance with the "law of our bank," viz: the protocols and the code of the communists.

They say that we now have $5,469,400,000 in circulation, or $42.02 per capita. If that were true, which it is not, we clearly haven't enough, for it has been insufficient to lift us out of the depression. We are entitled to have enough money in circulation to do so. Is there any sane reason why this right is denied us?

We now have $20,400,000,000 of gold and about $3,000,000,000 of silver stored in the United States Treasury vaults in Kentucky and elsewhere. Is there any sane reason why all or the greater part of this money should not be paid into circulation? It would give us more than $150 per capita, restore values and prosperity to the country, and by so doing render useless and unnecessary the entire New Deal with its regimentation. We are like the miser who starves to death while fingering his money and counting it.

It is beyond me to explain how it is possible for responsible treasury officials to make false reports as to the volume of money in circulation from year to year and administration to administration, and how Congress could be deceived by them. But it is obvious that such reports are false, that they are made knowingly and designedly, and that the members of Congress and people generally have been deceived by them. The worst of it is they will not believe the truth even when such falsity is proven beyond controversy. It demonstrates, if demonstration is necessary, the mighty Rothschild power in our government, whether it be a democratic or a republican administration.

The Jews have written several text books on political economy expounding what they call the "qualitative theory of money" in which they assert that gold is the only sound money because of its intrinsic value- If this doctrine is sound we should and would be the most prosperous people of the world because we have 80% of the gold of the world. Thirty years ago we had less than 10% and no dole, no unemployed and reasonable prices and wages and taxes.

It is another Jewish lie, and propagated for the purpose of deception and injury. In protocol 5 they say:

> "The science of political economy invented by our learned elders has for long past been giving royal prestige to capital."

And so it has. And it has given us the gold standard with its restricted volume of money and credit, and its attendant poverty and misery.

But they claim too much when they say "the science of political economy" was invented by their "learned elders." The true science of money was first discovered by Adam Smith and John Stuart Mill, both of whom were Gentiles. The false qualitative theory was invented by the Jews because until recently they owned and controlled the greater part of the gold of the world and because the gold standard gave them the power to regulate the welfare and destiny of the people of the world.

According to both Smith and Mill all values are fixed and determined by the quantity of money in circulation without regard to its quality. It is the sole and only yard-stick of value. But the Jew economists dispute the truth of this fundamental law, and in support of their argument point to the large volume which they falsely say we have in circulation, but which is not in circulation.

XXVI.

MISMANAGED CURRENCY

"All people are chained down to heavy toil by poverty more firmly than ever they were chained by slavery and serfdom; from these, one way and another, they might free themselves, these could be settled with, but from want they will never get away."—From Protocol 3.

We now have what is called a "managed currency system," with the Rothschild power doing the managing. Make no mistake about that. If it were possible for the people to do the managing the Rothschilds would not want that kind of system. We have had this system since the amendment to the Federal Reserve Act, which took away the right of the member banks to convert their "eligible" securities into currency, and invested the Federal Reserve Board with the discretionary power to issue money.

It is necessary to the success of this system that we have a limited quantity of money in circulation, otherwise they can't manage things; values will find their own level,—as they did prior to said amendment.

With the exception of a few "elder"-manipulated panics, we had a prosperous country up to the date of the establishment of this "managed currency"; we have had the three worst disasters in the history of our country, since. It was the management of our currency system that brought them all about, and that has brought about our present deplorable condition. The worst of it is, they were all brought about designedly, including the present Roosevelt debacle.

It is the Rothschild power that has controlled our financial policy and consequently the welfare of the American people since the Civil War. We call it "Wall Street" but "Wall Street" is only the representative of the Rothschild power. The part of it that is not Jewish is strongly pro-Jewish. Even if that were not true, no financier has ever yet dared to oppose the mighty Rothschild power, and no statesman has ever done so except Abraham Lincoln, and he was murdered.

The "Elders," with their press support, preach a "managed currency," for that is what they want. Congress appears to be sold on it. The very capable and persistent Senator Thomas of Oklahoma had a bill calling for the creation of a "monetary authority" with directions to maintain the price and wage level of 1929. Mr. Eccles, Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, came out against it, arguing that it could not be done,—but it can be done, and he knows it.

It, however, will not be done by an authority that does not want to do it. Mr. Eccles does not want to do it because the Boss does not want it done; Eccles and his board brought the present disaster upon us because the Boss wanted it. The Boss has had this power for four years by virtue of a former Thomas bill,—known as the Thomas amendment, and has not used it except to further deflate, despite the fact that he has repeatedly said that he wanted to restore and maintain the price level of 1929.

We have had enough of managed currency. If we had Jesus Christ to manage our money and establish our price level it might work satisfactorily,—but never with a bunch of Jews in control of it. No man or set of men, Jew or Gentile, are wise enough or good enough to manage our welfare.

If Congress will only repeal the amendment establishing the managed currency system and thereby restore the power to the member banks to discount their eligible paper without limit, the commerce and the people of the country will do all of the managing that is necessary.

But a better plan still is to return to the system that prevailed before the establishment of the Federal Reserve banks. Let Congress resume its constitutional duty to issue money and regulate its value; and let Congress cause to be issued and paid into general circulation $42.02 per capita or more. No man can justly complain of that,—not even the "Elders," for they say it is now in circulation!

I undertake to say that an average of $42.02 in the hand of the people will restore the price and wage level of 1920; that it will automatically do away with the A. A. A., the C. C. C, and all of the other new deal agencies; that it will restore general prosperity to the people of our country, and it may preserve our constitutional government and rescue as from threatened sovietism.

The remedy for our present unfortunate condition is so simple and so plain, that I marvel that our representatives in Congress do not see it and adopt it. They must know that the deflations of 1920 and 1930 and 1937 were all caused by the management of the Federal Reserve System. The obvious remedy therefore is to destroy this system or curtail its power to destroy us.

This system brought about the three catastrophes mentioned, by the contraction of currency and credit. The obvious remedy therefore is to reverse the process and to expand the currency, which will carry with it an expansion of credit. Instead of adopting this remedy they have permitted the system to cancel and withdraw from circulation the greater part of our gold and silver certificates and national bank notes; they have sterilized and buried all of our gold, and much of our silver.

The first step toward recovery and toward peace, prosperity and happiness is to discard our mismanaged currency system; the second is to determine the price and wage level and the volume of circulating medium that the people need in order to pay their debts and taxes and be prosperous; third is to pay such volume into circulation, not in just New York and Chicago, but in such manner as it will reach the people throughout the length and breadth of the land; the fourth is to prohibit the banks and others from gathering in this money and cancelling it or hoarding it; the fifth is to check up on it from time to time and to issue additional currency when required, to take the place of money lost or destroyed or hoarded, and also to cover the increase in population and commerce.

Sad to relate, Congress re-enacted the Thomas Amendment, extending it until June 15, 1941. This bill in substance extends the 2 billion stabilization fund and the authority to purchase gold and silver ad libitum, and empowers the President to issue and pay into circulation 6 billion dollars of money which he refuses to do. In substance it transfers to the President the sole and exclusive power to "coin money and regulate its value," which is the sole and exclusive constitutional duty of Congress.

It was the original purpose of the author of the bill, Senator Thomas, to get into circulation such additional volume of money as would restore prosperity to our stricken land,—as shown from his several speeches on the subject.

But such has never been the purpose of the President, as shown from his administration of the measure. It was his purpose to prevent the issuance of such money by Congress, and the only sure way to do so was to get the power out of their hands and into his own.

The Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry filed an instructive report[48] pointing out the true and only remedy.

The following are the members of the committee: Messrs. Smith (chairman), Wheeler, Thomas of Oklahoma, McGill, Bankhead, Bulow, Mrs. Caraway, Pope, Hatch, Bilbo, Moore, Schweilenbach, Gillette, Ellender, Norris, McNary, Capper, Frazier and Shipstead. The Committee is composed of ten Democrats, seven Republicans and two Independents. It has among its members some of the ablest men of Congress, whose long records of service have proven them to be the true and reliable friends and champions of the "under-privileged" and of the "forgotten man." This report in substance says to the President of the United States:—Your farm relief bill and your other relief measures are all unnecessary; we have already invested you with the power to restore prosperity to the farmer and to all other classes of our people, and now it is up to you to do what we have authorized and instructed you to do. As to the devaluation of gold the Committee says:

[48] Congressional Record, 75th Congress, p. 625.

> "The first remedy applied was a monetary one—we went off gold and the dollar was devalued. In 2 months cotton went from 6.35 to 8.95 cents per pound, wheat from 45 to 75 cents, corn from 24 to 46 cents, and wool from 17 to 24 cents. Precisely the same effects had been previously felt in other countries leaving the gold standard, particularly in great agricultural producing countries like Australia, the Argentine, Canada, New Zealand, and Denmark. South Africa, the greatest gold producer in the world, went off gold because the pressure caused by staying on was too great for its agriculture."

The further devaluation of gold will increase the export price of all commodities, for the reason that it increases the supply of gold and thereby cheapens the medium of payment for our exports, but it will only incidentally affect domestic prices. To the extent that our home market for our own product is controlled by the foreign market, it will increase the price of such commodity here, but it will not mean a general increase of our prices and wages. In order to accomplish that end, money must be cheapened in our own country by getting more of it in circulation.

The Committee calls the President's attention to the fact, which he already knew, that the Congress has already invested him with the power to increase prices and wages generally, and to restore employment and prosperity throughout the length and breadth of the land by "(b) open the mints for the free coinage of silver; and (c) have issued additional treasury notes." The President has had this power for the past four years and he has not used it. On the other hand he has employed every power granted him, with one single exception, to further deflate and to thereby carry out the policy which was initiated during the Hoover Administration. The exception is the power granted him to devaluate gold, which he only partially employed.

The delegation of such power to the President by Congress was in violation of Section 1, Art. 8, of the National Constitution, which imposes the duty upon Congress. The President sought this power, and Congress, relying upon his integrity and his good faith, granted it to him. It is evident that Congress would not have granted it except to be used, and it is also evident that the President did not seek it for that purpose. It is also evident that he sought and obtained this delegation of power in order to "head off" Congress and to prevent Congress from relieving the country before he could "put over" his unconstitutional "reforms."

The Committee points out the true and only remedy, as follows:

> "The power over the value of the dollar, now divided among various agencies and departments, public and private, should he coordinated and concentrated in one Federal agency with a definite congressional mandate to such agency to properly adjust and regulate the value of the dollar and thereafter to stabilize it at such adjusted value."

Note the language: — "Congressional mandate to such agency to properly adjust and regulate the value of the dollar and thereafter to stabilize it at such adjusted value." That is precisely what the President has so often said in his messages and speeches that he wanted and intended to do. He has said repeatedly that he wanted to fix and adjust it at the 1926 price level, and to stabilize it at that level. And that is also precisely what he has had the power to do for more than four years, but has never yet done, nor taken an intelligent step in that direction.

The report of this committee is so convincing and comprehensive that it deserves to be published in full, but since I am endeavoring to be brief I give space only to the high points of it.

The Committee adopts in part the report of its predecessor on the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1933, as follows:

> "We report these facts and state that no substantial relief is possible for agriculture until the policy of deflation is not only checked but reversed and a substantial sum of actual money is admitted and, if need be, forced into circulation . . .
>
> "We report further that no just, substantial, reliable, or permanent relief can be provided agriculture or any other industry until the money question is considered and adjusted."

The Committee then on its own behalf says:

> "Now a new question has arisen, as follows: How cheap should the dollars be made and how high should prices be raised in order to serve the best interests of our people?
>
> "While the dollar was being cheapened and prices were going up, prosperity increased and all were happy. Since last March the dollar has increased in value from $1.13 to $1.19, causing prices to fall, unemployment to increase, depression to come again, and now business of all kinds has slowed down and a new depression is threatened.
>
> "In 1926, during the era of so-called Coolidge prosperity, the dollar was valued in all commodities at 100 cents. In 1929, when the depression came upon the country, the value of the dollar had gone up to $1.05. Today, with much higher taxes and an almost doubled national debt, the dollar value is $1.19.
>
> "The committee is of the opinion and reports that to date we have not cheapened the dollar sufficiently to raise the price level high enough to show sufficient profits upon which taxes are paid to balance the Budget.
>
> "A high price level produces high commodity prices, high wages, high farm income, high national income, and consequently high tax income to the Treasury. A high price level produces happiness, progress and prosperity. (As true as gospel.)
>
> "A low price level produces exactly the reverse results.

"In 1919, with a high price level, we had incomes and values as follows:

National income	$69,000,000,000
Value of farm property	66,000,000,000
Value of farm income	13,000,000,000
Value of exports	8,200,000,000
Income to Treasury	6,007,000,000

"In 1932, with a low price level, we had incomes and values as follows:

National income	$39,000,000,000
Value of farm property	36,000,000,000
Value of farm income	5,000,000,000
Value of exports	1,600,000,000
Income to Treasury	2,100,000,000

"From the foregoing it is obvious that the price level has a controlling influence upon our domestic economy. The record shows that from 1919 to 1929 we had a price level sufficiently high to permit of the collection of taxes in sufficient sums to not only keep the Budget balanced but, in addition, to reduce the national debt in the sum of $1,000,000,000 per year.

"The committee is of the opinion and reports that the price level is now too low and recommends that existing powers be used and, if necessary, new legislation be enacted for the purpose, among others, of bringing about an increase in such price level to assist the farmers in securing parity prices for their products."

With this clear conception of the one and only remedy by the President and these distinguished Senators, it is difficult to understand or explain why such remedy has not been employed. Indeed, I can find no explanation for it except in the Protocols. This does not imply that the members of this committee or a majority of the members of Congress are the puppets of the Elders. On the other hand I believe in the integrity of Congress as a whole, and in the loyalty and patriotism of this committee. They accepted the President's farm bill as being the best that they could get at this time.

There are many excuses for the members of Congress that do not apply to the President. He and his Administration represent the leadership of the Democratic Party. It is considered mutiny for the members of the party to refuse to follow his leadership. The Republican Party is now so poorly represented in Congress that it can scarcely be called an opposition party.

Moreover, there is the mighty power of the Jewish-owned press to be considered. There is scarcely an editor or columnist who does no decry and ridicule inflation. Many of them do not know what it means, but they do know that their bosses are opposed to it and that they are expected to voice the views of their pay-check. Our members of Congress live, year in and year out, in a political atmosphere created by this "kept" press. They are susceptible to its flattery and fear its ridicule.

Let a congressman stand for the interest of the masses of the people and he is a dangerous demagogue and an irresponsible radical. Let him stand for the program of the "Elders" and he is a great and wise statesman and a profound economist. They have boosted Carter Glass so much that he himself has come to think that he is wise and virtuous and knows more about the money question than John Stuart Mill ever knew. The Elders have made the word "inflation" a by-word and a term of reproach. No congressman will dare confess himself an inflationist. He may not want to be called a deflationist, and he may be willing to be termed a reflationist, but never an inflationist.

The Committee truly said in this report, and it took courage to say it in the Washington atmosphere, "a high price level (inflation) produces happiness, progress, and prosperity; a low price level produces exactly the reverse results." President Roosevelt and Barney Baruch know that is true. President Roosevelt has the power to create the "high price level"; he knows what to do, and how to do it,—but he refuses to act.

He listens to Barney Baruch and his gang, the bunch that financed his campaign, and not to the voice of the people who elected him and who are represented by their congressmen and senators. Barney Baruch's entire argument before the Senate Finance Committee was against inflation; he piously said that if inflation was the only remedy he would favor it, but he knew that it was not, that we had plenty of money waiting for employment and that all we need was "confidence," and he proposed the "new deal" as being the true remedy, outlining the program which the Roosevelt Administration has religiously followed up to this writing.

Congress should either exercise its power to fix and regulate the value of the dollar, or repeal the 10% tax on state bank notes so that the States may do so. If this tax should be repealed each State could issue its own state bank currency and thereby establish its own price level. This was the condition that existed prior to the war between the States.

XXVII.

BANKRUPTCY

"Every kind of loan proves infirmity in the State and a want of understanding of the rights of the State. Loans hang like a sword of Damocles over the heads of rulers, who, instead of taking from their subjects by a temporary tax, come begging with outstretched palm of our bankers. Foreign loans are leeches which there is no possibility of removing from the body of the State until they fall off of themselves or the State flings them off. But the goyim States do not tear them off; they go on persisting in putting more on to themselves so that they must inevitably perish, drained by voluntary bloodletting."— From Protocol 20.

If the language of the President in his message to Congress of January 15, 1934, has any meaning at all, it means that the President clearly understands that the Federal government can establish any level of value for money, goods, and service that it desires, by the employment of its sovereign power to issue money. Every man who has any knowledge of money knows that this is true. It means also that he recognizes that it is the "high prerogative" of government to issue and control the volume and value of money. It means also that he proposed to exercise this "high prerogative" and that he desired the necessary authority for that purpose. He has often expressed his purpose to restore the values of 1929, but has never yet taken an intelligent step in that direction.

Congress enacted the legislation that he desired and recommended. He has been in supreme command for the past seven years. What has he done about it? Has the Federal Reserve System been overthrown or taken over by the government? No. It still operates at the same old stand and in the same old way. Have the values of 1929 been restored and established upon the solid basis of an adequate volume of money? No, no, no; far from it.

In pursuance of the President's message Congress enacted the Connally bill devaluing gold to the extent of 40 per cent, which in terms of dollars increased our stock of gold correspondingly. If this measure had been followed by the increase of currency to the same extent, it would have depreciated the value of money and increased the value of goods and service correspondingly. In other words, it would have increased wages and the value of all products and of all property approximately 40 per cent, and to about the 1929 level.

But not one dollar of additional currency was put in circulation as a result of it. It did, however, increase the value of our export products that must be paid for in gold or its equivalent. Congress also passed the Thomas bill which authorized the President to purchase silver and gold, and which sought to remonetize silver and thereby increase the volume of our circulating medium. The President was authorized by this act to purchase both gold and silver and to pay for the same with gold and silver certificates.

We have bought the huge sum of $8,660,000,000 of gold at $35 an ounce within the past four years, principally from Great Britain and Russia. This gold was worth, prior to its devaluation, $20.67 an ounce. The premium that we have paid for it amounts to $3,500,000,000. The reason we are getting all of it is the fact that we are paying the highest price for it. We are also getting large quantities, sent here for safe keeping, by foreign banks and foreign Jews.

The plan pursued is to sell U. S. bonds and thereby acquire the money to purchase the gold. This necessarily means that our good dollars are sent to Russia, Great Britain and other foreign countries in payment of their useless gold, and to that extent depletes our meager supply of dollars and their meager supply of gold. It should be remembered that this money although sent to foreign countries, is counted by the Treasury Department as being in circulation here and constitutes a part of our $42.02 per capita circulation.

The worst of this operation is that it has saddled the American people with a debt of $8,660,000,00 with an annual interest charge of about $200,000,000. If certificates had been issued against this gold as it was purchased and as was contemplated by Congress, the certificates and gold would offset each other, there would be no liability and no interest charge, and the gold would still be in circulation because the certificate holders could demand it. If certificates should now be issued against it we would have $8,660,000,000 of gold against which there would be $8,660,000,000 of bonds and $8,660,00000 of certificates and we would be out the huge sum of $8,660,000,000 plus interest.

Moreover if certificates had been issued against the gold as purchased there would be that much more money in circulation in the world, and world prices including our own would be higher, precisely to the same extent. As it is, the gold now lies dead and buried. It is of no earthly advantage to us or to the people of the world. The people of the world are poorer to that extent and we are poorer to the same extent plus $8,660,000,000 of bonds; and world prices are lower to precisely the same extent.

Suppose we acquire substantially all of the gold of the world, as appears to be the plan of this regime. Whether it is the plan or not, it is sure to happen if we continue to pay a 41 per cent premium. What then? Obviously we cannot sell our excess products because the people of the world will have no money with which to buy them. Obviously we cannot sell our gold, for the same reason, and for the additional reason that most of the countries of the world already owe us debts that they cannot or will not pay.

Gold must perforce be abandoned as a medium of international exchange and some other medium adopted or else the people of the world must resort to the primitive cumbersome method of barter and exchange of goods. Germany has already been forced to do this very thing and she is doing it so successfully that her people are prosperous. Secretary Hull complains that she has thereby knocked out his reciprocal trade agreements;—a poor alibi is better than none.

We have bought $1,642,000,000 of silver, issuing silver certificates therefore, which have gone into circulation in the countries from which the silver was bought, including our own. This is in accord with the intent of Congress and of the law, and this is precisely what should have been done in the purchase of gold. These silver certificates would have added to our circulating medium except for the fact that the Federal Reserve management withdrew and cancelled a corresponding volume of Federal Reserve notes.

The net result of the operation of this law is to make a bad situation infinitely worse. We have got $8,660,000,000 of useless gold and issued and sold $8,660,000,000 of bonds that must be paid by the toiling masses. We have $1,642,000,000 of silver certificates but no more money, since they have cancelled the same quantity of Federal Reserve notes. In fact, we have less, for they have sent vast quantities of our money to England and other countries in payment of gold and silver.[49]

This infamous stabilization-fund bill passed the House by a strict party vote; all of the Democrats voting for it and all of the Republicans against it. The party management of the two parties must have "cracked the whip." It appears from the discussion that the Wall Street gang was on hand, as usual on money bills, urging the adoption of the bill. This means that the Rothschild power was behind the bill. If the Republicans had been in power the result would probably have been the same, viz: all of the Republicans would have voted for the bill and all of the Democrats against it. If the Rothschilds had needed a few Republican votes to pass the bill they would have found them.

[49] See Congressional Record, 76th Congress, April 20 and 21 1939, Pages 6366-8 and 6421-5.

It is estimated that as a result of the administration of this Act we now have, dead and buried, "sterilized" if you please, the huge sum of about $20,400,000,000 of gold and that we are acquiring it at the rate of $3,276,000,000 per annum. There is left only $7,462,000,000 in the balance of the world. At the rate we are going we will get it all in about two years. What then? Besides this, there is or may be another $2,000,000,000 that Congress gave Morgenthau for the stabilization of foreign exchange. It has passed out of sight; the Lord only knows what he has done with it. He reports that he made $10,000,000 on the purchase of French francs and kindred activities during his four years administration of the fund. If he had paid off government bonds instead of speculating with the fund he would have saved the taxpayers about $240,000,000 in interest. It was charged that he clandestinely loaned the greater part of the fund to England and France; and he very strenuously objected to an audit of it.

If all this money was resurrected and brought to life through putting it in circulation by the payment of government bonds or otherwise, it would not only reduce the national debt about $20,000,000,000 but it would establish a home market for substantially all of our products, restore the full employment of labor, and restore values and the solvency of men and governments, would automatically do away with all of the plausible excuses for the New Deal and there would be no need for Morgenthau's stabilization fund.

The late lamented Arthur Brisbane said of the burial of our cold: "It is enough to make angels laugh to see men of South Africa digging gold out of a hole, and Americans buying and burying the same gold in a hole!"

The President is now proposing to increase the national debt limit from $45,000,000,000 to $49,000,000,000 and to levy additional taxes. His chief aims have been from the beginning to create more debt and levy more taxes and bankrupt the country and he has pursued these aims consistently from the very beginning. Our national indebtedness, funded and unfunded, and including appropriations is now more than $70,000,000,000 and it is being increased at a very rapid rate.

It is reported that Roosevelt has created 51 new bureaucratic agencies with the power to legislate, to interpret, and to administer their own rules and regulations. During the seven years of his administration he has received $40,089,857,000 from taxes and spent $65,628,526,000,—leaving a deficit of $25,538,668,000, which has been funded into bonds. With the exception of the administration of President Wilson the total expenditures of our government from its beginning in 1776 up to the "Jew Deal" have been only $55,265,107,000. Thus it will be noted that he has spent more than $10,000,000,000 in excess of the expenditures of all administrations from Washington's down,—with the single exception of Wilson's. This does not include the money recently authorized for alleged defense purposes amounting to about $17,000,000,000.

President Roosevelt and the Jew kept press and the Jew columnists are now whooping up a war scare. They have already stampeded Congress into authorizing about $7,000,000,000 for armaments when we are now in less danger of invasion by a foreign foe than in the past thirty years. Our most promising prospect is Japan, but she is busy in China and will be exhausted by the time she gets through with that job.

Germany is not even a remote prospect, for she is no longer ruled by Jews. Germany, even if she conquers Britain, will likely create a United States of Europe, which they said was their objective. It will be less aggressive than a United States of Europe under Jewish control for the German people are an industrious, home-loving, peaceful people, who acquire wealth by creating it, and not by manipulation of currencies and markets, as do the Jews.

Germany has never acquired or sought to acquire a foot of soil in our country, as have both Britain and France. She could not be more of a bully as mistress of the seas than Great Britain has proven herself to be.

Great Britain has, in flagrant violation of international law, declared a blockade of the entire world, from the Arctic Circle to Africa, to prevent the possibility of supplies reaching Germany. She has announced that she would not even allow the shipment of food to the famine-stricken people of Europe. This is all manufactured war hysteria for the purposes of getting more money to be squandered, and of bankrupting our country and of creating a dictatorship of the proletariat and of continuing Franklin D. Roosevelt in office as our dictator. It is either for these purposes or for intervention in the present war. IT IS NOT FOR DEFENSE.

Our national government and many of our city governments are now bankrupt. They have reached their limit of taxation. Real estate has become more of a liability than an asset and much of it has been sold for taxes. The national government has levied a heavy income tax on undistributed profits which is stifling small industries, retarding the expansion of the large ones, and discouraging the creation of new ones. And now they have made a flat increase of the rate that will crush many of the small industries. But few people care to invest in a new industry, assuming all the risk of loss if it is a failure, when the government will get most of the profits if it is a success.

President Roosevelt stated the situation that prevailed at the time of his election, on page 62 of his book "On Our Way," as follows:

> "In talking with people about our basic economic troubles I have often drawn for them a picture showing two columns, one representing what the United States was worth in terms of dollars and the other representing what the United States owed in terms of dollars. The figure covered all property and all debts, public, corporate and individual. In 1929, the total of the assets in terms of dollars was much larger than the total of the debts. But, by the spring of 1933 while the total of the debts was still just as great, the total of the assets had shrunk to below that of the debts.
>
> "Two courses were open: to cut down the debts through bankruptcies and foreclosures to such a point that they would be below property values; or else to increase property values until they were greater than the debts. Obviously, the latter course was the only legitimate method of putting the country back on its feet without destroying human values."

That condition is infinitely worse today. There has been no increase of our property values, but there has been a very great increase in our debts and taxes. Our situation is now more critical than ever before in the history of our country. Our national wealth is now estimated at about $250,000,000,000, which is too high, and our aggregate debts are estimated at about the same figure. We are insolvent and on the brink of a debacle. This is all in accord with the protocols and the code of the communists; "the law of our bank."

The only remedy is the cancellation of all bonds and mortgage debts. This can be done either by inflation or by law. The former is the method adopted by the Jews when they were in control of the German government, is the less painful, and therefore the best. The protocol quoted above says in substance that "debts are leeches" but that we haven't sense enough to "tear them off;" that if we do not do so we will "inevitably perish by voluntary bloodletting." The latter statement is true, but let us hope that we do have sense enough to "tear off the leeches" before it is too late to save ourselves and our government.

It is but just that these bonds and mortgages should be cancelled. They are owned largely by the Rothschild and other Jew institutions. They—the Rothschilds and their lackeys—have robbed us of our substance and exhausted our resources and forced us to borrow their money.

The cancellation of debts is by no means a novel experiment. It was adopted by the rulers of Rome and Greece, and history records the fact that by reason thereof the lives of both of these empires were prolonged. The Jews themselves had their "jubilee" year every fifty years, when they cancelled all mortgage debts and freed those of their own race who had themselves become bonded by debt.

XXVIII.

POVERTY AND DESPAIR

"The aristocracy, which enjoyed by law the labor of the workers, was interested in seeing that the workers were well fed, healthy and strong. We are interested in just the opposite—in the diminution, the killing out of the Goyim. Our power is in the chronic shortness of food and physical weakness of the worker because by all that this implies he is made the slave of our will, and he will not find in his own authorities either strength or energy to set against our will. Hunger creates the right of capital to rule the worker more surely than it was given the aristocracy by the legal authority of kings. By want and the envy and hatred which it engenders we shall move the mobs and with their hands we shall wipe out all those who hinder us on our way."—From Protocol 3.

In the administration of law we are conclusively presumed to intend the consequences of our acts. This standard applies to all of us, high and low, rich and poor, male and female, black and white; it is universal. We cannot commit murder or theft and be heard to say that our intentions were good. If this standard be applied to President Roosevelt—(and why should it not?)—we must conclude that the President has intended and still intends to bankrupt the government and people of the United States; to destroy local self-government and to create a Super-Government having sovereign power over all the activities of the people, intra-state as well as inter-state.

Why should the President do these wicked and terrible things to us, his trusting friends? Why such evil designs, and why does he pursue them so ruthlessly and so relentlessly? Why, oh why, does he preach the right remedy and adopt the wrong one? If the Protocols and the designs of the Elders are not the answer, then what is it?

I can find but one answer, namely, the Protocols, and the program of the Elders who financed his campaign and brought about his nomination for the presidency. They want a dictatorship and must have it in order to destroy our government and to establish their kingdom. A contented, happy people will not tolerate war except as a defensive measure, but a poverty stricken, discontented, restless people are ready for any change. Really, war, as destructive and horrible as it is, is not much worse than peace with deflation accompanied by its want and misery and degradation.

If war should be declared then all of the President's reforms, including the regimentation of industry, agriculture, and labor, would be legal and defensible as war measures and there would then be no need for packing the Supreme Court. The President would then be our dictator or king, and in his glory.

In his message to Congress, Jan. 3, 1940, the President said:

> "You are well aware that Dictatorships have originated in almost every case in the necessity for drastic action to improve internal conditions where democratic action has failed to respond to modern demands."

There are two routes to a dictatorship: one is poverty and despair and the other is war. The war road led to the dictatorship of Stalin and the very recent one of Winston Churchill; and the poverty route to the dictatorships of Hitler and Mussolini.

President Roosevelt has been pursuing both routes. He and the "kept" press have neglected no opportunities to create a war sentiment and at the same time he has been diligently and relentlessly paving the way for a dictatorship of the proletariat through poverty and distress. There may be some relief from it for a short period of time because of the huge expenditure on government armaments but the underlying conditions remain and our escape will only be temporary. Sooner or later there will be a revolt of such proportions in the form of strikes or otherwise as will enable the President to declare an emergency and himself as dictator.

The following is a comparative statement of the value of our money with that of other leading commercial nations:

FOREIGN EXCHANGE RATES

(Value of foreign currencies in terms of dollars and cents)

	1929	1940
England (pound)	$4.86	$3.15
France (franc)	039	.17 3/4
Canada (dollar)	99	.7880
Argentina (peso)	95	.2260
Mexico (peso)	48	.1690
Japan (yen)	46	.2348

The 1929 column represents the comparative values when we had reasonably high prices and wages and a reasonable degree of prosperity. The 1940 column represents the value when we have low prices and wages and 10,000,000 unemployed men.

The explanation is simple. It will be observed that our dollar is more than double the value of most foreign currencies. This necessarily means that the foreigner must pay $2 of his money to buy $1 of our products as measured by our money. It means also that he will buy from other countries that can supply him with the same products whose money is near a parity with his own and where he will not be required to pay this premium.

Conversely it means that the Jewish importers—and practically all of them are Jews—can buy $2 of foreign goods with $1 of our money. It means also that the foreign manufacturer can manufacture his goods at approximately half the cost of ours because he pays for his raw material, labor, taxes, etc., with cheaper money. It means also that the importer can sell the imported article at a less price than it can be produced in this country.

To illustrate further: With wheat at $1 per bushel a Canadian dollar would have bought one bushel of our wheat in 1929, it will now buy slightly more than three-fourths of a bushel; two Mexican pesos would have bought practically a bushel, it now requires six pesos; an Argentina peso would have bought a bushel, it now takes four; two Japanese yen would have then bought a bushel, it now takes four. The worst of it is that these two Japanese yen could in 1929 have bought a bushel of Argentine wheat, but now they can buy four bushels, which means that they will buy Argentine wheat in preference to ours.

Congress extended the life of the Hull reciprocal trade program by a strict party vote; a majority of the democrats voting for the extension and all the republicans against it. This means that the American producer cannot have the advantage of even his home market. It also necessarily means his bankruptcy and the unemployment of labor. These two New Deal policies taken together will drive the final spikes in the coffin of the American producer, whether farmer or manufacturer. They are fine things for the comparatively few Jewish importers, but they will complete the ruin and destruction of the American farmer, industrialists and laborers. They pave the way for the dictatorship of the proletariat, and they were intended for that purpose. The following lines from an unknown author describe present conditions:

"Mr. Roosevelt is my shepherd And I am in want;
He maketh me to lie down on park benches,
He leadeth me beside still factories,
He disturbeth my soul.
He leadeth me in the paths of destitution for his party's sake.
Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of the depression,
I anticipate no recovery, for he is with me;
His policies, his diplomacies, they frighten me;
He prepareth a reduction in my income,
And in the presence of mine enemies
He anointeth my small income with taxes.
My expenses runneth over,—
Surely, unemployment, want, and poverty shall follow me all the days of my life.
And I shall dwell in a mortgaged home forever."

It is likely that the reciprocal trade agreements will not prove to be as injurious as they were intended to be. Der Fuehrer has cancelled by conquest the agreements negotiated with France, Belgium, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Holland, and Luxembourg.

No matter what the outcome may be the ominous fact is that we now have, and will in the future have, a very limited market for our surplus products, for three reasons: (1) We have alienated most of the countries of Europe and Asia by boycotts and threats of war; (2) they have no gold or American dollars with which to pay; (3) they will be forced to adopt and will adopt a different currency system that will render our hoarded gold useless. Dorothy Thompson stated in one of her syndicated articles that Hitler plans to establish the "United States of Europe," to destroy tariff barriers and to create an independent currency system. It is the logical result of our ownership of 80% of the gold of the world.

There are also two kinds of dictatorships: the one of the Gentile called "fascist," such as the dictatorships of Italy and Germany which were brought about to preserve law and order and the rights of property, and as a protection against the usurpation of the commune. The other, the dictatorship of the Jew, called "communism," such as that of Russia, and more recently of England. The latter is a destructive type of dictatorship,—destructive of law, religion, and freedom, and accompanied by all forms of lawlessness and murder; the latter is Semitic, the former is anti-Semitic.

The excuse for Churchill's dictatorship was the Norway disaster, but it was only an excuse, for Churchill himself was responsible for the disaster and not Chamberlain. The Churchill appointment precipitated the attack on Holland and Belgium which may result in the destruction of the British Empire, but Churchill will continue as dictator despite the disaster, so long as the Jews can keep him there. He has faithfully followed the program of Stalin. His first act was to imprison all anti-Semitics, classing them as "Fifth Columnists," and now he has provided for the death penalty for them. The last report we have is that they are secretly trying Sir Oswald Mosely, which means that he will be convicted and condemned to death; otherwise there would be no occasion for secrecy.

Under the pretense of meeting a grave emergency, viz: a threatened invasion by Germany, President Roosevelt sent a message to congress asking that the bond limit be increased and that additional taxes be imposed. Congressman Andrew Anderson of Minnesota naively observed that this is the sixty-third emergency that has confronted this administration.

The President told Congress in substance to enact this legislation and turn the money over to him to spend and then adjourn and go home; that they couldn't do anything but talk and that they might be in his way. A subservient Congress has already increased the income tax a flat 10%, and provided for a large increase of the tax rate of the little taxpayer, and a small increase of the big one, and they have voted to increase the bond limit from 45 to 49 billion dollars. But the republicans have led a revolt against adjournment and it has been postponed for a time at least.

Germany financed the building of the greatest mechanized war machine in the history of the world without gold and without bonds. With 80% of the gold in the world and the greatest resources of any country, Mr. Roosevelt must have $4,000,000,000 of bonds and an approximate 40% increase in income taxes in order to even make a start. What the bonds and taxes will be by the time he is through no man can foresee. He has not yet even made a suggestion to lighten the tax burden by cheapening the dollar. He is not likely to do so for the simple reason that such act would automatically abolish his W. P. A. and other hand-outs, jeopardize his campaign fund and his dictatorship prospects.

The Wilson administration financed the last war, plus the gifts to the Allies of about $15,000,000,000, with bonds. This was wholly unnecessary and a colossal crime against the American people but we can give that Administration credit for a little breathing spell of about eighteen months of cheap money. Mr. Roosevelt does not propose to give us any respite whatever. His evident purpose is to hold our "feet to the fire" until we are ready to concede him all the power he covets.

As desperate as our financial situation is now, this Administration can finance the whole armament program by simply cheapening the dollar. Mr. Roosevelt knows that this is true, and many members of Congress know it is true. We can pay the bonded indebtedness of $45,000,000,000 plus $10,000,000,000 for armaments with gold certificates having a 40 % gold reserve, which according to all of the orthodox authorities is more than sufficient. Such act would afford instant and complete relief to all of the impoverished people of this stricken land, for it would cheapen money to the extent that they could pay their debts and taxes.

All of the pending bills will place the burden on the poor who do not want war but who must do the fighting. The cheapening of money would put it on the rich, many of whom want war and will profit by it, and few of whom will do any fighting. Unfortunately, the richest of them will escape taxes in any event through their ownership of government tax-exempt bonds and their stock-selling devices.

And now the President proposes that the R. F. C. be authorized to lend the South American countries $500,000,000 against the products of their farms and ranches in order to impound them and to keep them from being sold to Germany. This is just a starter; it is only a white chip. It will require many times that amount and then the scheme will be a failure.

The people of the several countries of South America will not sell us their products unless it is to their advantage to do so. That is a cinch. Germany can and will pay more for them than we can afford to pay. That is also a cinch. It is true we have more gold than Germany, but Germany can manufacturer goods cheaper than we can. That is another cinch. In the last analysis international trade is an exchange of goods. Gold is only the medium of affecting such exchange.

Germany has no bonded indebtedness and we are mortgaged up to the limit "and then some." Our national, state and city governments and our railroads, farms and industries are heavily mortgaged and these mortgages must be paid in interest and taxes. About one-half of our cost of production is composed of interest and taxes. We can't compete with the producers of a country that is free of such burden. We must cancel our debts or we perish. We must free the people from the slavery of debt.

There is no other way.

XXIX.

AMERICA ENTERS THE WAR

"In a word, to sum up our system of keeping the government of the goyim in Europe in check, we shall show our strength to one of them by terrorist attempts and to all, if we allow the possibility of a general rising against us, we shall respond with the guns of America or China or Japan." —From Protocol 7.

The President has at last inveigled us into war. Without authority from Congress and with Congress in session, he authorized the War Department to transfer vast quantities of our arms, munitions, and war equipment to private corporations for the express purpose of being re-sold by them to the Allies, and thereby evading the law. This was done in order to avoid the agreements of the Hague convention of 1907 and the United States Neutrality Act of 1918 which made it illegal for a nation not at war "to furnish any belligerent with troops, ships, munitions of war, money, or with commodities of direct or indirect use in war." These laws apply to nations and not to individuals, and hence this miserable subterfuge.

A few days later, to-wit: on June 10, 1940, President Roosevelt said in a speech at Charlottesville, Va., "We will extend to the opponents of force (the Allies) the material resources of this nation." He thus boldly proclaimed that he would do openly what he first sought to do by indirection and subterfuge. In flagrant disregard of international law and of our own solemn treaty and of our own neutrality law, he pledged without limit the resources of this nation to the Allies. This includes arms, munitions, money, ships, food and supplies of every kind and character that may be required. It means that he has on behalf of our nation, assumed the burden of supporting the war of England when we ourselves are on the verge of bankruptcy, if not bankrupt.

In its ultimate consequences it means much more than that. General Hugh S. Johnson said of the first clandestine transfer of our war supplies: "This is no action short of war. It is war. In defiance of Congress and of the constitution the President by a slick trick . . . has committed us to war." And now he has the cold nerve to boastfully proclaim it to the world. The next step will be to send our ships with munitions and supplies and convoys to the Allies; and the next will be our soldiers; and then as surely as night follows the day, the next will be the destruction of our government, the loss of our liberties, and a dictatorship.

A few days later Roosevelt said in response to an appeal from Premier Reynaud for more help, that he was "doing everything he could for them and that he would continue to do so as long as they would hold out; but that Congress alone had authority to declare war." This promise plainly encouraged them to fight to the bitter end, and told them that they can depend on him for everything in his power, except a declaration of war, for the reason that he was without that authority.

Mr. Churchill explained this appeal to the House of Commons in a speech a few days later. He said that when Reynaud informed him that it would be necessary for France to surrender, he advised Reynaud to appeal to President Roosevelt to now enter the war. What right had either of them to assume that Roosevelt would declare war on their request? Reynaud did appeal and when Roosevelt said he could do no more at this time but advised him to continue the fight,—then it was that France surrendered. Paul Reynaud and his backer, Georges Mandel (Jeroboam Rothschild) then fled the country to escape the wrath of an outraged and deeply injured people.

Now Britain is facing certain defeat with great destruction of life and property. Churchill, Duff-Cooper and Anthony Eden have repeatedly spoken to the English people over the radio in order to allay their fears and resentment. They have promised them that America would soon actively join them and have encouraged them to fight until this help arrives.

Why all of this reliance on America if there has been no promise of help? It all goes back to the peaceful settlement at Munich when Roosevelt led the chorus of "never another Munich." It goes back to the pledges of Bullitt and Kennedy to Poland, France, and England.

The radio commentator, Edwin C. Hill, stated that Roosevelt actually conferred with a few of his friends about himself declaring war, with Congress in session! They no doubt advised against it, and wisely so.

> "Upon what meat doth this our Caesar feed,
> That he is grown so great?"

Congress is now at last evidently afraid of him, for after having tentatively agreed to adjourn on June 22nd the decision was revoked.

We are now at war with Germany and Italy. This war may be extended later to Japan and Spain. Russia may keep out of it in order to be better prepared to administer upon the wreckage when the warring countries are exhausted. We now have in prospect the universal war for which the "Learned Elders of Zion" have been scheming and working since they failed to establish their Super-

Government through the League of Nations. It may result in the kingdom of the "Despot of the blood of Zion" with Roosevelt or Jeroboam Rothschild as such "King-Despot."

The President has already practically assumed the office of dictator, with only an occasional protest from Congress. He has led us into war, with Congress in session, and despite the recent assurances of the majority of the members of Congress that under no circumstances would they permit our country to become involved in the present war except for defense upon our own shores.

It was recently reported in the press that a contract had been made with the Ford Motor Company to manufacture airplane engines for the British Empire and America. Mr. Henry Ford denied the report. He said that his company was willing to make these engines for the defense of America but not for the prosecution of the war by the British. Mr. Knudsen, on behalf of the "Council for National Defense," answered that the contract involved making engines for both governments, and the Committee cancelled the contract because of Mr. Ford's refusal to manufacture engines for the British Empire.

This controversy reveals the following facts: (1) That our alleged "Council for National Defense" is now engaged in buying war equipment for the British Government; (2) that they are more interested in buying for the British Government than for ourselves; (3) that they are making these purchases for the joint account of the United States and the British Governments; (4) it is a fair inference from these facts, that this Committee will make payment for this equipment out of the $5,000,000,000 fund that Congress has provided for that purpose. Thus it appears that we are being taxed to the point of confiscation of property, to support the tottering British Empire and the Rothschild family fortune.

We are in. Make no mistake about that. And we will stay in until our government is destroyed, if Franklin D. Roosevelt is continued in office. And we are not in for the defense of our country; we are in for its destruction.

It is now reasonably clear that England will soon be taken by the Germans,—but that may not end the war. It would end it except for our intervention. It was Churchill himself who said that we did the Allies more harm than good in the last war, because by entering it we delayed the peace for two years. He criticized us for then doing what he now begs us to do. Our entering the war would now do the people of the British Empire more harm than good, for many of them and their possessions will be destroyed if the war is prolonged.

The Senate Naval Affairs Committee, of which Senator David Walsh of Massachusetts is chairman, investigated the rumor that our government had transferred 23 of our war vessels to Great Britain. Mr. Lewis Compton, acting Secretary of the Navy, at first denied that such transfer had been made, but later admitted it; he admitted also that the vessels were not obsolete, and his own responsibility. When the President was advised of this, he contradicted Mr. Compton and informed the committee that he alone was responsible for the transfer. This was probably done in order to prevent further investigation and to save further disclosures.

This transfer is in plain violation of Chap. 30 Title V 3, 40 Stat. 222, U. S. C. A., which prohibits the transfer of a war vessel to a belligerent nation. The President again violated the law by giving Britain 50 of our destroyers with their guns and ammunition and that cost us more than $100,000,000.00,—as proposed by "Sir" John Pershing—This was a pretended exchange for air bases, at first denied but later justified on the ground that it was a good trade. The consideration paid for these 99-year leases of a few thousand acres of cheap land is so grossly exorbitant that it can only be considered a gift and an under-cover entry into the war. This was done by our dictator without the consent of Congress, and with Congress in session. It is either a flagrant violation of our own law; punishable by fine and imprisonment, or it is war. If we are in fact engaged in war with Germany and Italy it is legal and defensible, otherwise it is not. It is evidently intended by the President as an under-cover, back-door entry into the war.

Mr. Churchill recently stated in a speech in the House of Commons that in case Hitler invaded and conquered England that the government would move to Canada and with our help they would continue the fight. In anticipation of such contingency the President made a trip to Canada a few years ago and there made a speech in which he assured the Canadians that the United States would extend the Monroe Doctrine to Canada and would protect them.

This was an unprecedented and unwarranted and unauthorized extension of the Monroe Doctrine. It was never intended to apply to any part of the British Empire, but only to the weak and defenseless countries of South America. It was to prevent future foreign absorption of South America. When this doctrine was first announced Canada was a part of the British Empire and was accepted as such.

It is obvious that this assurance on the part of the President was a premeditated one, in pursuance of a carefully premeditated plan, and in anticipation of the war that the "Elders" then planned and that we now have. They "planned it that way."

They have been preparing the ground for this war for many years. It is evident that Mr. Roosevelt has participated in this conspiracy. That is the explanation of the New Deal with all of its regimentation, the purchase of the gold and silver of the world, the stabilization fund, the extension of the Monroe Doctrine, and of his frantic desire to get us into the war.

If Mr. Hitler is the blood-thirsty, ambitious villain that the Jew press represent him to be, he will declare war on us and he will do it now while we are unprepared and unarmed. He will not wait two or three years until we can gear up our industries and replenish our depleted war equipment. He has more sense than that; he will do it now while he is ready and we are not.

The Mexican government is a vacillating unreliable one that is sometimes friendly to us and sometimes not, according to their interest of the moment; the same is true of Brazil. Offered sufficient inducement, either of them will turn against us. President Vargas recently made a speech in which he in substance welcomed the new order that would accompany German victory and would supplant the decaying civilization of Britain and France, as he described them.

He may be right about it, for they both have the "Jew-rot," which is a combination of graft, bribery, and of great wealth and great poverty. Their inefficiency in war is due primarily to this disease. We suffer from the same cancerous disease gnawing at our vitals, and we will suffer the same fate if we do not eradicate the germs of it.

It is at least a possibility that Brazil will welcome Hitler. In that case, what will become of the steel plant we propose, according to press reports, to build in that country? (Ostensibly, of course, as a defensive measure.) There is now pending in Congress a bill with administration support, to enlarge the powers of the R. F. C. in order to enable it to furnish the required capital. There appears to be no constitutional limitation whatever upon the activities of this vicious administration of our government and of this vicious corporation.

It is at least debatable whether we are justified in going to war to enforce the Monroe Doctrine, and particularly to protect a state that does not ask or want our protection. If it is our fixed policy to enforce this doctrine then we should ourselves respect it.

The Monroe Doctrine demands America for Americans.—but concedes Europe for Europeans and Asia for Asiatics. That is the present position of Japan and Germany and Italy. Japan proposes to enforce it in Asia; Hitler and Mussolini in Europe. However much we may wish to preserve the status quo in the East Indies and the British Empire, it is none of our affair, and there is nothing we can do about it except to go to war and probably destroy ourselves.

> The people of these countries can solve their own problems in their own way, as they have heretofore done,—without our help. Our position should continue to be—as it has always been into maintain friendly relations with whatever governments they establish.

It must be conceded that both Hitler and Mussolini have ample provocation for war. The President has called them names and made faces at them. He said of Mussolini that he was an assassin who "stabbed his neighbor in the back,"—but if he had declared himself on the side of the Allies he would have had the benedictions of the President. It is not incumbent on them to declare war on us, for we first begun war on them by pledging our unlimited support to the Allies. Mr. Roosevelt declared an economic war on Germany more than a year ago by his boycott; and challenged Hitler to arms by withdrawing our Ambassador.

I do not believe that Hitler wants to make war on us or wants anything on this side of the Atlantic Ocean. He certainly does not want our Jews, and he has managed to get along very well without our gold. If we should make the mistake of reelecting Roosevelt for a third term, he may construe this as a ratification of Roosevelt's war-like demonstrations and he may conclude that war is inevitable sooner or later. In that case he may accept Mr. Roosevelt's challenge and wage it while we are unprepared.

No matter what opinion we may have of Mr. Hitler, we must concede that he has been forced into this war; that he was ready to make peace on the basis of restoring to Germany the territory wrongfully taken from her by the peace treaty; and that he has conducted the war according to the rules of civilized warfare.

Mr. Hitler has stated on many occasions that this war is primarily with the Jews, whom he holds responsible for it. They have now been overthrown in all of the countries of Europe except England, their ancient stronghold.

They are now fleeing to this country from all of Europe and our Jew administration has, in violation of law, opened wide our ports to them. They expect to continue their war from here. They have already responded with "the guns of America" and they are working over-time to get our boys into it. They understood their power over our government better than we Americans, for none of us believed they could involve us.

XXX.

SKULDUGGERY

"By our intrigues we shall tangle up all the threads which we have stretched into the cabinets of all States by means of the political, by economic treaties, or loan obligations. . . . In this way the peoples and governments of the goyim, whom we have taught to look only at the outside of whatever we present to their notice, will still continue to accept us as the benefactors and saviors of the human race."—From Protocol 7.

Why have we entered this destructive war upon the losing side? War involves great sacrifice and suffering. It is never justified except for self-defense. The warmongers seek to justify it upon that ground. They tell us that the British navy is our first line of defense. It has never been so used, and neither we nor Great Britain have so regarded it heretofore. But even if that were true it would be far cheaper and more dependable for us to provide our own navy. That is precisely what the government is now proposing to do and for which it has authorized immense appropriations. If our own country is in danger of attack the place to defend it is in our own waters and on our own shores and not in foreign waters and on foreign shores.

On June 10, 1940, there was published in all the leading newspapers of the country a full page advertisement over the signatures of about thirty well known Americans, headed by William Allen White of Emporia, Kansas, with the flaring headline, "Stop Hitler Now." It was followed by an argument advocating our immediate entry into the war. According the press reports, Mr. Roosevelt read the advertisement "and found it to be a great piece of work and extremely educational for the people of the country." Yes, a "great piece of work and extremely educational" for war. This advertisement was paid for by the Rothschild banks of Morgan & Co., Kuhn, Loeb & Co-, and their affiliates.[50]

There are very obvious reasons why "our bank" would like to get America into war.

Until recently the argument was made that we should enter the war on behalf of France because she helped us in our war for independence against Great Britain. This was also one of the arguments for our entering World War I, which resulted so disastrously for the entire world. This argument, however, no longer obtains, since England is now at war with France.

[50] Congressional Record, July 11, 1940, p. 14359-14360.

False Albion treacherously turned upon her former ally, France, and destroyed many of her ships and killed more than 1200 of her seamen. The battle, if it may be so dignified, is thus described by the magazine "Time":

> "In the night of July 2-3 (1940) at various ports of England and Scotland, armed parties of British officers and men quietly boarded all major French ships berthed with the home fleet, mostly at Portsmouth and Plymouth."

They were not able to do this at Oran, which is in French waters, and so they slipped up in the night and mined the waters around the French ships while they were riding peacefully and unsuspectingly at anchor. The British commander then demanded their surrender and upon being refused opened up a murderous fire without warning that destroyed and damaged a number of French ships and killed 1200 men. The British sustained no losses for the reason that the French did not expect an attack by their former ally, their ships were not steamed up and consequently they were in no position to maneuver their guns and to fight.

This was another great British victory (?) and so hailed by the Jew press of England and America. It was another Altmark victory. The only two British victories in this war to date have been against an unarmed foe and in violation of the rules of civilized warfare. No savage would have attacked a prostrate friend without provocation.

French Foreign Minister Baudouin said of it: "Mr. Churchill is guilty of an act of aggression, which is without precedent in the history of the world;" that Britain "must shoulder the blame for the loss of the war for she selfishly thought of the defense of the British Isles and provided only a minimum military aid to France." He later stated that France had furnished three million men and Britain only two hundred thousand.

Baudouin said further that "the British saved four-fifths of their troops from Flanders, embarking them from Dunkerque, while the French lost half of their forces; that the British furnished only 14,000 troops for rear guard operation and the rest of the 200,000 were French." He might have added that the French lost 1,900,000 men in killed, injured and prisoners, which is nine times the number of soldiers furnished by Britain, and more than forty times British casualties.

And now the British have several French ships bottled up in the French Martinique port. Our government has sent four of our destroyers down there. What for? Is it to help our traditional friend and ally, the French? No, no, far from it. Why should we turn against the country that helped us win our independence? A little while ago it was said we owed it to France and to LaFayette to help her. And now she is our enemy? Why? Can it be because the French government refused to allow the city of Paris to be destroyed in order to get us into the war? Can it be because France surrendered after the loss of two-thirds of her army? No, no. These are not the reasons. Whatever the true reason may be we have not entered this war to help France.

We do not yet know the whole truth about all of this war propaganda and the President's activities to involve us in the war, but some of it has come to light. When Germany captured Warsaw, the capital of Poland, she also captured the official archives, and among them a transcript of the negotiations between our government and the Polish government leading up to the war.

It appears therefrom that our ambassador to France, the Jew Bullitt,—just before sailing for Paris "with a whole trunk full of instruments and conversations and directions from President Roosevelt and the State Department and senators who belonged to the Committee on Foreign Affairs,"—held a conference with the Polish Ambassador (to the U. S.) Count Potoki. This conference was reported by Count Potoki to his government in part as follows:

> "3. It is the decided opinion of the President that France and Britain must put an end to any sort of compromise with the totalitarian countries. They must not let themselves in for any discussions aiming at any kind of territorial changes.
>
> "4. They have the moral assurance that the United States will leave the policy of isolation and be prepared to intervene actively on the side of Britain and France in case of war. America is ready to place its whole wealth of money and raw materials at their disposal."[51]

It appears further from these official notes that the President was quite urgent that Poland should reject Germany's demand for return of the Danzig Corridor and that Britain and France should support Poland in this position and should declare war on Germany if she (Germany) undertook to take it by force. Beck refused to keep his engagement with Hitler. This was followed by Hitler's invasion of Poland and a declaration of war on the part of Britain and France against Germany, as pointed out in a previous chapter.

[51] Congressional Record, July 11, 1940, p. 14371.

Thus it appears that President Roosevelt is himself primarily responsible for the war. We can now understand why Reynaud on Churchill's advice, issued his distress call to Roosevelt to come in. We can see why the President said in substance in reply: fight on to the end; I am doing everything I can.

This explains also the speeches that are being made from time to time by Churchill, Duff-Cooper and Eden, encouraging the people of England to continue the fight on the ground that the United States will later enter the war. It explains their oftrepeated published statement that this is our war and that they are fighting it for us.

It is not our war. It is the war of our Jews, of French Jews, and British Jews. The French Jews have been overthrown and have fled the country. The British Jews are still in power, and so are ours. It is a war to save the Jew Empire and the gold standard and to destroy our government and to enslave us. It is a war to establish the "King despot of the blood of Zion." England can make peace now without the immense destruction of life and property that will soon follow, but she cannot save the Jewish empire. It is doomed.

Nor can we save it. Roosevelt is still working feverishly to that end but the result here will be what it has been in Europe. They have not yet initiated pogroms in Europe but the people of France, Hungary, Romania and Spain have disfranchised the Jews, barred them from holding office, and from their newspaper activities. That must be done here. If it is not done the activities of the President and his Jewish administration will bring upon us the death and destruction that he has already caused in Europe.

Our imperial President is now organizing us and the western hemisphere for war. Our new Secretary of War Stimson is endeavoring to ramrod a compulsory conscription bill through Congress that will involve an additional estimated annual expense of $1,100,000,000.

Suppose we now had one million trained soldiers fully armed and equipped and a powerful two-ocean navy, does anyone doubt for a moment that we would be up to our ears in this war? There are but two things that will keep us out when we are fully prepared: one is Roosevelt's defeat; the other that the war will be over.

The war would now be over but for the interference of President Roosevelt. He is now telling Churchill the same story he told Reynaud: "fight on, I am doing all I can." They would not continue this losing fight except for the fact that both of our presidential candidates are committed to war and we are making preparations to get into it at the earliest possible moment.

England will likely soon surrender but the Churchill plan is to remove the British government to Canada and to continue the fight from there. The President is now seeking to line up the South American countries in order to mobilize a solid western hemisphere front against Europe and Asia, and to do so is offering them $500,000,000 in some concealed form as a token of good faith. They appear to be suspicious of him,—and with good cause.

The Argentine representative, Mr. Melo, expressed opposition to "sacrificing his country's jurisdictional principles." He said very properly that the question of the disposition of the French and other islands should be left to the people of such islands and that the United States and the South American countries had no right to assume a "collective trusteeship" over them. He said also,—and congress should take note of it—that the "proper time to cross a bridge is when it is reached," and that no action should be taken which is "based on a mere hypothesis."

A face-saving compromise was finally agreed upon which was signed by Mexico, Chile, Bolivia, Colombia, Venezuela, Peru, and Argentina, subject to the approval of their respective legislative bodies. Interpreted, it means that if they hereafter find it to their advantage to work with the United States they will do so, otherwise they will not. It means precisely nothing; the conference was a fizzle. But that small circumstance does not restrain the Administration. Mr. Roosevelt still insists in flagrant violation of our national constitution that congress authorize the Export- Import Bank to lend the South American countries $500,000,000 which they will no doubt accept and which we will likely lose.

The real purpose of the conference was not apparent on the surface. It was not primarily to establish a cartel for the purpose of acquiring and disposing of the products of the Americas; nor to establish a "collective trusteeship" over the foreign-controlled islands of the western hemisphere. These were probably incidental objectives but they were not the moving cause of the Jews who brought about this conference. The true purpose of it was to weld the Americas and Canada together into a compact fighting unit and to preserve the gold standard. It was a Jew scheme concocted by the Jew Adolph Berle, Assistant Secretary of State, in furtherance of their purpose to destroy our government.

The reason is war. The conference was held in anticipation of the British moving their government to Canada, for there can be no long war otherwise. It was a step to incorporate the Americas into the British Empire, for otherwise the British have no means to prolong the war when they get here. Apparently the South American countries understand the true import of it and they don't want it.

XXXI.

PARTY GOVERNMENT

"By the ceaseless praise of Democratic Rule we shall divide the Christians into political parties, we shall destroy the unity of their nations, we shall sow discord everywhere. Reduced to impotence, they will bow before the Law of Our Bank, always united, and always devoted to our Cause."—From Funeral Oration of Rabbi Reichhorn. (Addendum to Protocols.)

It is shocking to learn that the Jews are responsible for the creation of political parties and that they have caused them to be organized for the purpose of promoting discord and confusion, and to subject us to the "law of our bank." The rule of political parties has until recent years been universal throughout the world even in those countries where the head of the nation was a king or an emperor. They have within the past few years been abolished in Germany, Italy, Spain, and Hungary, and more recently in Romania and France, together with the Jewish Continental free masonry and B'nai B'rith. These governments are now called "totalitarian" in contra-distinction to those ruled by the Jews and political parties called "democratic."

We have all prided ourselves more or less on our party loyalty and regularity. We boast that we have never "scratched the ticket" and that our fathers before us were democrats or republicans, as the case may be. We all believe that our party stands for sound economic and political policies and that the opposition party is against them, and we are always ready to defend the party's principles as proclaimed in its platform.

Observe the phrase "law of our bank." It indicates that there is one law and one bank. There is in fact but one Jewish law and one Jewish bank and it is "always united and always devoted to our cause." Observe also the possessive, "our bank." It is a direct recognition of the fact that this bank (the Rothschild bank) belongs to the Jewish race, and that the objective of this bank is the objective of the Jewish race.

At the time of this Funeral Oration in 1869 the Jews generally were desperately poor, without citizenship, and living in squalor in the ghettos of the various cities of Europe. There are now many wealthy Jews but the wealth of many of them has stemmed from the Rothschild root. The Rothschild fortune, magnified as it has been during the years since it was founded, with all of its branches and affiliates, is still "united and devoted to our cause." It was devoted to that purpose by its founder, old Amschel, and it has been so employed ever since.

The "law of our bank" represents the ruthless law that has governed what we call "high finance" or "Wall Street" since the civil war. It represents the law that controls the Bank of England and other Rothschild banks. The record of the money power for the past 100 years demonstrates the truth of the conclusion that it is "always united and always devoted to our cause," and that "cause" is the subjugation and enslavement of the Gentiles and the elevation and enthronement of the Jews. That is the present objective of Jeroboam Rothschild and his secret 300 Elders of Zion.

They have sought to incorporate this international banking power and to give it a legal status by establishing the Bank of International Settlements but to date the undertaking has not proven to be very successful. Under the pretense of providing a clearing house for the settlement of German reparations an international conference was held by government appointed representatives that resulted in the creation of this bank with a capital of $100,000,000.

President Hoover appointed Thos. W. Lamont and Owen D. Young as our representatives to this conference. J. P. Morgan & Co. subscribed $25,000,000 of the capital, the balance of the stock being subscribed by the Bank of England and other central banks. It is strictly a Rothschild super-bank for the purpose of regulating the economy and welfare of the people of the world.

The "law of our bank" is also the law of the Jewish rabbi and the Jewish leaders. The Rothschilds and their Council of the Jewish Agency (the 300 Learned Elders of Zion) are the despotic rulers of the Jewish race. The despot of Zion is already established so far as the Jews are concerned. Some of them are not active Zionists but they are all obedient, and most of them are sympathetic.

This address of Rabbi Reichhorn was a carefully prepared statement of the plans and purposes of the Jewish race, made by a distinguished Jewish leader on a solemn occasion, in honor of a departed leader. It sets them forth with clarity and precision. It is copied in full in Appendix II at the end of this book.

We have been divided into two political parties here in America, viz: the democratic and republican, and the Rothschild banking interest through Baruch, Lamont, et al., and the lavish use of money has acquired control of both of them. There is never any division between the parties where the vital interest of this malign power is concerned.

A striking example of the truth of this statement is afforded by the enactment of the Federal Reserve Act. It was first attempted through the Republican Party and having failed because of democratic opposition, the Republican Party was defeated and it was then put over in disguise and by deception through the Democratic Party.

We have just had two party conventions and the two parties have announced their platforms. There is a shade of difference between them but not enough to enthuse over. In their essentials they are the same. They both pretend isolationism but they both nominate interventionist candidates. They both stand for a continuation of the New Deal, for Secretary Hull's reciprocal trade agreements, and for the regimentation of the people of America.

The nominees of both parties are satisfactory to the Rothschild interest. The British and the Jews and the Jew press hail Willkie's nomination as a great victory for the warmongers,—and so it was. They could afford to spend $100,000,000 to bring about his nomination, and they may have done so. Who knows? We do know that from the date of his announcement he was given great and favorable publicity by the Jew press, the Jew radio, and the Jew cinema. Whenever his name was mentioned in the convention hall the packed Jew galleries responded with great applause. With a good radio one could distinguish the Yiddish accent and the Soviet yell.

The republicans could have won the election "hands down" with Dewey or Vandenberg or any other respectable non-interventionist, but republican victory meant nothing to Baruch, Lamont, Lippman and the other Jew politicians. They want war. It is true the republican platform declares against war, but platforms mean nothing to a Jew warmonger or a Jew sponsored candidate. He will do exactly as the Jews want him to do,—as Roosevelt has done. If he values his life he will not dare double-cross the Rothschild power.

The sponsors of the Willkie campaign were Barney Baruch representing the Kuhn, Loeb interest and Thomas W. Lamont representing Morgan & Co. They were powerfully aided by the Jew press, radio, etc., and such columnists as Walter Lippman, Dorothy Thompson and other warmongers. Some of these sponsors were likewise sponsors for Roosevelt's third term. They no doubt prefer Roosevelt but fear their ability to elect him and they have therefore selected an opposition candidate who has pledged himself to carry out his and their program.

> "The Day," calling itself "The National Jewish Daily," printed in Yiddish at 183 East Broadway, New York City, Rabbi Samuel Margoshes, Editor, born in Galicia, published in English on July 7, 1940, the following amazing interview with Republican Presidential Nominee Wendell L. Willkie, in the Editor's column:

"I regard anti-Semitism in America as a criminal movement and every anti-Semite as a traitor to America. I spoke over the radio making clear my attitude toward the Jews, long before I even thought of becoming a candidate for the Presidency. I am glad to have an opportunity of expressing my sentiments again . . . What we require are laws by means of which we shall be enabled to eliminate those who would transplant on American soil the poisonous growth from Germany and other countries."[52]

Mr. Willkie's secret commitment to the Jews sheds a flood of light upon the Jewish enthusiasm for him as shown in their press and the thousands of telegrams sent to the republican national convention delegates and the boisterous gallery applause.

If the law that Mr. Willkie advocates is enacted then the author of this book is a traitor and is made a criminal, although every word contained in it is the truth. It is not the conclusions here stated that create anti-Semitism but it is the conduct and purposes of the Jewish leaders that create it. The Jews have enough power without such a law. They have the power to persecute and to injure any man who dares criticize them and they exercise it ruthlessly,—and yet the truth must be told if conditions here pointed out are ever to be corrected by peaceful methods.

So far as the Rothschild interest in concerned, it appears to be safe with either Roosevelt or Willkie. They no doubt prefer Roosevelt because he has proven to be their faithful and dependable servant but they will support Willkie if they think he stands the best chance of election. As to the balance of us, it is the difference between tweedledum and tweedledee.

Senator McNary, republican nominee for Vice President, is decidedly preferable to Wallace. He appears to be an honest, straight-forward, courageous and capable man. He is at least a genuine friend of the farmer, as shown by the McNary-Haugen bill. This proposed bill would guarantee the farmer the American market and profitable prices for his products, and it would relieve him of the petty and endless regimentation to which he is now subjected.

---

[52] R. E. Edmondson's Bulletin, July 8, 1940.

The Chicago democratic convention was a convention of job-holders and was a cut and dried affair; the most of the delegates to it had been selected by job-holders. Mr. Roosevelt and everyone else knew long before the convention was held that he would be the nominee, and yet he chose to remain silent about his acceptance until after he was nominated. He then dramatically accepted it as a call to service, stating that he had "no desire or purpose" to hold the office for a third term. He is in error. It has been his "desire and purpose" from the beginning, otherwise the convention would not have been stacked. It is simply Mr. Roosevelt's way of doing things, to-wit: to say one thing and mean another.

We must abolish political parties. This is not such a radical suggestion as it appears to be, but only a common sense one. There is no reason why any man should not be permitted to run for any office on his own platform, just as he does for a party nomination. There is no reason—absolutely none—for two elections, one for a party nomination and the other to be elected.

The father of our country, George Washington, gave us good advice upon this subject, as well as upon the subject of foreign entanglements. He strongly condemned party government. If we had only listened to his words of wisdom instead of the sly suggestions of the Jews we would not be in our present deplorable situation. We must destroy the shackles that curb our freedom and that we have forged upon ourselves.

Congress should elect the President. This was the French system and is an improvement over our effete electoral college. It may require a constitutional amendment. This system will minimize many of the evils of a presidential election.

For one thing it will not permit the "Elders" to select for us a candidate satisfactory for their schemes,—a man with "a dark stain, a 'Panama' in his past." For another, it will avoid the tremendous expense of a presidential campaign and thereby void the bribery involved in huge campaign contributions. For still another it will minimize the constant and ever increasing encroachment of the Executive upon the powers of Congress, for the President will be accountable to Congress. And for still another, it will tend to neutralize the power of the foreign vote of the large cities in the election of the President, since it will give all of the small states the advantage of two senatorial votes.

This will, as stated, involve a constitutional amendment, but the constitution itself makes provision for its amendment. The process is a laborious and difficult one, but even so it is far better than the plan of the New Deal, viz: to change the constitution through the interpretations of a handpicked court.

Political parties were designed by the Jews to enable them to corrupt and control governments, and they have been useful instruments in their hands. Through them they can indirectly buy the members of a political party when they could not reach them directly.

We now have the sorry spectacle of southern political leaders such as Barkley, Bankhead and Rayburn blindly supporting all of the vagaries and extravagances and unconstitutional reforms of the New Deal in violation of their professed political principles of a life time. It may be that none of these men could be bought directly and individually by Rothschild gold, but the party can be bought, and they can and are delivered by such purchase.

The results are the same. Their country is "sold down the river" just as effectively and as completely as if each and every one of them had been personally corrupted. This is not peculiar to the Democratic Party. The Republican Party is for sale and is sold like a sack of potatoes, and the leaders of the party are delivered like a sack of potatoes. We have become so inured and blind to party government that many of our politicians openly proclaim their fealty to party over their convictions and their loyalty to their country.

This is not peculiar to America and to our system of government. The same has until recently been true of every country of the world. It is through the corruption of political parties that the Jews have ruled the world; it is their brand of their boasted "democracy." It was evidently true in England when the Peel amendment was adopted. It was true when the McDonald (labor party) government was in power; there was no substantial difference between it and the preceding and succeeding conservative governments. It is true now in England.

The government of the British Empire is today as strongly Jewish as our own; and this control was obtained in the same corrupt manner that they obtained their power here, viz: by the corruption of political parties. The Jews and their propaganda agencies are riding the English and American people hard at this time but they are riding for a fall. We are at last beginning to understand the secret of the power that has misgoverned us so long, and this understanding will make us free, for the truth is mighty.

XXXII.

"KING FRANKLIN, 1ST"

"Ever since that time we have been leading the peoples from one disenchantment to another, so that in the end they should turn also from us in favor of that King-Despot of the blood of Zion, whom we are preparing for the world.

"When the hour strikes for our Sovereign Lord of the entire World to be crowned, it is these same hands (want and envy and hatred) which will sweep away everything that might be a hindrance thereto."—From Protocol 3.

The Rothschilds and their League of Nations will soon transfer their headquarters to our shores. The most of their gold is already stored in the Kentucky vaults, and the President has sent our ships for Jewish refugees and for the balance of it upon the pretext of moving Americans.

The Associated Press reported that "of the 1914 passengers aboard the incoming liner Manhattan, 862 are aliens, mostly Jewish refugees." It was also reported in the press about the same time that several hundred Americans were stranded in Europe because they did not have enough money to pay their passage home. They are of course just plain Americans,—not Jews. We are justified in suspecting that the ship was sent over to afford American protection for the removal of rich Jews with their gold to America. The press only affords us an occasional glimpse of what is transpiring daily.

The "Despot of the blood of Zion" whose ancestors have ruled the British Empire for the past 100 years, clandestinely but with an iron hand, is now headed for America with his gold. It may be that he has already arrived, for I may be in error in my conclusion that Jeroboam is the present ruler of the Rothschild fortune. It is the view of Count Cherep-Spiridovich that it is Edward Rothschild, and if that be true he is now here. On the following page is a reproduction of his picture as it appeared in the daily press with the comment thereon. It was stated in that connection that the $1,000,000 of jewelry was classed as personal property and that he did not pay any duty on it. In appearance he is not much of an improvement over Jeroboam.

The last report on Jeroboam Rothschild (Georges Mandel) is that he fled to Spanish Morocco and that the government of Spain turned him over to the French government to be tried for treason. The United Press of July 29th, 1940, carried the report that the French government has created a special high court of "seven magistrates who will be designated because of their independence of all political ties," for the trial of these alleged traitors.

"REFUGEE ROTHSCHILD ARRIVES WITH MILLION IN GEMS"

"Seventy-year-old Baron Edward Rothschild, internationally famous banker of Paris, is pictured as he arrived at La Guardia field, New York, Wednesday, from Europe aboard the Yankee clipper. The fabulously rich financier is holding a small handbag containing $1,000,000 in jewelry. The baron and his family left Paris on May 20 for Switzerland, made their way to Bordeaux and Spain and then motored to Lisbon to get the clipper. They will go to some suburban retreat in this country for a rest, it was said."

It is further stated in this report that the death penalty will be sought for Mandel (Jeroboam Rothschild) who will be charged with "plotting against the state's security," but that Leon Blum and the other Jewish members will only face "political charges" which involve the penalty of life imprisonment. Let us hope that this will end the ambitious mighty empire founded by the will of Amschel Mayer Rothschild. It is a pity that the French court is without jurisdiction to try the other conspirators who brought about this terrible war.

In his Charlottesville speech on June 10th, 1940, the President, in his discussion of isolationists, said:

> "Such an island represents to me and to the overwhelming majority of Americans today a helpless nightmare of a people without freedom, a people lodged in prison, handcuffed, hungry, and fed through the bars from day to day by the contemptuous, unpitying masters of other countries."

Mr. Roosevelt is mistaken about it. Isolationism does not present any such picture to "the overwhelming majority of Americans." We have been isolationists all of our lives; it is the traditional policy our government, and we have never before feared the loss of our freedom and "an unpitying master." A dictatorship does offer such a prospect but we have no fear of a foreign dictator. We do fear, and with good reason, that Franklin D. Roosevelt will convert the Jew-deal into a Jew-dictatorship.

This is merely inflammatory propaganda for the purpose of creating war sentiment. It is a gruesome, doleful picture that is calculated to scare us into anything. Suppose he gets us into war and becomes our dictator, what assurances have we that he will be any better than "the contemptuous unpitying masters of other continents"?

Churchill has not proven himself to be a better dictator than Hitler. He has imprisoned as "fifth columnists" the anti-Semitics and the critics of his administration, and he has provided for the death penalty for them and has probably killed many of them. The "unpitying masters of other continents" could do no worse. Hitler has treated the Jews no worse. The Flanders retreat which Mr. Churchill ordered after honorable and reasonable terms of surrender had been proposed was a massacre, the extent of which is not unknown.

In the face of certain defeat Churchill appears to be willing to fight until the last Christian is killed. And for what? Not for the soldiers who are fighting a losing battle, nor for their families;—but to preserve an empire that is decayed with "Jewrot" and that is operated "by, of, and for" the Jews.

Another sample of Mr. Churchill's cruelty and ruthlessness has just been revealed by the press report from France of June 15, 1940, as follows:

> "Commenting on the French decision not to defend Paris, authorized spokesmen said: —
>
> " 'For the first time reason prevailed, and for the first time the French acted against the will of the British who wanted a destroyed Paris for propaganda purposes."
>
> "The French are beginning to see they always are called upon to pay the bill.' "

It appears that the French cabinet split upon this very rock. Reynaud, Handel, Blum, and the other Jews in the government agreed to the British scheme but Marshall Petain and the Gentiles refused. The Jewish members became exiles and the French government, after suffering losses of 1,900,000 men in dead, wounded and prisoners, surrendered. And now the British government through a renegade (DeGaulle) has organized an opposition government and is nightly bombing French cities. Our government has also turned on her former ally (?) and has seized her gold stored in the Kentucky vaults and her ships that are in our ports.

We can now very well believe that the Germans are right in claiming that Churchill sank the "Athenia" for propaganda purposes. If he sought the destruction of the great city of Paris with the thousands of helpless men, women and children who would necessarily be in it, for propaganda purposes, he would not balk at the destruction of a ship with a few hundred people on it.

The Associated Press of July 25th, 1940, reports that former Premier Daladier, Mandel (Rothschild) and sixteen others were arrested on their return from French Morocco, where they fled two days before the armistice "was signed. The report states that they will be tried for treason for plunging the country into war, and that in the "name of justice those responsible" for the calamity of France will be punished, and that "on the day of their trial our dead will be present among the accusers."

The government of France now recognizes that the former Jewish government is responsible for the war, and not Germany. In their published statement they say "we are buried under the ruins of a liberal parliamentary capitalist regime. You have lived on lies. The hour of truth now has sounded." We will soon know the names of the conspirators who brought about this frightful destructive war. I fear that our beloved (?) humane (?) President Roosevelt will be found near the top of the list.

We must stop the warmongers and their war clamor. We must remove the filthy, hairy hands of the Jews from our press, cinema, radio, and the throats of the people, even if it is necessary to confiscate their property and expel them from our country. The remedy, it must be admitted is a radical one, but their conduct and the conditions that prevail make necessary this or some other radical remedy. We have passed the stage when homeopathic remedies will do any good; it takes a major operation.

They will of course set up a great howl that the remedy is unconstitutional and will invoke the protection of a constitution they are now seeking to destroy; Mr. Roosevelt can suspend the constitution in case of war against a foreign foe or an emergency against a domestic foe. It can always be suspended for the preservation of our government. We can and must suspend it, if it is necessary to that end.

Unprepared as we are for war, he still seeks to provoke it. He appears to be still working to destroy this nation in order to rule it and to promote the Rothschild power. Despite the fact that the people of this country want to live in peace, he persists in his insane effort to involve them in war. His appointment of warmongers Henry L. Stimson as Secretary of War, and Frank Knox as Secretary of the Navy, means war. He forced the resignation of Secretary Woodring because Woodring was opposed to war and to giving Great Britain our airplanes, munitions, etc.[53]

His appointee Col. Frank Knox furnishes us with an apt description of Mr. Roosevelt's character and duplicity. He says that as a "matter of tactics he will not avow his aim." And to reach it he is ready to "bow, smile, agree, assert, evade, deny, distort, distract, delay, retreat, startle, dazzle, juggle, sidestep, and circumvent." This is what Col. Knox said of him in his newspaper before his appointment as Secretary of the Navy. He said of him further that "he is no more bound by precedent than by his own statements; It is bad enough to have for president in time of peace a man who is over-confident, incautious, self-willed, uncertain and unreliable. In time of war it would be disastrous."[54]

---

[53] See Congressional Record, June 21, 1940, p. 13331 et seq.

[54] Congressional Record, June 21, 1940, p. 13859.

This is what the protocols call "cunning and make-believe," the qualities of an ideal Jewish ruler. That is a true pen-portrait of "King Franklin, 1st," our present pseudo dictator and our future "King-Despot" by his present Secretary of the Navy. The dictatorship is almost within his grasp. All that is needed is another emergency (the 65th) which he can and will declare at the first opportunity. Congress is the only bulwark that stands between us and the slavery that he so graphically described in his Charlottesville speech.

In concluding the Charlottesville speech Mr. Roosevelt truly said, (for he sometimes inadvertently tells the truth):

> "And the love of freedom is still fierce and steady in the nation today."

We have inborn in us the spirit of freedom and we will not "take our medicine lying down." It may mean much suffering to us but it is certain to mean that we will rid ourselves in the end of the undesirable Jew, the Jew-in-law, and the hybrid.

We have many minor problems that should be solved righteously, but this Administration is incapable of acting in that manner. The two major problems that confront us are: (1) Shall we cancel the bonded mortgage debts that we cannot pay? (2) Shall the Jew financial buccaneers and communists continue to rule us?

We have lived in a fool's paradise in ignorance of our real ruler and his designs. We have worshipped our political parties that he fostered. We have had faith in our lying newspapers that he controls. We have swallowed his propaganda about an invasion and we are getting ready for war on a huge scale. We are preparing to exercise our choice between the two presidential candidates he has provided for us. We have accepted with fortitude all of the poverty and suffering that he has brought upon us. The mighty power of truth will free us from our bondage.

The Jews are now coming to this country in great numbers from all Europe, including the British Empire. We are in fact sending our ships for them. Congress appropriated $50,000,000 for the relief of refugees, the most of whom are Jews; and Roosevelt, without authority, has appropriated another $50,000,000.

We are offering the Jews a home, despite the fact that they have betrayed our hospitality and that of every country in which they have lived. This immigration must be stopped. The pending election (November, 194-0) presents to every voter the opportunity to do his or her part to that end, and to save our government from their rule and thereby save ourselves.

Hitler's paper recently stated that when the war is won some area remote from Europe would be set apart for Jews and the continent would be cleared of them. French Madagascar is said to be an ideal place for them. If this plan is carried out it will mean a new world; it will be a long step in the direction of the millennium to which our Christians look forward.

XXXIII.

TRAITORS

"I pass now to the method of confirming the dynastic roots of King David to the last strata of the earth . . . Certain members of the seed of David will prepare the kings and their heirs, selecting not by right of heritage but by eminent capacities, inducting them into the most secret mysteries of the political, into schemes of government, but providing always that none may come to knowledge of the secrets . . .

"Direct heirs will often be set aside from ascending the Throne if in their time of training they exhibit frivolity, softness and other qualities that are the ruin of authority, which render them incapable of governing and in themselves dangerous for kingly office. Only those who are unconditionally capable for firm, even if it be to cruelty, direct rule, will receive the reins of rule from our learned elders." From Protocol 24.

The Associated Press of August 18, 1940 quoted an amazing agreement made on that date between Franklin D. Roosevelt as President of the United States, and W. L. Mackenzie King as Prime Minister of the Dominion of Canada. The following is the text of the agreement as reported:

"It has been agreed that a permanent joint board of defense shall be set up at once by the two countries . . . It will consider in the broad sense, the defense of the north half of the Western Hemisphere."

This agreement is in very broad terms and is subject to almost any interpretation one chooses to place upon it. The mildest interpretation that can be placed upon it is that it constitutes a military alliance between the United States and the Dominion of Canada at a time when Canada is engaged in war with the totalitarian powers.

There has been some speculation in the press as to whether or not the agreement involves the transfer to Canada of fifty of our American destroyers to be used by Britain in her war with Germany and Italy. This transfer was previously recommended by "Sir" John J. Pershing, and within a few days thereafter (less than a week) we had a Gallup poll upon it showing 62% of the American people favoring the transfer.

It has been stated in the press that the President has advised with Attorney General Jackson and other subordinates who have informed him that it is not necessary to refer this coalition to Congress for confirmation. Up to this hour the President has not done so. It is extremely doubtful if he will. He is not likely to do so unless he receives previous assurance that it will be confirmed.

This agreement, like all other Jew schemes that have been perpetrated upon the American people, is not what it purports to be. It has been represented as affording us air bases in Canada and other British possessions for the defense of the United States, and that it is but an extension of the Monroe Doctrine and does not commit the United States to war except for defense of the western hemisphere. But that is not the interpretation that has been placed upon it by the British Government. Mr. Churchill and his associates understand its true meaning, and they were so rejoiced over it that they could not refrain from giving us a slight glimpse of it. It has a meaning that the President and the Jew press would not dare expose to Congress and to the American people.

The following is a quotation from the Associated Press report from London of August 20, 1940:

> "Utterly confident, Prime Minister Churchill used his disclosure of the plan for air-naval base leases to declare that the British Empire and the United States 'will have to be mixed together in some of their affairs for mutual and general advantage.'
>
> "'No one can stop it!' he cried.'Like the Mississippi, it just keeps rolling along, let it roll! Let it roll on full flood, irresistible, to broader lands and better days' "
>
> "Tumult from the House of Commons steep and crowded benches almost smothered the Prime Minister's last words."

Does anyone imagine for a moment that the mere leasing of air-bases, or a military pact for the protection of the United States would have occasioned the burst of eloquence of Prime Minister Churchill and the tumult and enthusiasm of the House of Commons?

The former Jew war minister, Mr. Hore-Belisha, let the cat out of the bag in his statement regarding the matter, which the Associated Press of the same date quotes as follows:

"In the House of Commons tonight Leslie Hore-Belisha, the former War Secretary, raised the possibility of 'an eventual common citizenship' of Britain and the United States, and said this alone would almost compensate for 'the evils of war.' Such a union, Hore-Belisha recalled, was offered, in vain, to France in the hour of the third Republic's collapse."

Observe that he says that they offered the same thing "to France in the hour of the third Republic's collapse." That offer was to absorb France into the British Empire. Observe also that Hore-Belisha states that this innocent appearing pact "would almost compensate (Britain) for the evils of war." These shrewd Jews always know the "low down," and they are so conceited that they cannot refrain from bragging.

Thus, according to the views of Messrs. Churchill and Hore-Belisha, the true meaning of this agreement is that we have sacrificed our independence as a nation and have been merged into the British Empire as one of its dominions. And thus, without consulting Congress or the American people, we have become not only a part of the British Empire, but we have entered the war against the totalitarian powers.

This program is not a new scheme just invented by President Roosevelt and his "kitchen cabinet." It is the adopted plan of the Elders and the managers of the Rothschild Trust to establish their world empire. They control, and have for many years controlled the British Empire. It has been ruled ostensibly by a king and his cabinet, but in fact by the Jews.

This plan is set out in detail in the Col. E. M. House letter.[55] The real author of this letter is unknown, and because of that fact the letter itself was discredited. Evidently the author was not Col. House, nor was it Dr. Wm. J. Maloney.[56]

The letter shows upon its face that it was written by a Jew and by a person holding a high official position with the British Government at the time (June 10, 1919). It was written upon the stationery of the British consulate of New York City and addressed to the Hon. David Lloyd-George, then Prime Minister of England. It was probably written either by the Jew, Sir Wm. Wiseman, who was at that time "British Intelligence Representative and now with Kuhn, Loeb

[55] Congressional Record, Oct. 11, 1939, p. 598-603.

[56] Congressional Record Oct. 18, 1939.

& Co.,"[57] or by the Jew, Lord Northcliffe, who was at that time head of the British Propaganda Department. While there is doubt as to the identity of the actual author, there can be none as to the authenticity of the letter. The Jew can always be depended upon to hide his identity and to destroy the proof of it, if it is possible to do so.

Because of the length of the letter it is not reproduced in its entirety. I trust that the following excerpts will be sufficient to show its verity and its character. The letter reveals the powerful forces that are now at work to overthrow this government and to bring it back into the British Empire as a dominion, and it reveals the traitors who are cooperating with the British the the Jews to that end. I quote the following paragraphs from it:

> "'Our thanks are due to Messrs. Taft and Polk, who elaborated with us our German-Irish plot programme. To Mr. Baker and the innumerable library committees who banned from the camps the anti-British books on our index expurgatorious. To Mr. Gregory, who lent punitive force to our wishes regarding spoken and written speeches. And Messrs. Pierpont Morgan, Rockefeller, Cleveland Dodge, Wanamaker, Hamlin, Childs, DuPont, Ryan, Insull, Doheny, and others of our friends who financed our 'Americanization' campaign. I would especially call attention to the beneficence of Messrs. Insull, and Doheny, who were the generous supporters of the diversion, devised by Messrs. Taft and O'Connor, entitled, 'Ireland Stabbed England in the Back.' These contributors doubtless will be, or have been, appropriately rewarded by His Majesty's Government."

The Mr. Baker referred to in this paragraph was then our Secretary of War, and the Mr. Gregory was our Attorney General. I do not know whether any of these gentlemen "have been appropriately rewarded by His Majesty's Government."

> "Through the Red Cross, the Scout movement, the Y. M. C. A., the church, and other humane, religious, and quasi-religious organizations, we have created an atmosphere of international effort which strengthens the idea of unity of the English-speaking world. In the coordination of this work, Mr. Raymond Fosdick, formerly of the Rockefeller Foundation, has been especially conspicuous. I would like to mention President Nicholas Murray Butler of Co- lumbia University, who has eloquently advocated this form of internationalism and carefully emphasized its distinction from the false internationalism which is infecting the proletariat."

[57] Congressional Record, Oct. 18, 1939, p. 981.

It is well known that Nicholas Murray Butler is an Anglophile, but Mr. Raymond Fosdick's position has not been so conspicuous. The distinction between the form of true internationalism and false internationalism is imperceptible, but all of it is bad, and none of it fits in with our scheme of government.

"To all ages and classes, to every phase of human activity, by all channels of human communications, our propaganda permeates. Our command over the cables and press, the schools and the universities, the pulpit and the tribunes, will tend to increase. Soon we should be in a position to control at will the reading, the hearing, and the seeing of the inhabitants so that such ideas as are not truly British may be met with a barrier, 'They shall not pass.' "

That states a truth that has already been commented upon. It states a truth which should be apparent to all of us, every day of our lives; we get nothing from either the press or the radio or the cinema that does not favor the British. They let "nothing pass" that tends to present any other point of view.

"May I also call your attention to the services of Prof. Richard Gotthell, of Columbia University (the one who pinned the medal on F. D. Roosevelt in 1937 for his distinguished service to world Jewry), in our campaign against the Hindus, and of Miss Elisabeth Marbury and Messrs. Charles McCarthy and Karl Watters in that against the Irish . . .

"The cost of converting an American into a colonist of His Majesty is now 63 cents. Our expenses we have met by a levy on the population."

The statement made in parenthesis about the Roosevelt medal evidently is comment and not a part of the so-called House letter.

While we appear to be cheap, particularly in the eyes of the Jews, I do not believe that the American people can be bought at the rate of 53 cents a head. If that were true we would have been a part of the British Empire long ago. It is a part of the Jew character to over-estimate himself and his money, and to under-estimate the "goi."

"In the financial world the Anglo-American alliance is a well-established fact. And as the consortium for China, and the security company for Mexico show, our brokers and their aids have become the unchallenged financiers of the world. We have been particularly fortunate in our fiscal agents here, Messrs. Pierpont Morgan & Co. . . .

"Their services in putting this country into the war may not have been altruistic, but they were nonetheless effective. They contributed liberally to our Americanization campaign. They ousted Miss Boardman, and through Messrs. Taft and H. P. Davidson they nationalized and directed the American Red Cross, and then internationalized it under the direction of Mr. H. P. Davidson. Through Mr. Thomas Lamont they purchased Harpers Magazine and the New York Evening Post. Through advertisers they control, they have exerted widespread influence on newspaper policy.

"Messrs. Lamont and Davidson gave you valuable aid at the peace conference. They loaned $200,000,000 to Japan that our ally might build a fleet to compete with America on the Pacific carrying routes. Their attempts to retain for us control of the international mercantile marine are well known to you."

The Anglo-American finance alliance has been heretofore pointed out. It is the ownership of our principal financial institutions through the Rothschild money trust. We know about the services of Morgan & Co., in getting us into the war; about Mr. Davidson's direction of the Red Cross, and about Mr. Lamont's valuable aid at the peace conference; but we did not know that "they loaned $200,000,000 that Britain's ally (Japan) might build a fleet to compete with America on the Pacific carrying routes."

That is rank treason to our country on the part of the firm of Morgan & Co. It is rank treason to America on the part of its ally, the British Government. And it is this same British Government that is now pleading with us to rescue them from their own machinations and infamy.

Please note the statement that "our brokers and their aids have become the unchallenged financiers of the world." These "brokers" are N. M. Rothschild & Sons and they have been the "unchallenged" financiers of the world for more than a hundred years. The firm of Morgan & Co. is not an "aid" but a branch.

Observe also their purchase of Harpers Magazine and the New York Evening Post, and particularly note that the British regards the firm as its agency,—

"our broker." It is, however, the "other way round"; the British Government is the agency of "our brokers."

> "With moneys lent to us by the American Government for war purposes, we have, acting through quasi-American companies, by the aid of Mr. Connor Guthrie, obtained control of the large oil fields in California and in Costa Rica. And through the nationalization by His Majesty's Government of the Cowdray, Person, and Royal Dutch Shell interests in Mexico, we, having become masters of the Mexican, Canadian, Romanian, Armenian, Persian, and lesser oil fields, now largely control the oil fuel of the world and thereby the world's transportation and industry. We have not yet succeeded in controlling the pipe lines owned by the Standard Oil Co. and its subsidiaries, for those companies have long been established."

This is also a revealing statement. We knew in a general way that "His Majesty's Government had acquired large oil interests in Mexico and other countries," but we did not know that the $4,000,000,000.00 we loaned Britain was used to acquire these oil interests and to obtain a monopoly of the oil resources of the world.

> "This control (of world's oil supply) would enable us to exert such pressure as would make American industrial interests amenable to His Majesty's pleasure. But it would be unwise to make disciplinary use of our fuel power before we secure remission of our $4,000,000,000.00 debt. Otherwise, the American industrial interests might retaliate by forcing the United States Government to exact from us the agreed interest, to maintain tariff barriers against our merchandise, and to withdraw support from the rate of exchange, which would make our labor and resources for years pay tribute to this country (United States), an unnatural, unfilial, and unthinkable proceeding.

> "We are conducting a vigorous campaign for the cancellation of this war debt, on the grounds (a) that we fought America's fight for her for 2 years, while she was prospering in cowardice; and (b) that at least the material burdens should be distributed justly, if the world is to be made safe for democracy. Synchronously with this agitation for the remission of our debt, we are agitating for further loans of American money to rebuild our markets in Europe . . . In these agitations we are receiving valuable, if not whol- ly disinterested, aid from our financial auxiliaries and fiscal agents."

If this is not treachery of the basest sort, what do you call it? They've got our money, used it to buy up the oil properties of the world, and are seeking to escape payment of it. When they have accomplished that, they propose to make "disciplinary use of our fuel power in order to make American industrial interests amenable to His Majesty's pleasure." They add insult to injury by the statement that

"We fought America's fight for her for 2 years while she was prospering in cowardice."

And the grounds here stated are the grounds upon which they are seeking to cancel their debt to us,—leaving out of course the word "cowardice."

However, we are quietly continuing our work in Mexico until the United States Government shall be put in a position to take it over. An American war with Mexico would cost us nothing; it would satisfy certain American industrial interests; it would guarantee our title to the Mexican oil fields; it would humble, by impoverishing, this purse-proud people; it would give us an opportunity to show the American that he —isolated in the world—needs our protection against our ally, Japan; and while America was busy warring we would enjoy a clear field in the European, African, and Asiatic trade, together with the monopoly of the markets of a South America hostile to the Monroe Doctrinaries of democracy. For these reasons our press is fully reporting Mexican outrages, but a strange apathy seems to have fallen on the people, an apathy from which only border raids or special atrocities will arouse them."

Thus it appears that Britain has been seeking to promote war between us and Mexico because it would "cost us nothing .. . it would guarantee our title to the Mexican oil fields . . . it would humble, by impoverishing, this purse-proud (American) people; it would give us an opportunity to show the American that he—isolated in the world—needs our protection against our ally, Japan."

"Below that level, imperial unity cannot be securely established upon the debris of the Constitution here (in America). We will not passively permit this unity to be now menaced when it is all but perfect. Has not America, while still maintaining an outward show of independence, yielded to our wishes in the Panama Canal tolls and Canadian fisheries' disputes, as was fitting and filial? Was not America happy to fight our war in Europe? Was not America, like Canada, willing not only to pay her own war expenses but also to loan us money for ours? Was not America, like Canada, content to seek nothing in return for her war duty, so long as the mother-land was completely indemnified in Egypt and the rest of Africa, in Persia, Mesopotamia, Syria, and elsewhere? Was not America as proud to be honored by knighthood and lesser titular distinctions, as Canada was, or, rather, more proud? Has not President Wilson canceled the big Navy program and dutifully conceded to us the command of the seas, confident that we shall defend America against all future foes that may threaten our supremacy, just as we defended America and Canada, against Germany?"

Alas, all of these achievements have been accomplished. They have been sugar-coated in such way that our people did not know they were serving the purposes of the British, but thought that they were doing the right thing.

"But I regret to inform you that our Committee on American Elections has reported (Appendix 38) that no matter how lavishly we finance the next election, the Wilson administration will pass, and with it, perchance, that absolute administrative control over the Legislature, which has meant so much to us. Willful, wanton, and wicked men will unite in the next election with labor and those industrialists whose profit-patriotism ratio has been allowed to fall below the threshold of loyalty to imperial unity. These combined forces of disorder will seek to elect a Legislature which will attempt to make the administration responsible to it, instead of to us and our auxiliaries, and will strive to rend the bonds which bind this colony to the mother-land, for the sole, selfish, and seditious purpose of erecting a separate, national, economic unit independent of us—and even, perhaps, competing with us. We must, therefore, hasten to remove from this Legislature, with the aid of our supporters here, such of its powers as could be used against imperial unity. "In other words, we must quickly act to transfer its dangerous sovereignty from this colony to the custody of the Crown. We must, in short, now bring America within the Empire. God helping us, we can do no other. The first visible step in this direction has been taken; President Wilson has accepted and sponsored the plan for a League of Nations which we prepared for him. We have wrapped this plan in the peace treaty so that the world must accept from us the League or a continuance of the war. The League is in substance the Empire with America admitted on the same basis as our other colonies."

And so the British Government has a "Committee on American Elections" and they finance these elections even "lavishly" where there is a chance to win; otherwise they refuse to put up the money. They can afford to spend money "lavishly" for they are playing for high stakes, viz: to cancel a $4,000,000,000.00 debt and to save the tottering Jewish-British Empire. This financing is obviously done through "our broker" (N. M. Rothschild & Sons). We do not know with certainty who compose the "Committee on American Elections," but I think I can name three of its members, viz: "Sir" Thomas W. Lamont, Sir William Wisemann, and Sir (?) B. M. Baruch. Unfortunately for the schemes of these conspirators, the Democratic Party was thrown out of power, and unfortunately for them also, Congress refused to ratify the League of Nations.

Their intimate knowledge of President Wilson and his weaknesses, and of the best method of approach, is uncanny:

"Our best policy, therefore, would be to appoint President Wilson first president of the League . . .

"He is easily slighted and remarkably vindictive. It is the highest degree desirable that any traces of resentment his mind may be harboring against us should be radically removed before he returns. I would, therefore, suggest that the work of adulation planned in appendix 32 should be intensively continued. The adulators, however, should be instructed to consult the inventories I have prepared (appendices 45-83), which show that he is now surfeited with diamond stomachers, brooches, and bracelets, Gobelin tapestries, mosaics, and vases, gold caskets, and plates . . .

"The pressing need of our embassy at Washington is not so much an ambassador as a gentleman in waiting to the President.

"I would suggest that his powers as President of the League of Nations be left undefined for the present. He may be trusted to assume what power he can and to use it in the interest of the Crown.

"A grant of a privy purse of $100,000,000 would prove most acceptable to him, and would be useful for private espionage, private wars, Siberian railroads, etc. His appointment should be for life, and you might definitely promise him that any instruction he may care to convey concerning his successor will receive the most careful attention of His Majesty's Government.

"No one understands this peculiarity (hero worship) of the native behavior better than Mr. Wilson, which accounts largely for his exceptional usefulness to us. He knows that Americans will not scrutinize any performance closely, provided their faith in the performer has been adequately established. Mr. Wilson has since made the transfer amid American acclamation. In the same way he will now be able to satisfy them that far from surrendering their independence to the League they are actually extending their sovereignty by it."

They made the naive suggestion:

"I would suggest that as soon as the President is settled once more in the White House, the visit should be returned by His Royal Highness, the Prince of Wales, who would be an admirable representative of His Royal Sire, and would satisfy President Wilson's sense of fitness. It is perhaps unfortunate that there is not a Presidential daughter of the Prince's age, for such a union would have greatly advanced our purpose not only with the American people, but also with a President who feels that lese majeste should be punishable with 20 years' imprisonment, and who acts as if he considered his son-in-law, Mr. McAdoo, as his heir apparent."

The Prince of Wales referred to is the present Duke of Windsor.

"Would you, however, kindly give instructions to the publishers of Whittaker Almanac, and of the Official Register to delete, in their next issue, from their list of British knights, the names of Sir John Biddle, Sir Tasker Bliss, Sir P. D. Lechridge, Sir Peyton March, Sir John Pershing, Sir Hugh Rodman, Sir William Sims, Sir Joseph Strauss, and the other American knights, as their inclusion in the 1919 issue has tended to shake the American faith in our Mr. Low's ingenuity."

I do not understand the reference to "Mr. Low's ingenuity." All of the "Sirs" listed here, including "Sir John Pershing," were knighted by the King of England and their names appear in the semi-official register which is Whittaker Almanac.

"Nevertheless, it would be well quickly to reinforce him (President Wilson) in the presidency of the League of Nations by staging the first session of the League in Washington. This will convince these simple people that they are the League and its power resides in them. Their pride in this power should be exalted. Perhaps you, yourself, might condescend to visit this country. Or, if that be impracticable, you might send such noble statesmen, and stately noblemen, as will suffice to make of the first League session a spectacle of unsurpassed brilliance,"

This is Jewish ingenuity with a vengeance. They themselves are great advertisers and great hands to put on a show, and they think that "these simple people" (meaning Americans) will be over-awed by such a spectacle!

They give us a glimpse of the character of government we are to have when we become a dominion of the British Empire, or a member of the League of Nations, which they consider the same thing:

"By these means we hope smoothly to overcome all effective opposition on the part of our colony, America, to entering the League—that is, the Empire. As soon as the League is. functioning properly, His Majesty, in response to loyal and repeated solicitation, might graciously be pleased to consent to restore to this people their ancient right to petition at the foot of the throne; to confer the ancient rank and style of governor general upon our Ambassador, that this colony may enjoy a status inferior to no other colony's; to establish the primacy of the metropolitan see, with the Right Reverend Dr. Manning as first primate; to appoint Mr. Elihu Root lord chief justice of the colony, and to nominate Messrs. W. H. Taft, Nicholas Murray Butler, J. P. Morgan, Elisabeth Marbury, Adolph Ochs, and Thomas Lamont to the colonial privy council; as a special mark of royal and imperial condescension, to rename the Federal Capital of the colony Georgetown, and lest section jealousy be thereby excited, to grant royal charters to the cities of Boston and Chicago entitling them thereafter to style themselves, respectively, Kingston and Guelf—concisely to bestow in time and in measure such tokens of the bounty of the Crown as the fealty of the colonists merit."

Mr. Roosevelt had his hand in bringing about this war, if he is not in fact the prime mover. It was his purpose to bring about a League of Nations. He has frequently stated that he would assist in writing the peace treaty. The "United States of Europe" is none of our affair, but a League of Nations in which we are a member is a matter of importance to us. The League of Nations would probably begin as a British Empire and it would inevitably end as a Jewish Empire.

> "The object of Cecil Rhodes is almost attained. The day prophesied by Mr. Carnegie is near at hand, the day when the American Colonies will be in all things one with the motherland, one and indivisible. Only the last great battle remains to be fought—the battle to compel her acceptance of the terms of the League of Nations. I have frankly stated the difficulties which confront us, and the vital necessity of the League to the British Nation."

These two huge foundations, viz: the Carnegie and the Rhodes, were established for the avowed purpose of destroying our government and re-establishing our status as a dominion of the British Empire. But far more menacing than that fact is the fact that it is also the secret purpose of the managers of the Rothschild money trust.

The prime objective on the part of the conspirators, who brought about the present war, was to establish the League of Nations. The prime object of President Roosevelt was to be president of this League. If it had been established he would undoubtedly have gotten the job. He met the requirements of the protocols far better than President Wilson who was slated for it, for Wilson was an idealist with a sense of right and wrong. These characteristics are utterly foreign to Roosevelt's nature; he is a "diplomat" who rules by "cunning and make-believe." A life tenure at $100,000,000.00 a year is an attractive prospect for him and his thrifty family.

So far as the facts stated in the alleged House letter are known to me, they are true. I do not know whether the Morgan firm financed the building of the Japanese Navy, nor do I know whether the British used the $4,000,000,000.00 we loaned it, in acquiring an oil monopoly. These are facts, however, that can be easily proven if true, or disproven if untrue.

The letter quoted contains too much truth and the truth is too important to us to reject it on the mere ground that the author is unknown. It is, I submit, an authentic letter and it contains the authentic, well defined plan of the conspirators for the destruction of our government. If its statements are true, every man engaged in this conspiracy should be prosecuted and punished for high treason, the penalty for which is death and confiscation of property. Such prosecution may save the lives and fortunes of millions of innocent men and women.

There is a Rothschild Money Trust. It has grown in magnitude and power ever since it was established in 1812. It threatens the destruction of our government and of our civilization. The Jewish author of the alleged House letter was the representative of this Trust and thoroughly understood its plans and objectives and the best method of accomplishing them. It now controls the British Empire and the American Government. It must be destroyed or we lose our freedom.

We are indebted to Congressman J. Thorkelson of Montana (whom they defeated), for the publication in the Congressional Record of the so-called "House letter." He stoutly insisted upon its publication in the face of strong democratic opposition.

Congressman Thorkelson states that this letter was first published in the "Geneva Hearings" and later by the Washington Pub. Co., but he does not understake to name the real author of it. No Jew would subscribe his real name to such a revealing letter; they are all too slick to commit such an indiscretion.

XXXIV.

SLAVERY

"The flooding of the United States with cheap coolie labor will reduce wages, thus gradually making it more difficult for the man in ordinary circumstances to spare enough money to support his children during the time they should be in school, and thereby making it necessary for children's education to be reduced to the level of the children of the poor in England, which would tend in a very short time to make for a sharp class distinction or 'illiterate rabble.' This latter class is regarded as very desirable in England, as the more ignorant the lower classes, the more easily they are controlled." From Congressional Record, Aug. 21, 1940, p. 16378.

The text quoted above could very well have been taken from the protocols or the Talmud, for it contains the philosophy of both, viz: the enslavement of the people. It is, however, a quotation from an article by Lillian Scott Troy, published in The San Francisco Leader in February 1912, and re-published by Congressman J. Thorkelson in the Congressional Record.

The author states that it is in substance a quotation from a "book written by Lieutenant Colonel Lowther, military secretary and official mouthpiece of the Duke of Connaught." It is a frank explanation of the sordid poverty that now prevails in England and that has existed since the enactment of the Peel amendment and the repeal of the Corn laws (tariff) in 1844. This was the date the Rothschilds obtained control of the economic welfare of the people of England through the Peel amendment.

The reader should note the fact that "sharp class distinction or illiterate rabble" have been produced in England designedly. They are in fact the direct result of banker controlled prices and wages, free labor and free trade. The fact should also be noted that this poverty is regarded as "very desirable" by the Jewish plutocrats in England for the reason that "the more ignorant the lower classes, the more easily they are controlled."

We have the same powerful forces at work in this country, viz: banker control of our economy and free labor and free trade, called internationalism. These forces are producing precisely the same results that they have produced in England, and for precisely the same purposes. These results represent the philosophy of Morgan & Co., Kuhn, Loeb & Co., Franklin D. Roosevelt, and Wendell Willkie. They represent the philosophy of the Jew Deal and the objectives of the Jew Deal Administration. It is the common purpose of all of them to elevate themselves and to enslave the people through poverty.

We have burdened ourselves with a debt of $15,000,000,000 and have entered the war through the back door to save this brand of "democracy," viz: a democracy that exalts the rich and oppresses the poor. Our plutocrats are seeking to restore our country to the British Empire in order that they may become lords, barons, counts, and sirs, and that the mass of the people may be the "illiterate rabble" and consequently "the more easily controlled."

Unfortunately, the election of Mr. Willkie promises no relief. The Jew press applauded his statement to the effect that he could not promise much hope, that we must all make sacrifices, and that we must recover the ground we have lost "the hard way." It can't be done. His acceptance speech was a ratification of the New Deal, including deflation, its reciprocal trade treaties, its conscription of an army in peacetime, and its gift of fifty of our destroyers to the British. He appears to be only a dummy candidate in order to insure the election of Roosevelt.

Messrs. Willkie and Roosevelt, however, do not themselves propose to travel "the hard way." The greatest achievement of Wendell Willkie is that he sold his power plants to the Jew Deal Administration at an exorbitant price, to-wit: $76,000,000, and that he resigned an annual salary of $75,000 to become a presidential candidate.

The Roosevelt Administration has been distinguished by the fact that it has been an exceedingly profitable one to the Roosevelt family. The Chicago Tribune estimates that the President and his family have made $2,750,000 during his seven years in office. (It would be interesting to know how much of that has been paid out in income taxes.)

Both President Roosevelt and Wendell Willkie are second rate New York lawyers. They both appear, however, to have been first-rate promoters. They are both presidential candidates hand-picked for us by the Rothschild interest. It is not of much consequence to the Rothschilds or to the British plutocracy which one is elected, for their interests will be safe with either. The chances are that they prefer Roosevelt because he is the smarter of the two.

The leading feature of Willkie's acceptance speech was his challenge to Roosevelt to debate. What issue? Not the tariff issue; they stand together on that. Not the destruction of the Rothschild control of our economy (which is the most important issue) ; they stand together on that. Not "taxing, lending, and spending"; they stand together on that. Not internationalism; they stand together on that. Not conscription; they stand together on that. Not the gift of our destroyers to Great Britain; they stand together on that. Not the issue of intervention in the present war; they stand together on that.

Apparently the only issue between them is which one can best administer the New Deal, which, interpreted, means which one can best serve the Rothschild interest, Roosevelt has made a pretty good job of it and there appears to be no valid reason for the Rothschilds to want a change. Indeed, it is doubtful if there will be, because if Mr. Roosevelt finds that he will likely be defeated he will declare the election off, and will be supported by his Attorney General, our democratic representatives in congress, and Willkie will accept the situation with good grace.

Mr. Willkie is reported to have said that he did not desire the support of Father Coughlin or of any other anti-Semitic. This Willkie is not worthy to touch the hem of Father Coughlin's garment. Father Coughlin is everything that Willkie is not, and Willkie is everything that Father Coughlin is not. The difference between them is the difference between daylight and darkness, between a bold patriot and a time-serving politician, between a man who seeks to elevate the masses and one who is willing to serve the selfish interests of the classes.

I appeal to the members of Congress: Many of the facts stated in these pages are probably unknown to you, but as far as you know them you must know that they are true. The facts you do not know are also true. You may wish to ignore the "House letter," but it contains too much truth to permit you to do so. You should resolve any doubt you may have regarding it, in favor of your country. You have been misled by the Jew press and by lies and subterfuges, but it is not too late to correct your errors.

The people have elected you to represent them and they look to you for guidance. If you fail them, if you permit the destruction of our government, you are traitors to your duty and to your country. You will be hated by your constituents and despised by the men who have used you. I appeal to the red-blooded Americans among you, of both parties, to get together and organize a party that stands for America and the American people, and against war and internationalism; and to nominate true American candidates for president, senators, and congressmen. Such a ticket will sweep the country.

I appeal to the American people to support your ticket. In the last analysis it all gets back to us, the people. Do we intend to surrender our liberty without a protest and without a fight? It is within our power to redeem our government by the ballot, and without bloodshed and revolution. We know that the election of either Roosevelt or Willkie means war and a dictatorship, and probably the submerging of our government into the British Empire. Shall we permit Roosevelt and Willkie and Morgan & Co., Kuhn, Loeb & Co., and the Rothschild trust to take over our government?

We must throw off the shackles that bind us. We must defeat our subservient congressmen. We must support any man, no matter upon what ticket, who stands for America. We must put country above party. We have the chance to save ourselves and our country in the election in November,—and this may be our last chance.

How long, oh how long, will we stand for the corrupt rule of the Rothschild trust through the two political parties? WAKE UP, AMERICANS, before it is too late!

APPENDIX I.

Protocol No. 7

"The intensification of armaments, the increase of police forces—all essential for the completion of the aforementioned plans. What we have to get at is that there should be in all the States of the world, besides ourselves, only the masses of the proletariat, a few millionaires devoted to our interests, police and soldiers.

"Throughout all Europe, and by means of relations with Europe, in other continents also, we must create ferments, discords and hostility. Therein we gain a double advantage. In the first place we keep in check all countries, for they well know that we have the power whenever we like to create disorders or to restore order. All these countries are accustomed to see in us an indispensable force of coercion. In the second place, by our intrigues we shall tangle up all the threads which we have stretched into the cabinets of all States by means of the political, by economic treaties, or loan obligations. In order to succeed in this we must use great cunning and penetration during negotiations and agreements, but, as regards what is called the "official language," we shall keep to the opposite tactics and assume the mask of honesty and compliancy. In this way the peoples and governments of the goyim, whom we have taught to look only at the outside whatever we present to their notice, will still continue to accept us as the benefactors and saviors of the human race.

"We must be in a position to respond to every act of opposition by war with the neighbors of that country which dares to oppose us; but if these neighbors should also venture to stand collectively together against us, then we must suffer resistance by a universal war.

"The principal factor of success in the political is the secrecy of its undertakings; the word should not agree with the deeds of the diplomat.

"We must compel the governments of the goyim to take action in the direction favored by our widely-conceived plan, already approaching the desired consummation, by what we shall represent as public opinion, secretly prompted by us through the means of that so-called "Great Power"—the Press, which, with a few exceptions that may be disregarded, is already entirely in our hands.

"In a word, to sum up our system of keeping the governments of the goyim in Europe in check, we shall show our strength to one of them by terrorist attempts and to all, if we allow the possibility of a general rising against us, we shall respond with the guns of America or China or Japan.

APPENDIX II.

"Funeral Oration"

The Fatal Discourse of Rabbi Reichhorn

["(In its issue of 21 October, 1920 (No. 195) La Vieille France published an extremely important Russian document in which the following passage occurs:

" 'There is a striking analogy between the Protocols of the Elders of Zion and the discourse of the Rabbi Reichhorn, pronounced in Prague in 1869 over the tomb of the Grand Rabbi Simeon-ben-Ihuda, and published by Readcliffe, who paid with his life for the divulgation. Sonol, who had taken Readcliffe to hear Reichhorn, was killed in a duel some time afterwards. The general ideas formulated by the Rabbi are found fully developed in the Protocols,' (which were published about 35 years later).

"In its issue of 10 March, 1921, (No. 214) La Vieille France gives the version of this funeral oration which was published in La Russie Juive. It is perfectly clear that the funeral oration and the Protocols of the Elders of Zion come from one and the same mint. Both are prophetic; and the power which made the prophecies has been able to bring about their fulfillment. There can no longer be any doubt as to whose is the power which is disturbing the world, creating World Unrest, and at the same time reaping all of the profits. Jewry is enslaving all Christian peoples of the earth. There IS a Jew World Plot and it now stands finally and completely unmasked).]

"1. Every hundred years, We, the Sages of Israel, have been accustomed to meet in Sanhedrin in order to examine our progress towards the domination of the world which Jehovah has promised us, and our conquests over the enemy, Christianity.

"2. This year, united over the tomb of our reverend Simeonben-Ihuda, we can state with pride that the past century has brought us very near to our goal, and that this goal will be very soon attained.

"3. Gold always has been and always will be the irresistible power. Handled by expert hands it will always be the most useful lever for those who possess it, and the object of envy for those who do not. With gold we can buy the most rebellious consciences, can fix the rate of all values, the current prices of all products, can subsidize all State loans, and thereafter hold the states at our mercy.

"4. Already the principal banks, the exchanges of the entire world, the credits of all governments, are in our hands.

"5. The other great power is THE PRESS. By repeating without cessation certain ideas, the Press succeeds in the end in having them accepted as actualities. The Theatre renders us analogous services. Everywhere the Press and the Theatre obey our orders.

"6. By the ceaseless praise of DEMOCRATIC RULE we shall divide the Christians into political parties, we shall destroy the unity of their nations, we shall sow discord everywhere. Reduced to impotence, they will bow before the LAW of OUR BANK, always united, and always devoted to our Cause.

"7. We shall force the Christians into wars by exploiting their pride and their stupidity. They will massacre each other, and clear the ground for us to put our people into.

"8. The possession of the land has always brought influence and power. In the name of social Justice and Equality we shall parcel out the great estates; we shall give the fragments to the peasants who covet them with all their powers, and who will soon be in debt to us by the expense of cultivating them.

Our capital will make us their masters. We in our turn shall become the great proprietors, and the possession of the land will assure the power to us.

"9. Let us try to replace the circulation of gold with paper money; our chests will absorb the gold, and we shall regulate the value of the paper which will make us masters of all the positions.

"10. We count among us plenty of orators capable of feigning enthusiasm and of persuading mobs. We shall spread them among the people to announce changes which should secure the happiness of the human race. By gold and by flattery we shall gain the proletariat which will charge itself with annihilating Christian capitalism. We shall promise workmen salaries of which they have never dared to dream, but we shall also raise the price of necessities so that our profits will be greater still.

"11. In this manner we shall prepare Revolutions which the Christians will make themselves, and of which we shall reap the fruit.

"12. By our mockeries and our attacks upon them we shall make their priests ridiculous then odious, and their religion as ridiculous and as odious as their clergy. Then we shall be masters of their souls. For our pious attachment to our own religion, to our own worship, will prove the superiority of our religion and the superiority of our souls.

"13. We have established our own men in all important positions. We must endeavor to provide the Goyim with lawyers and doctors; the lawyers are au courant with all interests; doctors, once in the house, become confessors and directors of consciences.

"14. But above all let us monopolize Education. By this means we spread ideas that are useful to us, and shape the children's brains as suits us.

"15. If one of our people should unhappily fall into the hands of justice amongst the Christians, we must rush to help him; find as many witnesses as he needs to save him from his judges, until we become judges ourselves.

"16. The monarchs of the Christian world, swollen with ambition and vanity, surround themselves with luxury and with numerous armies. We shall furnish them with all the money their folly demands, and so shall keep them in leash.

"17. Let us take care not to hinder the marriage of our men with Christian girls, for through them we shall get our foot into the most closely locked circles. If our daughters marry Goyim they will be no less useful, for the children of a Jewish mother are ours. Let us foster the idea of free love, that we may destroy among Christian women attachment to the principles and practices of their religion.

"18. For ages past the sons of Israel, despised and persecuted, have been working to open up a path to power. They are hitting the mark. They control the economic life of the accursed Christians; their influence preponderates over politics and over manners.

"19. At the wished for hour, fixed in advance, we shall let loose the Revolution, which by ruining all classes of Christianity, will definitely enslave the Christian to US. Thus will be accomplished the promise of God made to His people."

ROTHSCHILD MONEY TRUST

BY GEORGE ARMSTRONG

PREFACE

Mayer Amschel Rothschild, the founder of the Rothschild fortune, at the time of his death in 1812, created a trust of his estate, by will, for the elevation of the Jewish race and the establishment of a Jewish World Empire. The cardinal principles of the trust were secrecy, that the estate should be kept intact as a unit, that the heirs and their heirs should have only a communal interest in it, and that the estate as a whole should be governed by the eldest son of the eldest son unless a majority of the heirs determined otherwise.

The estate has been preserved and managed since his death as a unit in pursuance of the provisions of his will. There are now several hundred heirs, for the family is a prolific one, but the estate is communal and still under the management of one head. So far as known, the provisions of the wills of the members of the family still contain in substance the directions of the founder of the fortune.

History affords but meager information regarding the rulers of this fortune and the extent of it, because of their secretive methods. No inventory has ever been filed and no division has ever been sought by any heir.

Most of the histories of the Rothschild family are either Jewish or strongly pro-Jewish. While they are extravagant in praise of the virtues of the different members of the Rothschild family, they are rather meager in facts. The facts herein related have been gleaned from many sources and are based on information believed to be reliable.

We do not know the extent of the founder's fortune at the time of his death in 1812, nor do we know the present magnitude of it, but apparently it represents about one-half of the wealth of the world.

This huge fortune has been devoted with great shrewdness and energy to the purpose of exploiting the Gentiles in all the countries of the globe. The methods employed are the manipulation of currencies, speculations on the exchanges, and wars. The Rothschilds by these operations profit enormously because they have the power by virtue of their immense wealth and political power, to put prices up or down at pleasure. It is for these reasons that we have had most of our wars and depressions.

The protocols and the communists code, which are identical in purpose and intent, represent their plan for the conquest of the world. Both of these codes were published subsequent to Mayer Amschel's death, but some of the protocols appear to have been in existence prior thereto. They, however, represent his principles as shown by all that we know of him.

This book is not written in a spirit of anti-Semitism, for I have Jewish friends that I do not wish to injure. It is written in the hope that it may be helpful in solving our Jewish problem peaceably and by appropriate legislation. To the extent that the remedies herein suggested may contribute to that end they will be helpful to the Jews as well as to the balance of us, for it is certain that the people of this country will never meekly submit to slavery.

In writing and publishing this book I am inspired by no other motive than to render a service to my country. I realize that I am taking some risk in doing so—at least that of persecution. Adequate provision has been made for the publication and distribution of this book regardless of the author.

September 12, 1940. George Armstrong

INDEX

Dedication.

Preface.

PART I The Rothschild Empire.

		Page
I	The Protocols	7
II	The Protocols are Authentic.—	10
III	The Jews' Defense	16
IV	Mayer Amschel Rothschild, First King of the Jews	21
V	The Rothschild Dynasty	26
VI	The Wealth of the Rothschild Family	35
VII	The Mighty Rothschild Power	40
VIII	The Kept Press	46
IX	The Murder Gang	54
X	World War I	59
XI	League of Nations.—	66
XII	Gold	72
XIII	World War II	78
XIV	Our Despot of the Blood of Zion	85
XV	Our Undeclared War Against Germany.—	89
XVI	Plan of Mobilization—	95

PART II The Subjugation of America.

XVII	Franklin D. Roosevelt	105
XVIII	The Reds in the Saddle	112
XIX	Report of the Dies Committee	119
XX	Corruption, Everywhere Corruption	125
XXI	Federal Reserve System	131
XXII	Deflations of 1920 and 1930	136
XXIII	Deflation of 1937	141
XXIV	"On Our Way" (Whither?)	147
XXV	Liars and Thieves	152
XXVI	Mismanaged Currency	160
XXVII	Bankruptcy	168
XXVIII	Poverty and Despair	175
XXIX	America Enters the War	182
XXX	Skulduggery	189
XXXI	Party Government	195
XXXII	"King Franklin, 1st".	202
XXXIII	Traitors —	209
XXXIV	Slavery	221
Appendix	No. 1	225
Appendix	No. 2	226

PART I

THE ROTHSCHILD EMPIRE

I.

The Protocols

> "For ages past the sons of Israel, despised and persecuted, have been working to open up a path to power. They are hitting the mark. They control the economic life of the accursed Christians; their influence preponderates over politicians and over manners."-—From "Funeral Oration of Rabbi Reichhorn."

Professor Serge Nilus of Russia published the Jewish "Protocols" in 1905. They purport to represent the minutes of secret meetings of the leading men of the Jewish race, and to set forth their plans for acquiring the'wealth of the peoples of the world, for the overthrow of all governments, and for the creation of the Kingdom of the Jews with a Jewish king. It is stated in the introduction of the booklet that the protocols means "minutes of the proceedings of the Learned Elders of Zion and that these protocols give the substance of addresses delivered to the innermost circles of the rulers of Zion."

It is also stated that "the presumption is strong that the protocols were issued or re-issued at the first Zionist Congress held at Basle (Switzerland) in 1897 under the presidency of the father of modern Zionism, the late Theodore Herzl." It is also stated that the names of the present elders are a profound secret, that they are the "Hidden Hand" that rules the world, and that they probably consist of "three hundred men, each of whom knows all of the others, govern the fate of the European continent, and they elect their successors from their entourage." (Quoting the late Walter Rathnau, a Jew of Germany, as authority.)

The "Learned Elders of Zion" was probably a religious order in the beginning, as indicated by the name. But if such was the original foundation of the order, its character, and likewise its name, has since been changed. It is now purely a political racial organization and its present name is the "Council of the Jewish Agency." It is likely that the name was changed on account of the exposure by Nilus.

This order must be distinguished from "Elders of the Synagogue" and "Elders of Israel," which are purely religious organizations. It must also be distinguished from the "Zionist Congress" and "Zionist General Council." These two latter organizations are semi-religious and semi-political and they are also semi-secret and semi-public. They are composed wholly of members of the Zionist church, but not all Jews by any means are church-men.

It is also to be distinguished from the ancient Jewish Symarium or San Hedrin which was the supreme judicial and administrative authority during the reign of the Roman Herod, when Christ was crucified. It was composed of their "Chief Priests, rulers, scribes, and Elders." and was at that time the supreme judicial and political Jewish authority.

A recent convention of the "Zionist Congress" was held in Zurich, Switzerland, for the purpose of considering the partition of Palestine, which was attended by 480 delegates, from all countries. It appears from the proceedings of this convention that Professor Chaim Weinzmann, formerly of Russia but now of England, was re-elected as president of this international congress ; that Rabbi Wise of New York is president of the American branch; that an executive committee of eleven was appointed with full authority to act; that the "Zionist General Council" was increased from 54 to 70, the additional members being appointed by the convention.

It appears also from the proceedings of this convention that it defined the policy of the Zionist Church toward the partition of Palestine, subject to the approval of the "Council of the Jewish Agency" the final authority—the present "Learned Elders of Zion," the secret three hundred, the "Hidden Hand." It appears also that the Royal Commission of the British Government made its report regarding the partition of Palestine to Lord Rothschild as a member of the "Council of the Jewish Agency" and not to Professor Weinzmann as the head of the "Zionist Congress." It appears also that the reason therefor is the fact that the "Council of the Jewish Agency" is the authorized agency of the Jewish race—sectarian and non-sectarian.

Thus the supreme authority of this "Jewish Agency" is officially recognized by both the British Government and the Zionist Congress, although the latter is composed of regularly elected delegates from all countries of the world. What is it? Who are its present members? By what authority does it act? What are its purposes? And why all of this secrecy if its purposes are honest and legitimate?

We cannot know much about this order because of its secret character and its secret methods. We know that Lord Rothschild was until his recent death a member of it, and that Lord Melchett of England is now said to be its chairman. We may assume that the Rothschild family have dominated it since the time of Amschel Rothschild. It is the government of the financial power of the Jewish race that rules the world, including America. It is the cabal of the leading Jewish bankers and politicians who were formerly called the "Elders of Zion" and now the "Council of the Jewish Agency."

Whatever may have been the original character and purposes of the "Learned Elders of Zion" there can be no doubt about the fact that there was such an organization, that it now exists in some form, and that it is seeking to carry out the program set out in the protocols and according to the plan of the protocols. There is no other explanation of the secret "Council of the Jewish Agency" and its achievements. There is no other explanation of the Versailles peace treaty, the League of Nations, the Bank of International Settlements, the International Labor Board, the deliberate impoverishment of the people of the world by the manipulations of the Elders, and for the present wars and past wars. This is all a definite program with a definite purpose, and that program and purpose are truly set out with brutal frankness in the protocols.

II.

The Protocols Are Authentic

" 'Per me reges requant.' 'It is through me that kings reign.' And it was said by the prophets that we were chosen by God himself to rule over the whole earth. God has endowed us with genius that we may he equal to our task."—From Protocol 5.

The Jews, of course, deny the authenticity of the Protocols. It is natural that they should do so. To admit it would be to defeat the purposes of their scheme. Moreover, the plan itself calls for such secrecy and duplicity.

The program is so cruel, so inhuman, so diabolical, and the objects to be accomplished appear so fantastic and remote that it is difficult to believe that this program still obtains. It should, however, be remembered that since the publications of the protocols a great and powerful nation, Russia, has been conquered by a handful of Jews; that Kuhn, Loeb & Co., Paul Warburg, and other Jews, financed the coup de etat by which the Jews secured control of the Russian government; and that the cruel and inhuman methods set out in the protocols were followed mercilessly in Russia by its Jewish government. It should be also remembered that the Jewish Second and Third Internationals of Russia are now actively organizing the forces of communism in every country of the world, including our own.

There are more Jews in America today than there were in Russia when the government was overthrown, and they are much more powerful and aggressive. It is estimated that there are now 80 times more communists in America than there were in Russia at that time. The same methods that were employed for the overthrow of the Czarist regime are being pursued here, viz: political corruption and class hatred.

As cruel and inhuman and incredible as are the protocols, they are no more so than the Talmud, whose authenticity the Jews admit. In fact the spirit and philosophy of the protocols permeate the Talmud, and vice versa. They are both founded upon the false premise that the Jews are a superior people and that they are the "chosen" people. They both breathe the same hatred and contempt for the Christian Gentile whom they call the 'goyim.' They both not only justify but advocate the exploitation and enslavement of the despised 'goyim.'

The Talmud is the law and gospel of the Jews. It is their bible and civil law as defined and interpreted by their chief priests and Rabbis.

> "It must be admitted by every critical student of history that the Talmud has not merely been the means of keeping alive the religious idea among the Jews, but has formed their strongest bond of union."*

It is not the Talmud but the rabbi that has kept alive the racial and religious solidarity and bigotry and intolerance of the Jews.

The following brief quotations from "The Talmud Unmasked" are examples of it:

> "The life of a Goi and all his powers belong to a Jew." (A. Rohl. Die Polem. p. 20)." (P. 71).
>
> "In Choschen Ham. (266.1) it says: 'A Jew may keep anything he finds which belongs to the Akum, for it is written: Return to thy brethren what is lost (Deuter. XXII, 3). For he who returns lost property (to Christians) sins against the Law by increasing the power of the transgressors of the Law.'" (P. 72).
>
> "In Midrasch Talpioth (fol. 225d) it says: 'God created them in the form of men for the glory of Israel. But Akum were created for the sole end of ministering unto them (the Jews) day and night. Nor can they ever be relieved of this service. It is becoming to the son of a king (an Israelite) that animals in their natural form, and animals in the form of human beings should minister unto him'." (P. 50).
>
> "And in Eben Haezer (44, 8) : 'If a Jew enters into marriage with an Akum (Christian), or with his servant, the marriage is null. For they are not capable of entering into matrimony. Likewise if an Akum or a servant enter into matrimony with a Jew, the marriage is null'." (P. 51).

Many of these dicta are ancient but have never been repudiated or repealed and the spirit of them still prevails. They still constitute the law for the Jews, both civil and ecclesiastical. The Talmud is made up of the decisions and interpretations of the rabbis, in the same manner that our common law has been formed by our judges and commentators. No matter how ancient the dictum, it is the law until overruled by a contrary one.

*Encyclopedia Britannica, Vol. 23, p. 38.

"The Talmud Unmasked" by Rev. I. B. Prainatis, Copyrighted by Col. E. N. Sanctuary, 156 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

The Jewish Encyclopedia, Vol 4, p. 294-296, defines the rabbis' functions as follows:

> "Rabbi (my master); function to teach the scriptures and the oral and traditional laws . . . In the Jewish religion the rabbi is no priest, no apostle, he has no hierarchical authority. He is a teacher, one who unfolds and explains religion, teaches the young in the school, the old from the pulpit, and both by his writings."

The reader should observe the intermingling of their civil and religious laws. Both appear to be based on their interpretation of the old testament (see reference to Deuter. XXII, 3 above). They are so confused that it is impossible to determine where their religion ends and their civil law begins.

It is clear, however, that both in a civil and religious sense they regard themselves as a "chosen" people, a superior race who are entitled to rule us (the 'goyim'), and are entitled to our services and to everything we have. We Gentiles were created for the purpose of serving them, of being their slaves. Although in the form of "human beings" we are no better than animals. We are not worthy of marrying one of them, either man or woman, and if we do, such marriage is illegal and void. They have adhered to this law rather religiously throughout the ages and in all countries.

The author sums up their estimate of us (the goyim) as follows:

> "They are idolaters, the worst kind of people, much worse than the Turks, murderers, fornicators, impure animals, like dirt, unworthy to be called men, beasts in human form, worthy of the name of beasts, cows, asses, pigs, dogs, worse than dogs; that they propagate after the manner of beasts, that they have a diabolic origin, that their souls come from the devil and return to the devil in hell after death; and that even the body of a dead Christian is nothing different from that of an animal."*

The following are samples of their estimate of Christians and of our Savior, Jesus Christ:

> "In Hilkhoth Akum" (X, 1) it says: 'Do not eat with idolaters, nor permit them to worship their idols; for it is written: Make no covenant with them, nor show mercy unto them (Deuter. ch. 7); 2). Either turn them away from their idols or kill them.'

*The Talmud Unmasked. P. 46.

"Ibidem (X, 7) : 'In places where Jews are strong, no idolater must be allowed to remain'."

"The book Zohar, III (282) tells us that Jesus died like a beast and was buried in that 'dirt heap . . . where they throw the dead bodies of dogs and asses, and where the sons of Esau (the Christians) and of Ismael (the Turks), also Jesus and Mahommad, uncircumcized and unclean like dead dogs, are buried."

The author sums up their verdict as follows:

"The Talmud teaches that Jesus Christ was illegitimate arid was conceived during menstruation; that he had the soul of Esau; that he was a fool, a conjurer, a seducer; that he was crucified, buried in hell and set up as an idol ever since by his followers." (P. 30).

They call this a religion and they insist on their privilege to worship God as they choose, and they decry our intolerance and bigotry. The Christian religion is based upon love and charity and repentance and the forgiveness of sin. There is no charity, no love, no repentance here; there is nothing but pride, intolerance, and hatred.

The Christian religion is everything the Talmud is not, and the Talmud is everything the Christian religion is not; it and its devotees are the anti-Christ. We have the spectacle now of a Jewish rabbi, a Catholic priest and a Protestant preacher going about over the country at Jewish expense preaching tolerance; a virtue that is utterly foreign to the Jewish religion and the Jewish character.

The chief priests and rabbis who wrote the various and numerous dissertations set forth in the Talmud could have written the protocols. They are of kindred nature and expression; they are made of the same cloth and patterned in the same fashion.

We prefer to think that the Talmud and the protocols misrepresent the viewpoint of the Jews that we know and with whom we come in daily contact, and that may be true of many of them. However that may be, we know that the Jews hold themselves as a race apart and that they adhere religiously to their ancient racial customs and rituals and organizations. We know also that they blindly "follow the leader," and that their rabbis and Learned Elders are their leaders. They believe in their

 p. 83.

 p. 36.

Talmud and obey its edicts—indeed they must do so or suffer racial ostracism; and they worship the Rothschilds and the Rothschild power that rules them.

These and similar proclamations as set forth in the Talmud, constitute the "bond" that has held the race together. They explain the fact that the Jew does not assimilate with other races. They are based on the false assumption that the Jews are a "chosen" and superior people.

The Talmud is mistaken. The Jews are not a "chosen" or a superior people. God never made any such mistake as that. The history of the race is not one of achievement of anything except money. It is one of chiselling and of defrauding the peoples of the various countries in which they have resided, which has often been followed by their own alleged persecution. In this life we usually reap what we sow, or in common parlance, "get what is coming to us." The history of Judaism is proof of the truth of this proverb.

It may be conceded that the Jew is more shrewd and cunning, and a better trader and manipulator of money than the Gentile—but that represents the limit of his superiority and achievements. The Jew has contributed but little to science, invention, art, to the wealth of nations, or to the advancement of civilization.

I hope that I am not intolerant and anti-Semitic, but I confess that I have no patience with a religion that denounces Christ as a bastard, an imposter and a cheat, and that glories in his crucifixion; and I am against a race that holds me as an inferior being and seeks to enslave me. I nevertheless wish to be fair and just, as well as candid and plain-spoken, in my discussion of the subject.

I can make allowance for the fact that the Jews feel, and probably righteously so, an ancient grievance against the Gentiles because of past oppressions, which is kept alive by their rabbis and Learned Elders and their protocols and Talmud. But it is high time for them to get over it, to forget their vengeance and to abandon their ambitious designs, particularly here in America where we do not want to harm them, and wish to accord them all of the rights and privileges we enjoy.

The renegade Gentiles who cooperate with them in furthering their villainous scheme, viz., to enslave the peoples of the world, are no better than the Jews. They are in fact worse, for they are without the excuse of race or religion. They are simply unmitigated scoundrels. They will herein be designated for descriptive purposes as Jewish. This term will be used also in describing hybrids and those suspected of Jewish blood.

III.

The Jews Defense

> "For what purpose then have we invented this whole policy and insinuated it into the minds of the goys without giving them any chance to examine its underlying meaning? For what, indeed, if not in order to obtain in a roundabout way what is for our scattered tribe unattainable by the direct road? It is this which has served as the basis for our organization of secret masonry which is not known to, and aims which are not even so much as suspected by these goy cattle, attracted by us into the "show" army of masonic lodges in order to throw dust in the eyes of their fellows."—From Protocol 11.

The Liberty Magazine (Feb. 10 and 17, 1940) published two articles under the heading "The Jews and Free Masonry—Exploding the Myth of a World Conspiracy," written by Louis B. Davidson and Frederic L. Collins. These articles represent the flimsy and threadbare defense of the Jews that has been published from time to time in various forms. They purport to contain a synopsis of the testimony given in the trial at Berne, Switzerland, where the trial court found the defendant booksellers guilty and declared the protocols to be "forgery, plagiarism, and obscene literature."

There is some historical truth in this story, mixed as it is with much that is false, but the conclusions based upon this admixture are wholly false. It is true as they assert, that "there is no international organization of Free-masonry, and the organization of each nation is independent of all others." The continental masonry is composed wholly of Jews and hybrids. While the Jews are permitted to be masons in America (Catholics are excluded), they do not dominate the order and it is not a racial one and is not communistic. It is a non-political fraternal benevolent organization, while continental masonry is a political, malevolent one.

No one claims, except the authors of these articles, that "the noble order of Freemasons should be drawn into this campaign or calumny," or "links free masonry with world Jewry in a mythical conspiracy to rule the world." It is admitted, as these authors allege, that the "Illuminati" founded by the Jew Adam Weishaupt was a branch of the continental masons and that "the chief aim of this organization . . . was the destruction of all forms of religion, government, property, marriage, and all civil rights," which is likewise the present chief aim of the "Learned Elders of Zion," and of the Jewish communist party.

It is also admitted, as they allege, that the Illuminati "played a major role in bringing on the bloody days of 1789 (French Revolution), that it was founded and reputedly financed by Jews," and that the "great House of Rothschild was then just rising to the financial heights." There is evidence that it was in fact financed by the "great House of Rothschild;" and the French revolution was in fact brought about by the Jews. It was the final act that freed the Jews from their political and civil disabilities in France.

It is also true, as they allege, that the "Kerensky government in 1917 confiscated the entire issue (of the protocols) except one volume which had been sent to the British museum. It is said that the Jew Kerensky not only destroyed all of the copies to be found in Russia but that every Gentile found in possession of one was murdered. What stronger proof of guilt could there be? Men do not fear lies and forgeries; it is the truth that the guilty always want to suppress.

The copy that was sent to the British Museum was translated by Victor Marsden, a representative of the London Morning Post, who had previously resided in Russia for many years. It is true, as they allege, that the protocols have been translated into French, Italian, Arabic, German, Japanese and Scandinavian languages. It is said that their circulation is second only to that of the bible.

I have no means of knowing whether the protocols are responsible for the pogroms in Russia, as detailed in the articles mentioned. They have undoubtedly created a profound impression throughout the world, which is evidence that people believe them despite the Jewish control of the press, and their ridicule and their denials.

"Are they authentic? Shouted the alarmed editor of the (Jewish owned) London Times in May 1920," according to these authors. "What malevolent society made these schemes and is now triumphing over their realization? Are they forged? From where does the weird gift of prophecy spring that partly has come true and is partly to be realized? . . . Have we escaped a German peace by straining all our national resources only to submit to a Jewish peace?" (Which is precisely what hapened). The above quotation is from the Liberty article. They do not tell us what the Jewish owners did to this "alarmed editor." They probably crucified him.

It is not true that Nilus was a "briefless avocat" in Russia and it is not true that he wrote the protocols to "find favor with the Grand Duchess Elizabeth." Even the authors of the Liberty articles do not vouch for this fantastic story. Why then mention it? On the contrary, Nilus was a reputable educator and author of unimpeachable integrity. He believed that the "Hidden Hand" was the author of the protocols, and such was also the belief of Victor Marsden the translator, and such is also the belief of millions of people in all countries.

Assuming that the authors have correctly quoted the various paragraphs from "Maurice Joly's Dialogues in Hell," it must be admitted that there is evident plagiarism by the real author of the protocols. But that does not prove that Nilus was the plagiarist. If the "dialogues in hell" truly represented the hellish plans of the Elders it is but natural that they should adopt them and use them. In that case they are the plagiarists.

The weakest part of the whole argument is the statement of the evidence upon which the Berne trial court predicated its judgment. It is in substance as follows: The Princess Catherine Radziwill testified that she knew "the Paris agent of the Russian secret police and that she knew Golovinsky, very well;" that Golovinsky had access to Joly's Dialogues, that he "came to her home with parts of the script which he showed and read to her; . . . that his job was to prove to the Czar that the Jews had formed an international plot to conquer the world."

She was asked, "Could you describe Golovinsky's draft?" She replied, "Yes, as he kept reading passages to me I became familiar with the entire script. He later showed me the completed manuscript. It was identical with the Protocols of Zion, which I later saw in the various Nilus editions. It was written in French in a variety of handwritings. It was on yellowish paper; there was a big circular blue ink blot on the first page."

"This description was confirmed by the Count du Chayla, who described the text as unidiomatic and showing every sign of having been written by a foreigner on cheap yellowish paper —and said that on the first page was a circular ink blot."

It should be remembered that this trial was in 1935, just thirty years after the publication of the protocols in 1905. It must be conceded that these two witnesses who were able to remember the contents of a lengthy document that did not concern them, and an ink spot thereon, for such a long period of time, had most remarkable memories. It is obviously manufactured testimony, but if all they said were true it does not prove that Nilus forged the protocols or that they are spurious.

The decision of the Bern trial court was reversed by the appellate court, which the said Liberty authors failed to mention. This reversal is not surprising in view of the utter lack of competent and credible evidence. It should be also remembered that the Jews selected their own court in which to file their suit. It is a cinch that they selected a Jewish or pro-Jewish one. They wanted to be able to proclaim to the world, as they do, that the courts have adjudged that the protocols are spurious.

In passing judgment on the Jews and their denials, it should always be remembered that the Talmud enjoins them to deceive the Christians, to lie to them and to cheat them. It is their law and their religion, and it is the part of it that many of them observe industriously and enthusiastically. We "goyim" are as dumb and gullible as they believe us to be if we accept such flimsy explanations at par.

The succeeding chapters of this book will prove conclusively that the "Learned Elders of Zion"—the present Council of the Jewish Agency are now ceaselessly and relentlessly pursuing their ancient plan to enslave the people of the world and to establish their world empire. There can be no proof of such a secret conspiracy other than by its fruits. There can be no explanation of current events or of the worlds history for the past 150 years except the machinations of the financial power that has governed it during that period of time.

It will be hereafter proven with reasonable certainty that the protocols contain the law of the Rothschild money power that now rules every country of the world, including our own. The protocols are the "law of our bank" to which Rabbi Reichhorn referred in his funeral oration (see Appendix II). They are the law of the Bank of England, the Bank of France, the New York Federal Reserve Bank, the Washington Federal Reserve Board, J. P. Morgan & Co., and Kuhn, Loeb & Co., and of N. M. Rothschild & Sons and of Georges Mandel (Jeroboam Rothschild).

They are the key that explains the political maneuverings of this malign power. When it is once clearly understood that these immense financial institutions are all controlled by the "King-Despot of the blood of Zion" who is none other than the present head of the Rothschild family, we can better understand the turmoil of the world and our own distressed condition.

It should be observed that the protocol quoted at the beginning of this chapter states that there are two kinds of masonry, viz: "secret masonry" and "show masonry;" that the "aims" of the secret masonry are known only to themselves and that they are not even suspected by the "goy cattle" who compose the "show masonry."

The secret masonry in France was the "Illuminati," and in Russia and the balance of Europe, the Nihilists, and in America the B'nai B'rith. It should be also observed that the protocols make the distinction between the ignorant "goy cattle" who are members of the "show" lodges, and their own wise sect who belong to their secret orders. The Illuminati and Nihilists were destroyers and killers. The B'nai B'rith is a modern secret order and has no history behind it; all we know of it is that it is a secret racial organization to promote racial "aims."

IV.

Mayer Amschel Rothschild First King of the Jews

"The King of the Jews will be the real Pope of the Universe, the patriarch of an international church."

—From Protocol 17.

MAYER AMSCHEL ROTHSCHILD, 1—1790-1812.

Mayer Amschel was born in 1743 and died Sept. 29, 1812. He married Gutter Schnaper in 1770. They had a large family consisting of five sons and five daughters. He was educated as a rabbi and in his early life was both a rabbi and a junk and coin dealer. He became a money lender and in that connection acted as agent for William IX, Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel.

There is much obscurity in the history of the Rothschild family, due to the fact that their operations are always secret and the historians are either Semitic or anti-Semitic, the majority being Semitic. The conclusions here presented are based principally on Jewish or pro-Jewish history. I shall quote liberally from the Jewish Encyclopedia because it was, as stated in its preface, "prepared by more than 400 scholars and specialists" all of whom were Jews.* It was published in 1905 and re-published in 1909. While it is a partisan history, it is on the whole, accurate in its statements of fact—it at least presents the Jew version of the facts.

The authority mentioned says:

"In a latter connection (money lender) he became an agent of William IX, Landgrave cf Hesse-Cassel, who on his father's death in 1785 had inherited the largest private fortune in Europe (estimated at $40,000,000) derived mainly from the hire of troops to the British government for the putting down of the revolution in the United States . . . After the battle qf June in 1806 the Landgrave fled to Denmark, leaving 600,000 pounds (about $3,000,000) with Mayer Rothschild for safe keeping."

It states further:

"According to legend this money was hidden away in wine casks and escaping the search of Napoleon's soldiers when they entered Frankfort, was restored intact in the same casks in 1814 when the elector returned to the electorate. The facts are somewhat less romantic and more business-like."

*Jewish Ency. Vol. X, p. 499 et seq.

The facts are entirely "less romantic and more business-like," (from the Jewish standpoint). Mayer Amschel Rothschild embezzled the money. This money was tainted from its very origin. It was paid by the British government to the Landgrave for the services of his soldiers, used to suppress the American revolution, and the soldiers were morally entitled to it. It was first embezzled by William of Hesse and then by Mayer Amschel.

This twice-stolen money is the foundation of the huge Rothschild fortune. It has ever since been true to its origin. There is not an honestly acquired dollar in the hundreds of billions now possessed by the Rothschild family.

Instead of putting the money in wine casks, Mayer Rothschild sent the entire sum, with his son Nathan, to London, and then and there established the London branch of the family.

> "Nathan . . . invested it in 800,000,000 pounds of gold from the East India Company, knowing that it would be needed for Wellington's peninsula campaign. He made no less than four profits: (1) on the sale of Wellington's paper (which he bought at 50c on the dollar and collected at par); (2) on the sale of gold to Wellington; (3) on its re-purchase; and (4) on forwarding it to Portugal. This was the beginning of the great fortune." (p. 494).

This was indeed much "less romantic and more business-like." With this vast sum of money, branches of the House of Rothschild were established in Berlin, Paris, Vienna and Naples, with one of the brothers in charge of each of them. AH of these houses were exceedingly prosperous, particularly the London and Paris branches.

The founder of this huge fortune, Mayer Amschel Rothschild, established four fundamental principles for its government, which the sons and their descendents have observed, viz:

(1) The eldest son of the eldest son to be the head and ruler of the fortune. He became the head by virtue of his seniority unless the majority of the members of the family decided otherwise. There have been only two exceptions to this rule so far as revealed by history, and that was the appointment of Nathan, the third son of Mayer Amschel, as its head, and later the appointment of James the fifth son. By reason of his achievements Nathan was appointed the head of the fortune upon Mayer Amschel's death in 1812.

(2) The inter-marriage of cousins. This was for the purpose of preserving the family fortune intact and in the family. This rule has not been strictly observed, particularly by the female members of the family, due no doubt partially to rebellion on the part of some members of the family and partially to the fact that other Jews have become very rich and by reason of marriage the family fortune has been enhanced rather than depleted.

> "The number of marriages between cousins in the late history of the family is remarkable . . . Of 58 marriages, 29, or exactly one-half, have been between first cousins. It is noteworthy that these marriages have been fertile and that most of the children have been girls, which is what is anticipated by biological science."

(3) The unity of the family fortune and its concealment. No copy of Mayer Amschel's will has been published by any of the historians of the family. All that we are permitted to know about it is what the historians say of it, by the record of the family and by the reference to it in the will of one of his grandsons, Anselm, of Vienna. It contains the following provision:

> "In accordance with the exhortations of my father, the grandfather who so sincerely loved them (Anselm's children), as contained in Clause 15 of his will, may they and their descendants remain constantly true to their ancestral Jewish faith.
>
> "I forbid them most explicitly, in any circumstances whatever, to have any public inventory made by the courts, or otherwise, of my estate . . . Also I forbid any legal action, and any publication of the value of the inheritance . . . Anyone who disregards these provisions and takes any kind of action which conflicts with them shall immediately be regarded as having disputed the will, and shall suffer the penalties for so doing."*

(4) A perpetual family partnership. At the time of Mayer Amschel's death, his entire estate was in the form of a partnership composed of himself and his five sons, each having an equal interest, under the firm name of M. A. Rothschild & Sons. Both the partnership agreement and Mayer Amschel's will provided that the partners and their male descendants should forever constitute the firm and manage it. The will provided also that the female members of the family and their heirs and husbands should have no part in the management of the firm and that they should receive their interest in the estate subject to the management of the male members; and that if any of them should contest this arrangement that they would lose their interest in the estate.

*The Reign of the House of Rothschild, p. 405.

Later, Nathan organized the London firm of N. M. Rothschild & Sons on the same plan. This firm was probably owned in equal proportions by him and his brothers and governed in the same manner as the parent partnership.

Originally the partnership agreement provided that no important decision should be made without the approval of all the partners. As the fortune grew in magnitude it became impractical to hold partners conferences upon its numerous undertakings. It is probable that Nathan's firm was organized in part to meet that situation and for the purpose of separating the activities of the London house from those of the continental houses.

It was probably Mayer Amschel's purpose in the beginning to establish a Jewish dynasty with his male descendants as rulers. Whether that was his purpose or not, it was the effect of his will. He established the kingdom of the Jews that has since been governed by his male descendants. Wherever a Jew is located, whatever nationality he may claim, he is a subject of this kingdom; his allegiance and duty to it supersedes his allegiance and duty to the country in which he dwells.

If a conflict develops between the government of his adopted country and his racial government, the Jew will always be found on the side of his race. He may not know the personnel of his racial government, its decisions may be unwritten, but they will reach him in some form, through his rabbis and through secret societies, and he is always obedient to them. That fact furnishes the explanation of all this Jewish war propaganda which is supported blindly and without dissent by all Jews.

At the time of Mayer Amschel's death he was by far the richest man in the world or that had ever lived. The magnitude of his fortune at that time is unknown. It was growing by leaps and bounds at such a rapid rate that it probably could not be estimated. He knew the power of money and the wisdom of secrecy. He believed with religious fervor that the Jews were the "chosen people" and that God had promised them that they should rule the world.

We cannot know whether at that time he had in contemplation a Jewish world empire. Apparently this was a later development. There is good reason to believe that this ambitious enterprise was initiated by Theodore Herzl a short time before the publication of the protocols in 1905. Herzl was an active, ambitious Jewish rabbi-politician and an intense hater of the Gentiles. He was given credit for organizing modern Zionism at a conference of the leaders of the Hebrew race in Basle, Switzerland, in 1897. It is thought that at that time and at that meeting some of the protocols were adopted as precepts for the establishment of the contemplated Jewish empire.

Herzl probably organized two important Jewish organizations: (1) a secret super-organization to be composed of 300 men whose identity should be kept secret and who would constitute the super-government for the Jewish race; (2) a popular religious organization to be composed of 450 delegates selected by the rabbis and the Hebrew churches.

At that time the Rothschild estate had grown to enormous proportions but the family had grown soft with luxury and had deteriorated by inbreeding. Moreover the fortune at that time had already effected the emancipation of the Jews and established the Rothschild kingdom. Apparently it then had the power under efficient management to establish a Jewish empire. Apparently also the management of the vast political power of the estate needed to be reinforced with outside blood. It is likely that at that time and through Herzl's activities, the Secret Committee of 300 was established for the management of the political power of the huge estate with the consent of the Rothschilds. It is known that Theodore Herzl was an intimate personal friend of Lord Rothschild, II.

The protocols themselves, or the gist of them, appear to have existed for a long period of time prior to their publication in 1905. In fact the intent and purpose of them are in substance contained in the Talmud. They were also in substance stated in 1869 in the Funeral Oration of Rabbi Reichhorn (set out in Appendix II). They evince a clear conception of the weakness of Gentile governments and institutions, and the best method to attack and destroy them. They set out the most effective method of establishing a dictatorship of the proletariat, which is the first step toward world empire.

The protocols themselves describe in great detail the powers of the King-Despot of their proposed empire, and the objectives of such empire. Stated briefly they are the absorption of the wealth of the Gentiles and their slavery, both politically and economically. They have already accomplished the debt slavery of the goyim; their present objective is his political slavery.

V.

The Rothschild Dynasty

> "Our power in the present tottering condition of all forms of power will be more invincible than any other, because it will remain invisible until the moment when it has gained such strength that no cunning can any longer undermine it."—From Protocol I.

King Amschel Rothschild I, was succeeded upon his death by his third son, Nathan, of London, on account of his uncanny and unscrupulous financial ability, and because of his achievements. He had, prior to Amschel's death, established the private banking house of N. M. Rothschild & Sons, and added enormously to the family fortune. It appears that the elder brother, Mayer Amschel, jr., who continued in charge of the Frankfort branch, recognized the superior qualifications of Nathan and was willing to waive his right by virtue of primo geniture. Nathan was therefore chosen by the four brothers as his father's successor.

KING NATHAN ROTHSCHILD II.—1812-1836.

Nathan married the sister-in-law of Moses Montefiore, "thus coming into association with the heads of the Sephardic community then ruling the financial world of London through their connection with Amsterdam."* Nathan is described by the historian John Reeves, a Rothschild partisan, as being a very shrewd, unscrupulous and uncouth man, and exceedingly close-fisted. He says that "he never paid his employees a farthing more than was necessary for their bare subsistence or at least not a farthing more than they could compel him to pay."

The Jew, Benjamin Disraeli, in his novel "Coningsby," denominates Nathan and also his son Lionel as "Sidonia." He says of the elder "Sidonia":

> "He arrived here (London) after the peace of Paris with his large capital. He staked all that he was worth on the Waterloo loan and the event made him one of the greatest capitalists in Europe . . . He reaped the due reward of his sagacity. Europe did require money and Sidonia was ready to lend it to Europe. France wanted some, Austria more, Prussia a little, Russia a few millions; Sidonia could furnish them all. The only country which he avoided was Spain; he was too well acquainted with its resources."

*Jewish Ency., Vol. X, p. 494.

"The Rothschilds,—Financial Rulers of Nations."

Disraeli says of him further:

> "He established a brother or a near relative in whom he could confide, in most of the principal capitals. He was lord and master of the money markets of the world and of course virtually lord and master of everything else. He literally held the revenues of southern Italy in pawn, and monarcha and ministers of all countries courted his advice and were guided by his suggestions."

John Reeves, in his book "The Rothschilds," says:

> "One cause of his (Nathan's) success was the secrecy with which he shrouded, and the tortuous policy with which he misled those who watched him the keenest." (P. 189).

And this principle, it may be added, has governed the management of the Rothschild fortune from its beginning to this hour.

The historian Reeves describes vividly how upon Nathan's return from near the battle of Waterloo (the Jews are usually observers of battles, not participants), he went post haste to the English Channel and there hired a boat at excessive cost and crossed the English channel in stormy weather, and from there rushed to the London stock exchange, appearing muddy and dejected, where he passed out the word that Wellington had been defeated at Waterloo, and reinforced this by ostentatiously dumping stocks on the market. This created a great panic upon the exchange and everybody dumped their stocks at sacrifice prices. In the meantime Nathan, through his agents, was secretly buying them.

There were no telegraphs or telephones or radios or fast posts in those days. It was several days before the news reached London that Wellington had won the battle of Waterloo. There was then great rejoicing and the stock market rebounded and stocks went to unprecedented heights, when Nathan unloaded his stocks.

This is precisely the method that the Rothschilds have followed since, and is one of the methods by which they have amassed their huge fortune. "Nathan boasted that he had multiplied their capital 2500 times in the course of five years."*

If this is true, it means that at that time (about 1820) the capital of the English branch had been increased from $3,000,000 to about $7,500,000,000.

*"The Rothschilds, Financial Rulers of Nations," p. 167.

Nathan established the private banking firm of N. M. Rothschild & Sons in London, with branches in Paris, Berlin, Vienna and Naples. This firm operates on the exchanges, underwrites government and other loans; it is the agent and manager of banks, railways, steel, munitions, and other corporations. It has branches under many names. In America it is represented by Kuhn, Loeb & Co., and formerly by August Belmont & Co. It is probable also that J. P. Morgan & Co., Seligman & Co., Speyer & Co., Lehman & Co., and other private Jewish banks are its under-cover branches.

Lionel Rothschild, the eldest son of Nathan, succeeded him as the head and managing partner of N. M. Rothschild & Sons. He is described by his fellow tribesman, Disraeli, as follows:

> "He perceived himself a lone being, alike without cares and without duties; his religion walled him out from the pursuits of a citizen . . . He was a man without affections . . . The only human quality that interested 'Sidonia' was intellect . . . No minister of state had such communication with secret agents and political spies as Sidonia; he held relations with all the clever outcasts of the world. The catalogue of his acquaintance in the shape of Greeks, Armenians, Moors, secret Jews, Tartars, gypsies, wandering Poles and Carbonari, would throw a curious light on those subterranean agencies of which the world in general knows so little, but which exercise so great an influence on public events."

The Jewish Encyclopedia states:

> "Lionel was the friend and counselor of the Prince Consort and of Disraeli, whose Sidonia in "Coningsby" is an ideal portrait of him . . . that he brought about in 1858 the enactment of the disabilities bill which permitted the Jews to hold office in England . . .
>
> "He advanced the British government the money for the Irish famine loan (about $40,000,000) and also for the Crimean war (about $80,000,000), and that for twenty years he acted as agent for the Russian government.
>
> "He had a large share in the successful funding of the United States national debt, provided the funds for the immediate purchase of the Suez Canal shares; he was also active in facilitating the payment of the French indemnity to Germany, in directing the finances of the Austrian Empire, and the Egyptian loan of 8,500,000 pounds. (About $40,000,000)."*

The statement is in error as to the funding of the United States National debt. This funding operation which was handled by the firm of Morgan & Company and the Rothschilds was the retirement of greenbacks during Cleveland's Administration. It brought about the hard times of that period. The "facilitating the payment of the French indemnity to Germany" was the demonetization of silver in 1873 which has been correctly called "the crime of '73."

"Coningsby," by Benjamin Disraeli, p. 180-181.

*Jewish Encyclopedia, Vol. 10, p. 501-2.

Lionel was elected a member of Parliament from Aylesbury but refused to take the oath of office upon a Bible containing the New Testament, and consequently was refused his seat. He ran and was elected a second time, with the same result. Upon his third election the oath was waived as to the New Testament and he was sworn in on the Old Testament. He was the first Jew to hold office in England. Thus began the pollution and deterioration of the British Government.

Lionel's eldest son, Nathan Mayer (Lord Rothschild 1st) succeeded him as head of N. M. Rothschild & Sons on his death in 1879. The Jewish Encyclopedia states that:

> "In 1885 he (Nathan) was raised to the peerage and was the first Jew to take his seat in the House of Lords, an event which was regarded as completing the emancipation of the Jews . . . Lord Rothschild is a governor of the Bank of England and a presiding officer of many great corporations . . . In 1902 he was appointed a member of the Royal Commission on Alien Immigration, an office that brought him in touch with the late Theodore Herzl."*

Nathan's promotion from the House of Commons to the peerage was recommended by Prime Minister Wm. E. Gladstone and Lord Grenville. Queen Victoria at first objected on the ground that "to make a Jew a peer is a step she could not consent to; it would be ill-taken and would do the government great harm."

Unfortunately, she yielded against her woman's intuition and her sound judgment. This was the beginning of the transformation of the British House of Lords from a Gentile landed aristocracy to a Jewish plutocracy, and of the government from a Gentile to a Jewish government. It is reported that there are now sixty Jews in the House of Lords without counting the hybrids that should in fact be included.

The intermarriage of the impoverished landed aristocrats with rich Jewesses has polluted the bloodstream of the British aristocracy and to that extent weakened the government. While the Jews wish to preserve their racial integrity they also seek to have their women marry titles, for such marriages increase their prestige and power.

*Jewish Ency. Vol. 10, p. 503.

The Magnificent Rothschilds, p. 122.

The Jew and the hybrid infest the House of Commons as well as the House of Lords. Many of the members of that body are Jewish owners of large estates elected by the tenants of such estates, as was Lionel. The present decadent British Empire and government (Churchill, Eden, Cooper, et al.) are due primarily to the Jew and Jewish blood pollution. It is a Jewish government.

The protocols were published by Nilus in 1905 but they themselves bear no date. They purport to be minutes of many meetings, some of which no doubt occurred long prior to 1905. Theodore Herzl is thought to be the author of one or more of them, which were promulgated at the Basle meeting of the Elders of Zion (Council of the Jewish Agency).

Whether this is true or not, the protocols represent the moral and political philosophy of the rulers of the Rothschild fortune. Mayer Amschel Rothschild hated the Gentiles with an intense religious hatred, and that hatred has been handed down from generation to generation. It is a hatred that demands vengeance upon the Gentile race—"an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth." It is shown in every paragraph, every sentence and every word in the three codes of the family, viz., the Talmud, the protocols, and the code of the communists.

Perhaps in the beginning it was justified, for the age in which Mayer Amschel lived was a cruel age and the Jews were undoubtedly despised and oppressed by the various peoples among whom they lived; this was particularly true of the German and Russian peoples and governments. This hatred of the Gentile is still kept alive by the Council of the Jewish Agency, their protocols, and the rabbis and their Talmud.

Nathan Mayer Rothschild died in 1915 and was succeeded by his eldest son, Lionel Walter, the second Lord Rothschild, as the head of the banking firm N. M. Rothschild & Sons. He appears to have been a member of the Council of the Jewish Agency. He died in 1937 and was succeeded as head of the London branch of the banking firm by his eldest son, Nathan Mayer Victor (third Lord Rothschild) who is the present gold agent of the Bank of England.

The history of the second and third Lord Rothschild is current and not yet recorded. It may be safely assumed that all of the active male members of the Rothschild family are members of the Council of the Jewish Agency, for that is the agency that controls the political policy of the Rothschild fortune.

KING ROTHSCHILD, III (Baron James), 1836-1868. Upon Nathan's death in 1836 the sceptre and the line of descent passed from Nathan's eldest son Lionel, head of the London house, to James Rothschild, fifth son of Amschel, head of the Paris House. This despite the fact that Lionel was then 28 years old, had married in orthodox fashion his first cousin Carlotta, the daughter of his uncle Solomon, was the manager of the richest banking branch of the family, and was the ablest of them all. All of the Jewish historians agree that this change was made but none of them assign any reason.

Count Cherep-Spiridovich states the reason as follows:

> "James Rothschild, born in 1792, misruled from 1836 until 1868. He married ugly Betty, the daughter of his brother Solomon of Vienna. Because of the "crime" of Nathan the latter's son Lionel was deprived of the World's Throne. James became Rothschild III, Thus decided Amschel (Anselm) Salomon, and Karl Rothschild, who all gathered in July 1836 at Frankfort in order to judge and presumably to execute Nathan, possibly the only Rothschild, who through total lack of principle, wished to become a Christian, only that he could the easier deceive and enslave the English people."*

All of the Jewish authorities agree that there was a genoral family reunion and a great banquet in Paris on the occasion of the marriage of Lionel; that Nathan was taken violently ill and seized with spasms indicating poisoning; that the doctors were unable to diagnose the trouble and that he died within a few hours. Whether he was poisoned or not, the kingship of the Rothschild fortune passed from Nathan's heirs to his brother James and his heirs.

History reveals but little about the reign of James. He appears to have been a cold, cruel, shrewd, unscrupulous man who contributed materially to the wealth of the Paris House. His personal wealth at the time of his death was estimated at 45,000,000 pounds,—or more than $200,000,000,—but this was only an estimate, since no inventory of his estate was filed.

KING ROTHSCHILD, IV., (Baron Alphonse D.) 1868 to-------.

The most recent history of the Rothschild family is that of the Jewish Cecil Roth, published in 1939. It brings the history of the English branch down to that date, but not that of the Paris branch. Therefore we can know but little about the reign of this monarch.

*"The Secret World Government, or The Hidden Hand," p. 138.

John Reeves, in his book published in 1887, said:

> "The present head of the firm in Paris is Baron Alphonse D. Rothschild, the eldest son of Baron James. He inherits much of his father's financial talent and is acknowledged by the rest of his relatives as the shrewdest and most able man of business among them. He is the head of the family not only on account of his ability but on account of his seniority, as he is the oldest of Mayer Amschel's grandsons."*

KING ROTHSCHILD V or VI (Jeroboam Rothschild, alias Georges Mandel).

The reign of this monarch is current and therefore nothing is known of it except what is revealed by current literature. We do not know when it began or whether he succeeded Alphonse, or whether there is an intervening ancestor, but he appears to be the present head of the Paris House, and King of the Rothschild fortune, and it appears that such was his position and power in 1918, when the Versailles Peace Treaty was written.

There is here presented a picture of him and his puppet Paul Reynaud, Premier of France, reproduced from the May 27, 1940, issue of "Time Magazine," a Jewish publication. His countenance reveals his character. He appears to be a crafty, cruel, greedy, mean man, with not a single redeeming virtue,

He is the product of four generations of treachery and inbreeding, and a true descendant of "ugly Betty." We can now better understand the infamous peace treaty, the Brussels Financial Conference, the depressions of 1920, 1930 and 1937, the election of Franklin D. Roosevelt, the New Deal, and the present World War.

We do not know why he changed his name from Jeroboam Rothschild to Georges Mandel unless it was for the same reason that other Jews change their names, viz: to deceive. But why should he want to deceive unless it is to conceal the fact that he is the present ruler of the welfare of all of the people of the world?

We can understand why Isidore Isokowitz would change his name to Eddie Cantor. But the name Rothschild is eminently respectable and carries more weight than Mandel. Surely no Rothschild would be ashamed of a name that represents the political and financial power of the world, and that is graced by many honorary titles. The only apparent reason for his hiding behind a fictitious name is his inbred secretiveness, which is in keeping with the time-honored Rothschild system.

*"The Rothschilds, Financial Rulers of Nations," p. 54.

Georges Mandel [Jeroboam Rothschild] and Paul Reynaud.

The author of "The Hidden Hand" states that Edward Rothschild of Paris, France, was at the date of the publication of his book in 1925, the ruler of the Rothschild fortune. I have not accepted this view for the reasons that Jeroboam Rothschild was at that time and prior and subsequent thereto, an influential member of the French cabinet and that he was Clemenceau's adviser when the Versailles peace treaty was written. This was an occasion of such great importance to the Jewish race that the head of the family would no doubt have officiated.

VI.

The Wealth of the Rothschild Family

> "Gold always has been and always will be the irresistible power. Handled by expert hands it always will be the most useful lever for those who possess it, and the object of envy for those who do not."—From "Funeral Oration of Rabbi Reichhorn."

According to the boast of Nathan Rothschild he increased the family fortune from $3,000,000 to about $7,500,000,000 within five years time, which would be in about 1820. In 1848 the Paris house was reckoned at 600,000,000 francs as against 362,000,000 for all of the other Paris bankers. We have no historical information as to the wealth of the Berlin, Vienna and Naples branches. We do, however, know that they were strong enough to dominate the money markets of those capitals.

At the rate of speed that Nathan traveled, viz., an increase of 500% a year, the fortune of the London branch alone would have been more than $100,000,000,000 by 1840. It is not likely, however, that he continued to multiply the family fortune 500% a year, but it is probable that he continued to increase it at the rate of 10% or more, annually. At this rate it would have amounted to approximately $20,000,000,000 by 1840, just 100 years ago.

The imagination can scarcely conceive the immensity and power of such a fortune. The three greatest American fortunes have been the Rockefeller, Carnegie, and Ford, which together would not exceed $2,000,000,000. If those fortunes should be loaned at 5% compound interest the mere accumulation of interest would in the course of time, and not a very long time at that, consume the wealth of the world. But compound interest is only a small element of the Rothschild fortune; it has been developed by speculation on the exchanges preceding and following wars and depressions as well as by the accumulation of interest.

We can take pencil and paper and figure accurately the increase of $20,000,000,000 at 5% compound interest in 100 years time, but it is impossible to even approximate the profits from the manipulation of the exchanges. The Rothschilds, during that entire period of 100 years, have been active manipulators of every important stock and commodity exchange of the world.

By virtue of their immense financial power they have been able to raise or lower prices at will, to create a boom or bring on a depression, to buy when stocks and commodities are cheap, and to sell when they are high. It is by these crooked manipulations that they and the members of their race have acquired the greater part of the wealth of the world.

The authority mentioned* reports that from 1817 to 1848 they made loans to various countries, aggregating 654,487,200 pounds. It reports also that they financed both Napoleon and the allies during the Napoleonic wars, and that they financed the American wars.

> "But in the two great wars Jewish financiers played a considerable role owing doubtless to their European connections. Hamym Solomon in the revolutionary war, while Seligman Brothers and Speyer & Company financed the North and and Messrs. Erlanger the South in the great civil war. More recently, in the great development of railway finance the firm of Kuhn, Loeb & Company have taken a prominent part."

It will shock the American people to learn that Hamyn Solomon whom we have regarded as a revolutionary hero, was the agent of Rothschild, and that Rothschild financed both sides of the American revolution and the civil war. This is true to form. They acknowledge allegiance to no country; they are out for the money, and it matters not how or where they get it; they wish to destroy all governments in order to establish their own, and their method is to promote and finance wars.

It was stated by the Russian Major General, Count Cherep-Spiridovich, that the Rothschild family fortune in 1925 was $300,000,000,000, and that they made $100,000,000,000 of that sum out of the late world war, now called World War I.

This appears to be a very conservative estimate. We have had a number of minor wars since that (late and two major depressions, viz., the disaster of 1929-1930 and the Roosevelt debacle of 1937, as a result of which stocks have fluctuated violently in value. It is likely that the Rothschild family fortune is now in the neighborhood of $500,000,000,000, which is about twice the value of the wealth of all the people of the United States.

The aggregate wealth of the present several hundred members of the family is only a matter of conjecture for it is kept as a sacred, profound secret. It is rare that we get even a glimpse of the wealth of any individual member of the family.

*Jewish Ency., Vol 10, p. 493-495.

"The Secret World Government, or The Hidden Hand."

It is the history of the Rothschild family that all of its members conceal their wealth in every possible way. This is done not only in pursuance of the will of the founder of the fortune, but also to enable them to accomplish their purposes as set forth in the protocols.

It is estimated that the Jews have absorbed four-fifths of the wealth of Germany, Austria, Poland, and Czecho Slovakia, and more than one-half of that of England, France, and Italy. They practically own the banks, railways, steel and munition plants of these countries, to say nothing of the Press and other minor industries.

They undoubtedly own approximately one-half of the wealth of America. With one or two possible exceptions they own the huge New York banks (which implies the control of the New York Federal Reserve Bank), the insurance companies, the railroads, 70% of the steel and munition industries, 80% of the metropolitan press, the news and advertising agencies, the cinema, and 80% of the radio broadcasting companies. Wherever there is a monopoly a Jew will likely be found in control of it.

J. P. Morgan & Company, with assets of $640,000,000, about one-half of which is cash and the other one-half tax exempt bonds, has always been regarded as a Gentile firm that was practically owned and controlled by the Morgan family. The recent testimony taken by the Temporary National Economic Committee discloses* the fact that J. P. Morgan only holds 9.1% interest in that firm; it also discloses that H. B. Davison had only 1.2%, George Whitney 1.9%, and that the other partners had interests of from 1/10 of 1% up to 6.1%, with the exception of the Chas. W. Steele Estate and Thos. W. Lamont who held 36.6% and 34.2% respectively.

J. P. Morgan is a man of great wealth; Thos. W. Lamont has never been regarded as a very rich man, and Chas. W. Steele was unknown to the public. In proportion to their interest in the Morgan firm they are due to be more than three times as wealthy as J. P. Morgan. It is not likely that Lamont and Steele own in their own right the percentages as shown. It is probable that these respective interests are held in trust for the

*"Verbatim Record of the Proceedings of the Temporary National Economic Committee," Vol. X, No. 9, p. 262, Washington, D. C, Dec. 20, 1939.

Rothschilds and that J. P. Morgan & Company is but a Rothschild "front." If true, it explains the fact that there is never any competition between Morgan & Company and Kuhn, Loeb & Company; on the other hand, there is always the closest co-operation.

It is a circumstance worthy of note that the Temporary National Economic Committee has not investigated the firm of Kuhn, Loeb & Company and that this firm was not investigated by the former senate investigating committee. Is it only an accidental circumstance that Kuhn, Loeb & Co. are always left out of the investigations? This firm is the author of most of the devilment and we are entitled to know about its secret operations, such as the financing of Lenin and Trotzsky.

The firm of Kuhn, Loeb & Company is reported to be a Rothschild firm, owned "lock, stock and barrel" by the Rothschild interest. An investigation of this firm will no doubt reveal that fact; it will no doubt reveal the further fact that its capital is largely cash and tax exempt bonds. The Rothschilds appear to be willing, in order to appease the public demands for information, to sacrifice the bank wherein they have only a 70% interest, and to make it the "goat" for public investigations.

It appears from the former senate committee investigation that neither J. P. Morgan nor Thos. W. Lamont pay any income taxes. They adopt the scheme of selling securities at a loss just before the first of January to friends or relatives, which losses are offset against their profits, with the result that they have no profits. It is likely that the members of the Kuhn-Loeb firm do likewise. With the Gentiles paying income taxes and the Jews owning tax exempt bonds and dodging them, it will not be long until they absorb the greater part of the wealth of the country—if they have not already done so.

There are many other rich Jews in addition to the Rothschilds, but the huge Rothschild fortune represents the greater part of the wealth of all the Jews of the world. The authority mentioned says:

> "The Rothschilds were not without competitors; other Jewish families, the Lazards, Sterns, Speyers, and Seligmans adopted the Rothschild plan."*

The "Rothschild plan" referred to was to establish private branch banks in the capitals of Europe and America with some member of the family in charge of these branches. It is likely that the Rothschilds finance and control the majority of these firms for they need many agencies to handle their immense fortune. The "Rothschild plan" is an excellent tax dodging scheme. There is no inheritance by heirs and hence no inheritance taxes. Moreover, the Rothschild interest will usually be found in control of the national treasury with the power to interpret and administer the tax laws.

*Jewish Ency. Vol. 2, p. 496.

VII.

The Mighty Rothschild Power

> "Therefore we must not stop at bribery, deceit and treachery when they should serve towards the attainment of our end. In politics one must know how to seize the property of others without hesitation if by it we secure submission and sovereignty."—From Protocol 2.

The first manifestation of the power of this concentrated wealth was to free the Jews from the bondage in which they had been held by the various governments of Europe. When William of Hesse placed his money in the hands of Mayer Amschel Rothschild the Jews were without the privilege of citizenship in Germany and all other countries, and were subject to all manner of burdensome taxes. It is said that they were the unofficial tax gatherers for the British kings during the reign of the Norman monarchy—the Jews squeezed the people and the kings squeezed the Jews.

The historian Reeves graphically states the achievements of the Rothschild fortune as follows :

> "Little could Mayer Amschel have anticipated  that his sons would in after years come to exercise such an unbounded sway that the peace of nations would depend upon their nod; that the powerful control they exercised on the European money markets would enable them to pose as the arbiters of peace and war, since they could at their pleasure withhold or furnish the pecuniary means required to carry on a campaign.
>
> "But this, incredible as it may seem, was what their vast influence, combined with their enormous wealth and unlimited credit, enabled them to do, for no firms existed strong enough to oppose them for any length of time, or rash enough to take up a business which the Rothschilds had refused. To reach this exalted position Mayer Amschel and his sons required the co-operation of the States, but, when once he had climbed over their backs and reached the height of his ambition, he was independent of all aid and could act with the greatest freedom, whilst the States remained in a suppliant attitude at his feet."

This power brought about the establishment of the gold standard, first in the British Empire and then in other countries, as stated in a succeeding chapter of this volume. They acquired the controlling interest in the Bank of England for which the late Lord Rothschild acted as gold agent and governor. The Bank of England is one of their many "fronts." They no doubt have the controlling interest in most of the other central banks of issue.

"The Rothschilds," by John Reeves, p. 104-105.

In strict keeping with the secrecy, which has been one of the cardinal principles of the Rothschild rulers from the beginning, the Bank of England refuses to reveal its stockholders. There have been many investigations which have sought to gain this information, among others a direct order of Parliament, but it has never been disclosed. It is my information that the ownership of the other banks of issue of Europe is also kept a profound secret.

They sent one of the Rothschild agents, Paul Warburg, as their representative to America just prior to World War I, to change our banking systems. They knew that we would acquire the greater part of the gold of the world in payment of our exports and they wanted to sterilize this gold in order to control our economy and that of other countries. Under the pretense of organizing a credit expanding system to meet the demands of commerce, they in fact organized a credit contracting system to hold it in leash and to increase the power and value of money.

Through their ownership and control of their Morgan & Co., and Kuhn, Loeb & Co., private banks, they own and control the principal New York national banks and trust companies, and through them own and control the New York Federal Reserve Bank. This branch of the Federal Reserve System according to a recent statement has resources of $10,035,211,000 as against the resources of the other eleven F. R. banks of $11,-744,034,000. It has gold certificates of $8,934,442,000 as against the gold certificates of the other eleven F. R. banks of $10,-094,036,000.

According to pro-Jewish Senator Carter Glass this gold belongs to the certificate holders. It should be observed that the United States government issued gold certificates for the gold held by foreigners and the Reserve banks but did not issue such certificates for gold held by other banks or individuals; they received Federal Reserve Bank notes which are withdrawable and subject to cancellation at the pleasure of the Federal Reserve management.

The explanation is simple: Such certificates if issued to individuals and banks generally in the United States would be in circulation and therefore enhance the value of property and service and would cheapen money, but the certificates issued to the Federal Reserve Banks are locked in their vaults and thereby kept out of circulation, and the certificates issued to foreigners are sent out of the country.

The Rothschilds, through the Sassoons (one of the female branches of their family), own and control the banks of China and India. They also own, control and operate the immensely profitable, illicit opium trade.

A number of rich Catholics undertook to organize a competitor bank to rival the Rothschild power. I have been unable to discover when this enterprise was launched, but it was sometime about 1830. The Rothschilds crushed it. The Jewish Encyclopedia admits that

> "Following the failure of the Catholic bank, Union Generals, leaving the Rothschilds still more absolutely the undisputed leaders of French finance, but leaving also a legacy of hatred which had much influence on the growth of the anti-Semitic movement in France."*

It says further:

> "It is a somewhat curious sequel to the attempt to set up a Catholic competitor to the Rothschilds that at the present time (1905) the latter are the guardians of the papal treasure."

If this latter statement is true the Rothschilds control in addition to their own fortune the immense liquid resource of the Catholic Church, which is second only to the Rothschilds' in wealth and power. It is probably not literally true since the private banking firm did not do commercial banking. It is likely that the papal treasure is deposited with the Bank of England or some other bank "front," but even so it contributes to the Rothschild power.

It should be observed from the above quotation that the Rothschilds brought on a major depression which provoked anti-Semitism. I identify this as the catastrophe of 1839-1840, known as the "hungry forties," which our American historians have wrongfully ascribed to the veto of the charter of the Second Bank of the United States by Andrew Jackson in 1836.

The next major depression in this country and throughout the world was in 1873—"the crime of '73." This was brought about by the demonetization of silver. The Rothschilds had already brought about the demonetization of silver in Germany as a part of their plan to "facilitate the payment of the French indemnity to Germany," but it was necessary to the perfection of this plan that the gold standard be established in America. Through bribery, they caused to be clandestinely inserted a clause in the Coinage Act of 1873 that demonetized silver.

 Jewish Ency. Vol. 2, p. 497.

The next major depression in America and throughout the world was the panic of 1893 which was brought about by the competition between the Jewish House of Rothschild and the Jewish rival firm of Baring Brothers. The ruler of the Rothschilds determined to crush the Baring firm. The Jewish Encyclopedia says of this operation:

> "Similarly it is stated that the financial crisis of Germany and Austria (and America and the world) was also a source of anti-Semitism because the shrewdness of the Jewish bankers had forseen the crash and they were enabled to evade it."*

The Jews are always able to foresee and evade these depressions because they create them. They not only evade these crises but they sell their securities in advance of them and buy them back when values have been destroyed, at a fraction of their former worth, and thereby make immense profits. It is by the repetition of this process from panic to panic that they have so rapidly acquired the wealth of the world. The Jews do not lose on a panic, for the word is passed down when it is to happen. They usually profit by it; a panic is their rich harvest.

The next major panic was that of 1907 which the Rothschild controlled banks created by refusing to pay their customers and their bank correspondents the money due them and which was held on deposit. They simply coldly and brutally said to the other bankers having deposits with them: We cannot and will not pay you your money, and you must take care of your own customers the best way you can. This resulted in all the banks throughout the country clamping down on their customers and refusing to pay them their money, which in turn resulted in checking all commercial enterprises and a great fall in the wage and price level and a disastrous panic.

It resulted also in the people and the bankers getting together for the purpose of organizing a currency and credit expanding system to prevent a recurrence of such a panic. And worst of all the outcome was that the Rothschilds organized this system for us and created one that they could manipulate in bringing about future panics and through which they could fix and regulate the wage and price level. That system has been responsible for the depressions of 1920, 1930 and the present Roosevelt depression of 1937 (still with us now, in 1940) which resulted in the "New Deal" and general bankruptcy.

*Vol. 2, p. 493.

We have had these depressions so frequently and regularly that we have come to regard them as natural phenomena. There are economists who attempted to predict them. They usually occur about every ten years, but F. D. Roosevelt was a little impatient to put over his "New Deal" and his communistic program, and he brought the last one on us ahead of time in order to complete the job which he started in 1933. They have all been manipulated, and for the same purpose, viz., thievery and robbery and to establish the Kingdom of Judah throughout the world.

As cruel and destructive as these panics are, they are not as bad as war. The Rothschild power was responsible for World War I and for the present world war, as will be shown later in this volume. They have been responsible for most of the wars that have occurred within the last 150 years. They usually finance both sides of these wars, not because they are interested in either side winning but because wars are demoralizing and destructive to the Gentiles and because they bring the Jews nearer their ultimate goal, viz., rulers of the world.

Wars are their shortest and quickest route to the throne. The accumulation of compound interest is entirely too slow for them. The robbery of the people through their manipulation of money and credit, as effective as it is, is also too slow. War, with all of its attendant human misery, is their surest and best route—and so we have wars and will continue to have them so long as this power dominates the world.

In 1844 "Sidonia" (Rothschild) said, in "Coningsby":

> "No penal laws, no physical tortures, can effect that a superior race should be absorbed in an inferior, or be destroyed by it. The mixed persecuting races disappear; the pure persecuted race remains . . .
>
> "The first Jesuits were Jews; that mysterious Russian diplomacy which so alarms Western Europe is organized and principally carried on by Jews; that mighty revolution which is at this moment preparing in Germany . . . is entirely developing under the auspices of Jews, who almost monopolize the professorial chairs of Germany."

"Sidonia" further says:

> "I had on my arrival (at St. Petersburg) an interview with the Russian Minister of Finance, Count Cancrin; I beheld the son of a Lithuanian Jew . . . I had an audience on my arrival at Madrid with the Spanish minister; I beheld one like myself, the son of a Nuovo Christiano, a Jew of Aragon. In consequence of what transpired at Madrid I went straight to consult the President of the French Council; I beheld the son of a French Jew . . . We fixed on Prussia . . . Count Arnim entered the cabinet, and I beheld a Prussian Jew. So you see, my dear Coningsby, that the world is governed by very different personages to what is imagined by those who are not behind the scenes."

If Sidonia should now, in 1940, make the rounds of the capitals of Europe, he would find a considerable change in the situation. He would find the Jews struggling to maintain their political power and their sacrosanct gold standard, using Gentile "fronts" and Gentile armies and navies for that purpose.

He would find that Hitler had driven the Jews from the capitols of Germany, Austria, Czecho Slovakia, Poland, Denmark, Norway, Holland, Belgium, France, and Roumania—and that he was engaged in a struggle to drive them from England. He would find that Mussolini had driven them from Italy, Albania, and Ethiopia. But he would still find them at the helm of the British Government-—and I regret to say the United States Government also.

A country engaged in war must buy from other countries many products required for its prosecution. That requires money that is acceptable to the seller, which has heretofore meant gold, because the moneys of the principal exporting countries have been based on gold. It has therefore been necessary to apply to the Rothschilds for this firm has, until recent years, been in control of the gold of the world, either directly or through their banks. They have therefore had the power to make or unmake wars. It is the universal gold standard coupled with their universal press ownership and coupled with the secrecy of their operations that have made them masters of the world.

"Coningsby" by Benjamin Disraeli, p. 207-209.

VIII.

The "Kept" Press

> "In the hands of the States of today there is a great force that creates the movement of thought in the people, and that is the Press. The part played by the Press is to keep pointing out requirements supposed to be indispensable, to give voice to the complaints of the people, to express and to create discontent. It is in the Press that the triumph of freedom of speech finds its incarnation. But the goyim States have not known how to make use of this force; and it has fallen into our hands. Through the Press we have gained the power to influence while remaining ourselves in the shade; thanks to the Press we have got the gold in our hands, notwithstanding that we have had to gather it out of oceans of blood and tears. But it has paid us, though we have sacrificed many of our people. Each victim on our side is worth in the sight of God a thousand goyim."—From Protocol 2.

It is true that the Press in the "goyim States" has fallen into the hands of the Jews; it is also true that through the Press the Jews have "gained the power to influence while remaining in the shade." It is also true that they have "got the gold" in their hands and that they have "had to gather it out of oceans of blood and tears"—but not their blood and tears; they have gathered it from the "blood and tears" of the gullible and despised goyim. The only method by which they could have gained this gold, through the Press and through "blood and tears" is by creating wars, which the Press have helped create through their propaganda.

It is difficult to prove to what extent the Jews are directly interested in the Press, for they conceal it. They are reputed to own 100% of the metropolitan newspapers of both England and France, and likewise 100% of the news and advertising agencies and the cinema of these two countries.

In America the ownership is not so complete. It is estimated that the Jews own 80% of the metropolitan press and 100% of the news and advertising agencies and cinema. Fortunately, their ownership of the small daily papers and country papers appears to be negligible; their influence with these papers is through their news agencies from which the country press obtain news, and their advertising agencies through which they obtain advertisements.

The Jews also own about 80% of the radio broadcasting stations through their ownership of Columbia Broadcasting Svs-tern, Radio Corporation of America, and Mutual Broadcasting Company. The Jew Sarnoff is at the head of RCA which controls the National Broadcasting Company, and the Jew Paley is head of CBS, and the Jew Strauss is the reputed owner of the Mutual, The Jews have been acquiring the periodicals so rapidly in recent years that it is impossible to estimate their present holdings. They acquired the very informative and useful "Literary Digest" and junked it, and instead gave us the jazzy "Time" and "Life." They are reputed to have acquired the "Saturday Evening Post" and perverted its high standards and principles.

The Post was founded by Benjamin Franklin and it has always been free and independent and bold in its editorial expression. It was an outstanding critic of the New Deal and the perversion of the government by the Roosevelt Administration, but it has been silenced by its present Jew owners; they have put it to sleep permanently. There is not now in this broad land of ours a single periodical or metropolitan newspaper that stands for constitutional government as it has been handed down to us by our ancestors.

The Press has degenerated under Jewish control and influence into lying propaganda agencies whose chief mission appears to be to deceive and to befuddle the people. In Protocol 12 the Elders of Zion say of the Press:

> "Not a single announcement will reach the public without our control. Even now this is already being attained by us inasmuch as all news items are received by a few agencies, in whose offices they are focused from all parts of the world. These agencies will then be already entirely ours and will give publicity only to what we dictate to them."

It is literally true that all "news items are received by a few agencies." It is also true that these agencies are "entirely ours." It is also true that they only give publicity to "what we dictate to them." It is also true that all of the news that reaches us is under their control.

This protocol was promulgated prior to 1905. The situation there described is precisely the cpndition that now prevails. We are getting only such war news as they choose to give us, and they choose to give us only that which will favor England because they (the Jews) are waging this war through Britain for the Jews and their restoration of Poland and Czecho Slovakia and for the maintenance of their gold standard and their power.

The British Press manifested its mighty power in Great Britain by overthrowing the Chamberlain government and establishing in place of it the pro-Jewish Churchill-Eden-Cooper government. The Press of England with one accord demanded a more vigorous prosecution of the war and made Chamberlain the "goat" because of the reverses of the Allies in Norway. There is reason to believe that the people of the British Empire, like the people of America, don't want war but it is the Jews and their Press that are demanding it, and through their control of the government are waging it.

In the Funeral Oration of Rabbi Reichhorn pronounced in Prague in 1869 over the tomb of Grand Rabbi Simeon-ben-Ihuda, he said:

> "The other great power is The Press. By repeating without cessation certain ideas, the Press succeeds in the end in having them accepted as actualities. The Theatre renders us analogous services. Everywhere the Press and the Theatre obey our orders."

That furnishes an explanation of all of this war propaganda to which we are now being subjected. It will be observed that by repeating a falsehood from time to time they say it will be "in the end accepted as an actuality." We constantly have before us the proof of that statement.

Every member of the Congress who has any knowledge of the money question knows that the only remedy for the existing depression is what the Jews and their columnists and "kept" Press call inflation; they know that inflation means high prices and wages and cheap money, but there is not one of them who will dare publicly announce that he stands for inflation—not one. On the other hand he will hold his hands up in holy horror against it, will talk about its abuses in Germany, France, etc.

Why? Simply because the Jews have held inflation up to scorn so often and ridiculed it so repeatedly that it has become anathema, and it is accepted as an "actuality" that any sort of inflation would be a great misfortune; this, despite the fact that they know there can be no relief from deflation without it. It is fear of the Jew press.

Why have the Jews acquired the Press and other publicity agencies in America and other countries unless it is for the purposes as stated in the protocols? Has it just so happened without any sort of design that the Jews have acquired all the agencies in all of the countries of the world that direct and influence and control the "movement of thought in the people?" The Press is presumed to voice the sentiment of the people but it in fact voices only the sentiment of the Jews.

The Press has a very important influence in the election of our public officials. No man can be nominated or elected President of the United States without publicity, and he must go to the Jews and their Press, their cinema, and their radio to get it; it can be obtained no where else. He can't get to first base without it.

The result is that some of the presidents of the United States have been selected and elected by the Jews; that is true of at least two democratic presidents, but it may not be true of any of the republicans, except Hoover. The result is also that congress and the President are subservient to Jewish control. The result is also that no politician will dare criticize the Jewish race, and that all with one accord praise it and denounce racial prejudice.

The power of the press was forcefully stated by Richard B. Sheridan in Parliament:

> "Give me the Liberty of The Press and I will give to the minister a venal House of Peers; I will give him a corrupt and servile House of Commons; I will give him the full swing of the patronage of offices; I will give him the whole host of ministerial influence; I will give him ALL the power that place can confer upon him—to purchase submission and over-awe resistance.
>
> "Yes, armed with the Liberty of The Press, I will go forth undismayed; I will attack the very fabric of that mighty engine. I will shake down corruption from its height, and bury it beneath the ruins of the abuses it was meant to shelter."

In Protocol 7 attached as an Appendix, they say, "We must compel the governments of the goyim to take action in the direction favoured by our widely conceived plan, already approaching the desired consummation," by that "great power, the press, which with a few exceptions that may be disregarded, is already entirely in our hands." That is precisely what they are now doing. They are seeking to compel all governments to join in their "widely conceived plan" of a universal war. Through the "oceans of blood and tears" of such a war they will again gather much gold and may seize political power and establish their "King-Despot of the blood of Zion."

We have the evidence here before our very eyes and yet we refuse to see and recognize it, and the danger of it. We know that the leading newspapers and magazines of this country are in Jewish hands. We know that most of the journalists are Jews and that Jews are the publicity agents of both political parties. We know that the Jews own and control the cinema and radio. We know that the Jew press and the Jew columnist and the Jew radio and the Jew cinema are with one accord conducting a malignant campaign to involve us in the present war. Why? Is it to promote the public welfare? No. Is it to promote the Jewish "widely conceived plan"? Yes. There can be no other answer. Our officials are tongue-tied and bound hand and foot, and there appears to be no way to obtain legislative relief.

They say in the same protocol (No. 7), "the principal factor of success in the political is the secrecy of its undertakings." In other words, it is humbuggery and deception. How lamentably true. If we knew the truth and the whole truth we might correct it, but so long as they can deceive us there is but little chance for it. They conceal the fact that they own the leading newspapers and magazines and banking institutions. They hide behind corporate names and dummy stockholders. When the truth is stated they deny it.

In their protocols they say "with a few exceptions that may be disregarded, it (the press) is already entirely in our hands." This has reference to the press of the whole world. This was prior to 1905, but it appears to still be true, with the exception of Germany and Italy. (The governments of France and Roumania have recently disfranchised the Jews and decreed that they shall have no sort of connection with the press). It is unthinkable that the Rothschild power manufactures public opinion throughout the entire world through their ownership of the press, and that they are using this power to create wars and gather gold from "oceans of blood and tears."

They say they own the press and the known facts verify the truth of that statement. They say they have acquired it "to compel the governments of the goyim in the direction favoured by our widely conceived plan;" and they are using it for that purpose. They say that through it and through "oceans of blood and tears" they have acquired the gold of the world, and that is true. What stronger evidence can there be of the authenticity of the protocols? How long, oh how long, will we submit to the rule of this vicious alien power?

The following are some of the leading Jewish journalists:

F. P. Adams ("F.P.A."), Walter Lippmann, David Lawrence, Louis Lipsky, Isaac F, Marcosson, Charles Michaelson, Joseph Pulitzer, Marcus Eli Ravage, George E. Sokolsky, John L. Spivak, Herbert Bayard Swope, Walter Winchel, James Waterman Wise, Frederick William Wile, Morris Fishbein, Emil Ludwig-Cohen, and many others.

The following are some of the known Jewish publishers:

"Moses Annenburg of Philadelphia; David A. Brown of Detroit; Lowell Brentano of New York; Paul Block; J. H. Biben of New York; Abraham Caban of New York; Levand Bros., of Kansas; Adler Chain, in Northwest; Eugene Meyer, of Washington, D. C.; Arthur Newman of New York Journal; Liberty's Bernarr McFadden of New York; J. David Stern of New York; Arthur Hays Sulzberger of New York Times; David Shapiro of New York. Editorial departments of the newspapers are controlled chiefly through Jewish advertising influence. Many Jews are in the Associated Press and United Press Assn., and the Hearsts papers are Jew-directed."*

There are also many other under-cover stockholders and bondholders.

The columnist, Boake Carter, stated in one of his syndicated articles that "recently a considerable block of stock was opened to public sale by the Chicago Daily News (Col. Knox's paper). Among the largest buyers was Kuhn, Loeb & Co." This reveals one of the methods by which the Jews have obtained control of the press. The Jews also own the International Paper Co., which extends credit to many newspapers and owns the stock and bonds of many of them. Whenever a leading newspaper gets in financial distress or comes on the market, the Jews grab it up.

It is a significant fact that every Jew columnist is for war against Germany and every Gentile columnist is against it; it is also significant that every Jew congressman is for war, and the Gentile congressmen are practically unanimously against it; it is also significant that the city Jew press is for war and the country Gentile press against it.

We Gentiles have not yet forgotten the ingratitude shown us by the Allies following World War I. They said that we did not win it, that they did. They said also that they were fighting for us and that we should bear the expenses of the war and they refused to pay the loans made them since the war, on that flimsy ground. They called us "Uncle Shylock" because we expected payment of these debts, amounting to over $12,000,000,000.

*R. E. Edmondson Bulletin.

The present Prime Minister of England, Winston Churchill, published a statement saying that we did the Allies more harm than good by entering World War I, because they would have made peace two years sooner if we had not done so. Well, now "Uncle Shylock"—or at least the Gentile part of him—wants to decline to underwrite the present war. He disclaims all interest in it or responsibility for it.

Let them fight to their hearts content and make peace whenever it suits them. The chances are it would soon be made except that our humane (?) President encourages them to fight on, and they hope that by some hook or crook the Jews through their control of press and radio will influence us to the point that we will forget the past and again rush to the rescue.

If the real truth were known there would be no intervention sentiment in this country, and there would be very little pro-British sentiment. If the real Jewish names of these journalists and the fact that they are Jews, were stated in connection with their columns, their views would carry but little weight; and if "our widely conceived plan" were widely understood, they would carry none.

The following is a list of some of our prominent cinema stars, viz:

Eddie Cantor (Isidore Isokowitz) ; Edward G. Robinson (Emanuel Goldenberg) ; Paul Muni (Muni Weisenfreund) ; Jack Benny (John Kubelsky) ; Ben Bernie (Benjamin Anzelovitz) ; John Garfield (Julius Garfinkle) ; Ricardo Cortez (Jack Krantz) ; George Burns (Nathan Birbaum) ; Bela Lugosi (Bela Blasko) ; Ed Wynn (Ed Leopold) ; Nick Stuart (Nikolas Pratza) ; Bert Lahr (Irving Lahrheim); George Sidney (Sammy Greenfield) ; Joe Penner (Joseph Pinter) ; Raquel Torres (Paula Osterman) ; Fanny Brice (Fanny Borach Arnstein Rosenberg) ; Sophie Tucker (Sophie Abuza) ; Harry Green (Harry Blitzer) ; Harry Richman (Henry Reichman) ; Ted Lewis (Theodore Friedman) ; Kenneth MacKenna (Leo Mielziner) ; Ina Clair (Fagan); Douglas Fairbanks, Jr. (Ullman) ; Sylvia Sidney (Jason) ; Al Jolson (Yoelson) ; Charlie Chaplin (Thonstein) ; Paulette Goddard (Levy) ; Elaine Barry (Jacobs) ; Ethel Merman (Zinnerman) ; Sybil Jason (Jacobs); Luise Rainer; Bobby Breen; Joseph Schildkraut; Lionel Stander; Gregory Ratoff; Tony Martin; Jack Pearl; George Jessel; Irving Pichel; Ritz Brothers, Marx Brothers, and many others.

The movie stars in themselves are by no means so important as the journalists, but the Jewish degradation of the cinema is important. We and our children must be entertained with Jewish humour, reconciled to racial equality by Jewish propaganda, and deceived by Jewish lies. Our children would not find Eddie Cantor quite so entertaining if they knew that his real name is Isidore Isokowitz; nor would they find Edward G. Robinson's acting so thrilling if they knew him to be the Jew Emanuel Goldenberg.

The cinema is for war. Why? Because it is Jew-owned and controlled. The radio is for war. Why? For precisely the same reason. The metropolitan press is for war. Why? For identically the same reason. The Jew is for war. Why? It is for the prosecution of "our widely conceived plan;" it is to gather in more gold through "oceans of blood and tears;" it is for the destruction of the Gentiles and their governments.

The radio and cinema are not mentioned in the protocols for the very good reason that they were not then in use. As soon as these two methods of influencing the public mind and creating sentiment were developed, they were both acquired by the Jews—not only here in America but in every country of the world. Why?

This is not a mere accidental circumstance. It is in pursuance of their "widely conceived plan" and for the purpose of accomplishing it. And the radio and cinema are being used for that purpose continuously, consistently, and relentlessly.

There can be no reasonable doubt about the authenticity of the protocols. Every statement of fact contained in them is found to be true. The Jews own the gold, the exchanges and the press, as they claim. They have the political influence that they boastfully claim; they create wars as they propose, and world history and current events have developed and are developing in strict conformity with the plans outlined in the protocols.

IX.

The Murder Gang

"Death is the inevitable end for all. It is better to bring that end nearer to those who hinder our affairs than to our selves—the founders of this affair. We execute masons in such wise that none save the brotherhood can ever have a suspicion of it, not even the victims themselves of our death sentence, they all die when required as if from a normal kind of illness . . . Knowing this, even the brotherhood in its turn dare not protest. By such methods we have plucked out of the midst of masonry the very root of protest against our disposition. While preaching liberalism to the goyim we at the same time keep our own people and our agents in a state of unquestioning submission."—From Protocol 15.

It may be true, as the Jews claim, that they originated masonry. There are many signs and symbols of masonry, as we Americans know it, that indicate it, but our masonry, as has heretofore been pointed out, is entirely separate and different from theirs; theirs is a secret clannish political agency to preserve their solidarity, to act as a unit, and to carry into effect the orders of their rulers.

The B'nai B'rith appears to have been founded in America and to be the American branch of the Jewish continental masons; there is no occasion here for another openly avowed benevolent masonic order since the Jews are permitted to join the American masons.

"What is the B'nai B'rith?"

"An international secret Jewish 'masonic order' known among the tribes as 'Sons of the Covenant' (circumcision), of which Henry Monsky of Chicago is President. It was founded in New York in 1843. Jewish Author Ludwig Lewisohn says 'B'nai B'rith represents Jewry the world over'."

"What are its objectives?"

"To promote what it calls 'The Jewish Common Purpose,' which is domination of Gentiledom. 'Kinship is to be found between the aims which President Roosevelt exemplifies, and the purposes for which B'nai B'rith carries on,' said Jewish Gov. Henry Horner of Illinois, in B'nai B'rith Magazine for April 1934."*

The French Illuminati was also a branch through which they murdered Gentiles without discrimination and without mercy—men, women and children, in Paris during the French revolution. The Nihilists of Russia was reputed to be another branch through which they murdered the Czars of Russia and the rulers of other countries.

*R. E. Edmondson's Bulletin, "Counterfeit Americans," Apr. 15, 1940.

It was probably the Continental Masons who selected Herschel Grynszpan to murder Von Rath, the German attache in France, for the Jews have made a hero of him; they have throughout the world applauded this dastardly act, raised huge sums of money and employed many lawyers for his defense. The Jewish French government never arraigned him for trial but the present government will likely do so. He proposed to volunteer to fight for France, which was headlined in the Jewish press all over the world. Adolf Hitler accepted this political assassination as being a racial murder in pursuance of their racial plans and accordingly imposed a fine of $400,000,000 on the Jewish race in Germany.

It is estimated that when the Jews obtained control of the Russian government they put to death 3,000,000 of the best and most important Gentile citizens of the Russian Empire, and later starved to death more than 20,000,000 of them. When the Jew Bela Kuhn (Aaron Cohn) obtained control of the Hungarian government, his first act was to murder 20,000 of the leading Gentiles of that country. It is reported that 700,000 Hungarians were killed during his 133 days of rule of Hungary and immediately preceeding and following it.*

The same thing occurred in Germany. Adolf Hitler is authority for the statement that between 4,000 and 5,000 of the best people of Germany were promptly executed when the Jews obtained control of the government.

This is all in pursuance of their protocols and their Talmud and their communist code. Their Talmud teaches them that "the life of a goi and all his physical powers belong to a Jew," and their protocols tell them that death is the "inevitable end for all and that it is better to bring that end nearer to those who hinder our affairs than to ourselves—the founders of this affair."

The Jews are descended from a nomadic Asiatic people who banded themselves together like packs of wolves, and roamed the plains of Palestine, Persia, Arabia and adjoining countries, and pillaged the people of those countries. Money is their God and it has been so since they repudiated the divine law of Moses and bowed down before Aaron's golden calf. They have always imagined themselves superior to the peoples of the countries wherein they dwelt. They have outwitted and cheated and despoiled other peoples until it has become a part of their nature.

*"Answer to Father Coughlin's Critics," p. 119.

The present Jew is the product of his ancestors; he has inherited many of their characteristics. His civilization is but veneer, and a thin one at that. He ill-conceals his vanity and egotism and deceitfulness and cruelty and grasping nature.

Murder is difficult to prove at best, and it is impossible when it is done in such manner that "none save the brotherhood can even have a suspicion of it—not even the victims of our death sentence; they all die when required, as if from a normal kind of illness." This can explain the alleged murder of President Harding; and also the alleged murder of the late, blind Senator Schall of Minnesota who was an able and outstanding critic of the present Jew administration and "Jew Deal." He was run over on the street by a "hit and run" driver whose identity has never been discovered. It may also explain the alleged assassination of Senator Bronson Cutting who was also an able critic of the "New Deal," and likewise guilty of "hindering our affairs." He was killed in a plane crash. It was stated at the time that the plane had been tampered with and that an investigation would be made, but that was the end of it.

We have had a singular fatality among our Presidents. None of them was murdered during the approximate ninety years prior to the civil war when the Jewish influence was negligible; three and probably four of them have been murdered during the 75 years since: Lincoln by the Jew Booth; Garfield by Chas. Jules Guitau, nationality unknown; McKinney by the Jew Leon Czolgosz; and probably Harding.

During the years since the civil war the Jews have financed the campaigns of Woodrow Wilson and Franklin D. Roosevelt, and have consequently contributed very largely to the election of two of the three democratic presidents since the war. The Jews have not so far as known, financed and brought about the election of any of the republican presidents except Hoover,—and perhaps Coolidge who had his Jew sponsor, Stearn. Of the other five elected republican presidents three of them were murdered; a strange fatality of the non-Jewish republican presidents.

All of this may have just happened and not been brought about by any sinister organization or power. There is, however, at least one murder of a prominent senator who "hindered their affairs" that is definitely known—viz., the late Senator Huey Long of Louisiana who was shot down in the Louisiana State House. His friend, Governor Allen, who succeeded him and who was investigating his death, himself died "as from a normal kind of illness"—suddenly and mysteriously.

We also know that prior to Senator Long's death the Jewish federal government refused federal aid to the people of Louisiana, for relief or in any other form. Immediately after he was murdered the federal treasury was opened up and money flowed into Louisiana. It has been aptly called "the second Louisiana purchase."

At the time of Senator Long's murder a number of federal indictments were pending against Sol Weiss, his Jew treasurer, and other leaders in the Long political machine; soon after his death these indictments were dismissed. These men were evidently promised security and felt secure, because their misconduct afterward became so flagrant that they were re-indicted and have recently been tried and convicted.

It has been frequently stated in the press that the killing of Senator Long was an "inside job." It is probable that the dismissal of these indictments and his murder were arranged beforehand. He was killed by a man by the name of Weiss, supposedly a Jew and a relative of Sol Weiss, his treasurer.

Henry Ford first opened the eyes of the people of America to the Jew menace. He caused to be published three volumes entitled "The International Jew," which revealed the fact that the Jews are the real financial power that controls America. He also published "The Dearborn Independent," which was estimated to have a circulation of almost a million, and which informed its readers about the machinations of the Jews. Among other things, it attacked the Jew Aaron Shapiro because of his graft in connection with the organization of the farmer co-operatives. Shapiro filed suit against Mr. Ford for libel for several million dollars, his attorneys being the Jew firm of Untermeyer & Marshall, New York lawyers for the Rothschild interest.

Late one night while returning home from his office, a "hit and run" driver sideswiped Mr. Ford's car and forced it down a steep embankment and he was seriously but not fatally injured.

Shortly thereafter he evidently compromised with the Jews on the basis of discontinuing the publication of The Dearborn Independent. The Shapiro suit was dismissed, the press ridicule of Mr. Ford ceased; they even speak of him kindly now.

The "hit and run" driver was never discovered. Mr. Ford probably received their "death sentence." If he had been killed it would have had the appearance of "a normal kind of accident," as the deaths of Senators Schall and Cutting appeared to be. We can not know whether Mr. Ford saved his life by this settlement but we do know that he saved himself from a lot of Jewish persecution.

Martin Luther is credited with saying that the Jews are "liars, thieves, and murderers." They are taught to be by both their Talmud and their protocols. It is a terrific indictment against the Jewish race. It is undoubtedly true of the "Learned Elders of Zion." We prefer to believe that the Jews with whom we come in daily contact are different. But we can not close our eyes to the disagreeable fact that this indictment is confirmed by the Talmud, the protocols and the history of the Jewish race.

We have just witnessed another tragic death of a great American Senator who "hindered our affairs," viz: Senator Lundeen of Minnesota. He was murdered in the same way they murdered Senator Cutting. They were both travelling in airplanes out of Washington, and in both cases the plane developed engine trouble a short distance out of the city. There were other passengers on both planes (24 on the last) but that small circumstance was a matter of no consequence to the murderers.

These are murders that appear to be from a "normal kind of accident," and they are well hidden, for there was no one left in either case to tell the story. They are not "normal" for the Cutting and Lundeen plane crashes are the only accidents of that character that have occurred in the fifteen years of passenger air travel.

There are not many senators of the Lundeen type left. Four of them have met violent deaths, viz: Senators Long, Schall, Cutting, and now Senator Lundeen. And one has been "purged" by the lavish use of money, viz: Senator Holt of West Virginia.

X.

World War I

> "We shall force the Christians into wars by exploiting their pride and their stupidity. They will massacre each other and clear the ground for us."—From Funeral Oration of Rabbi Reichhorn.

Kaiser Wilhelm of Germany was a very vain man who loved publicity and imagined himself an autocrat, but in fact he was only a figurehead, as King George VI of England now is, and as most of the European monarchs are now and were at that time. The Jews encouraged him in this delusion and fed his vanity, while they operated his government.

The important ministers of Germany—those that really ran the government—were all Jews. Bethmann Holweg, chancellor and spokesman, was a descendant of the Rothschilds, Walter Rathneau, treasurer, and Felix Warburg, head of the spy system, together with five other members of the Kaiser's cabinet, were Jews. The Jews in 1914 were more completely in control of the governments of Europe than they were in 1844 when Disraeli's "Sidonia" (Rothschild) visited the various capitals of Europe. Sidonia then with words of prophecy visioned the world war:

> "That mighty revolution which is at this moment preparing in Germany . . . is entirely developing under the auspices of Jews who almost monopolize the professorial chairs of Germany."

It was, however, a world war that the Jews developed, and not a mere revolution. The assassination of Archduke Ferdinand and his wife was given as the excuse for it but that was not the cause; it was only a pretext. There was no redress or attempted redress of this assassination; the Duke and Duchess were soon forgotten. The real cause of the war was Jewish ambition and avarice; it had been planned for a long period of time; they merely seized upon this circumstance to fool the gullible goyim.

We are all presumed to intend the consequences of our acts. We judge the cause by the effect. The effect of the war was the League of Nations, the establishment of the gold standard throughout the world, and Palestine for the Jews. This would probably have been the effect of the war if Germany had won, for the Jews even in that case would have written the peace treaty just as they did at the conclusion of the victory of the Allies. The accomplishment of these three things was the purpose of World War I—and, with the exception of Palestine, is the purpose of World War II.

These things did not just happen by accident; they were all pre-arranged. The cunning of the Jew is uncanny. It is the result of centuries of imagined superiority and suppression and scheming and nursed vengeance.

The war-plotters knew in advance that practically all of Europe would be engulfed in World War I. They probably reckoned that they would inveigle America into it. They did not care who won. They knew that they would write the peace treaty and gather in the spoils.

The German government sought to alienate Russia from the Allies during World War I, and accomplished it through the Jews. The German Jew government furnished a train and transportation for Lenin and his gang through Germany to Moscow, and the Jews financed the enterprise. Among the Jews that put up the money were Paul Warburg, governor of our Federal Reserve System, and the Rothschild firm of Kuhn, Loeb & Co. These gentlemen now deny it. When their rascality is discovered the Jews always "deny the allegation and defy the allegator."

Father Coughlin made this charge in one of his radio addresses and it was challenged by Kuhn, Loeb & Co. In a book entitled "An Answer to Father Coughlin's Critics" the truth of this charge has been established beyond any reasonable doubt. This book further establishes beyond a reasonable doubt that the Jews not only overthrew the Czarist government in Russia, but that they executed the Czar and his family, and established their own government in place of it.

Of the 25 leaders of that revolution all of them were Jews except Lenin whose mother and wife are reputed to have been Jewesses—this would make him a hybrid and a "Jew-in-law." The following are the names of the Jewish leaders of the Russian revolution as appears from the American Official Services Report, Section III:

Assumed Name	Real Name	Nationality
Lenin	Oulianow (Ulianoff)	Russian*
Trotsky (Trotzky)	Bronstein	Jewish
Steckloff	Nakhames	Jewish

*The present writer wishes to add that some authors are convinced that Lenin's mother was a Jewess.

Martoff	Zederbaum	Jewish
Zinovieff	Apfelbaum	Jewish
Kameneff	Rosenfeld	Jewish
Dan	Gourevitch (Yurewitsch)	Jewish
Ganetzky	Furstenberg	Jewish
Parvus	Helpfand	Jewish
Uritzky	Padomilsky	Jewish
Larin	Lurge	Jewish
Bohrin	Nathansohn	Jewish
Martinoff	Zibar	Jewish
Bogdanoff	Zilberstein	Jewish
Garin	Garfeld	Jewish
Suchanoff	Gimel	Jewish
Kairmelff	Goldmann	Jewish
Sagersky	Krochmann	Jewish
Kiazanoff	Goldenbach	Jewish
Solutzeff	Bleichmann	Jewish
Piatnitzky	Ziwin	Jewish
Axelrod	Orthodox	Jewish
Glasunoff	Sehultze	Jewish
Zuriesain	Weinstein	Jewish
Lapinsky	Loewensohn	Jewish

It appears that the Jews deceive the Russians as to their identity by adopting Russian names, in the same way they deceive us by adopting English names.

The Jewish Russian revolution occurred in 1917 when we were in World War I and Russia was our ally. Paul Warburg, Jacob Schiff and other members of the firm of Kuhn, Loeb & Co., were naturalized citizens of the United States and therefore subject to prosecution for treason. They were guilty of high treason but the power of the Jew in our government at that time and since, was and is such that they have escaped the consequences of their crime. On the other hand, despite this treasonable conduct the Jews were given Palestine upon President Wilson's insistence.

It has taken 22 years to find out the whole story of our betrayal into World War I. We are indebted to Senator Gerald P. Nye of North Dakota for digging into the records and bringing to light the Balfour-Lansing correspondence by which President Wilson is shown to have agreed to enter the war long prior to the sinking of the Lusitania.

This correspondence, however, did not disclose the real reason for our action, the motive for President Wilson's change of front and how the change was brought about. In his tireless effort to keep this country out of war, Senator Nye discovered and revealed the truth, and the real reason for President Wilson's change of front.

Prior to these revelations we thought we entered the war because of the sinking of the Lusitania and the violation of our rights as a neutral. That was the reason assigned by President Wilson in his dramatic message to Congress, but it was not the real reason, as conclusively shown by the Balfour-Lansing correspondence. It was only a pretext to secure the support of Congress and the people.

There can be no doubt about the fact that prior to President Wilson's second election in 1916 he "kept us out of the war." There can likewise be no doubt about the fact that he was re-elected upon that slogan. Why did he change his position soon after his election? Why did he make an agreement with the British government to help the Allies? That has been, until now, an unexplained mystery

The answer is, the Jew and Palestine. "Believe it or not," President Wilson sacrificed 50,000 of the flower of our youth, caused 200,000 more to be maimed and crippled, and gave $50,000,000,000 of our wealth, in order to restore Palestine to the Jews—a small barren country that probably could have been bought for a billion dollars or less. Worse than that, he took us into the war for the purpose of treacherously taking the homeland from one of our own Allies, the Arabs, who were fighting side by side with our soldiers. Never have a brave, confiding people been so treacherously double-crossed.

In a speech in the Senate on April 25th, 1939,* Senator Nye said:

> "There has been published a series of works under the title "The Next War.' One of the volumes in this series is entitled 'Propaganda in the Next War.' This particular volume was written by one Sidney Rogerson. I have been unable to obtain any trace of his background or of his connections; but the editor-in-chief of all these works, including" the one entitled 'Propaganda for the Next War,' is a man whose name is recognized the world over as an authority in Great Britain. He is none other than Capt. Liddell Hart, associated with the London Times, a writer and a military authority in Europe."

The following are quotations from this authority:

> "For some time the issue as to which side the United States would take hung in the balance, and the final result was a credit to our propaganda (meaning the British propaganda) . . .

*See Congressional Record, 76th Congress, Vol. 84, No. 82, pages 6597-6604.

"There remain the Jews. It has been estimated that of the world Jew population of approximately 15,000,000, no fewer than 5,000,000 are in the United States; 25% of the inhabitants of New York are Jews. During the Great War we bought off this huge American Jewish public by the promise of the Jewish National Home in Palestine, held by Ludendorff to be the master stroke of allied propaganda, as it enabled us not only to appeal to Jews in America but to Jews in Germany as well."

They "bought off the huge American Jewish public" with the promise of Palestine, and with them they bought the powerful metropolitan Jewish press and the Wilson Administration. That is not my language, nor is it my assertion; it is the language and the statement of fact of an eminent British authority writing for the benefit of the British public, and particularly for the British propagandists of the "next war"—now in progress.

He says of this Propaganda for the Next War, that we (the American people) have been "fed up" on atrocities and that this form of attack will not work next time and that they must adopt new methods. He says that we are an emotional, gullible people and that despite the fact that there is now some prejudice against the British Government because of its refusal to pay its debt to us, that we can again be worked provided the proper approach is used. He suggests the following:

"To persuade her (the United States) to take our part will be much more difficult, so difficult as to be unlikely to succeed. It will need a definite threat to America, a threat, moreover, which will have to be brought home by propaganda to every citizen, before the Republic will again take arms in an external quarrel . . .

"The position will naturally be considerably eased if Japan were involved, and this might and probably would bring America in without further ado. At any rate, it would be a natural and obvious object of our propagandists to achieve this, just as during the Great War they succeeded in embroiling the United States with Germany.

"Fortunately with America, our propaganda is on firm ground. We can be entirely sincere, as our main plank will be the old democratic one. We must clearly enunciate our belief in the democratic form of government and our firm resolve to adhere to it. Our minor propaganda will aim at attaching the support of important sections, such as the Jews, probably by the declaration of a clear-cut policy in Palestine, and of our intention, if victorious, to put an end to anti-Semitic persecutions; and of the Roman Catholic community in similar terms . . .

"In the realm of the moving picture industry we may be able to depend on the natural bias of the United States film manufacturers in favor of Great Britain as opposed to Germany, Japan, or Italy, and on their command of the machinery of international film distribution. This will be an asset both with the stock entertainment picture and the news reels."

So their plan was to line up the Jews and "Catholic community" by "promising" if victorious to "put an end to anti-Semitic persecutions; and of the Roman Catholic community in similar terms." The Jews, the Jew press, the Jew cinemas, and the Jew President and his Jew administration, are already lined up; no promises or propaganda were needed for that purpose.

But the protestant American has been badly burned, he has had enough of their wars, and it will be difficult to get him into another one by talk and propaganda—which they realize. They propose to appeal to his prejudices and fears by getting Japan in on the other side. The British Government will probably adopt this course and provoke Japan to war in order to obtain the more powerful support of the United States

The President has dispatched the fleet to the Pacific Ocean. This is for the purpose of war with Japan: It can be for no other purpose. If Japan will only torpedo one of these boats, the Jewish press, the Jewish radio, and the Jewish cinema will do the rest. The Jew Admiral Taussig stated to a Congressional Investigating Committee that "war with Japan is inevitable."

The worst of it is that these slick Jew war-makers will probably themselves torpedo the boat and blame the Japs through their press, cinema, etc., and the result will be the same. We may fight, and investigate later, and may again learn the truth twenty years afterward.

They also propose to appeal to us protestants on the "old democratic plank" that they are democracies and "believe in the democratic form of government and our firm resolve to adhere to it." To hell with such democracies!

The British Empire is governed by a King and a Jewish Privy Council and a hereditary House of Lords, was acquired by conquest, is held together by military power, and is the greatest in area ever known,—upon which it is said the sun never sets. The French Empire, with a Rothschild in her cabinet, and governed ordinarily by a bunch of Jews,—was also acquired by conquest, and is the third largest area in the world.

The Jewish influence now governs the British Empire. They have many representatives in the House of Commons through the Labor party. In the House of Lords they predominate thru their purchase of titles and intermarriage with the nobility. Formerly a King selected and appointed his lords and nobles from his brave warriors and landed aristocracy; now he sells these titles to his rich subjects who are principally Jews, and this is a source of considerable revenue to the Crown. The present heads of the British cabinet, viz., Churchill, Eden, Cooper, et al., are all strongly pro-Jewish and are all intense haters of Hitler because he is anti-Semitic.

America is not a democracy and never has been, and God forbid that it ever shall be. It is a republic whose powers are clearly defined by the Constitution.

Referring to the propaganda by the British and German governments during the first world war, the writer correctly observes: "I repeat it is unthinkable that such a dog-fight between non-Americans will again be permitted in the United States." It is indeed "unthinkable," but such propaganda is nevertheless being carried on right now by the Jews in the newspapers and cinemas and over their radios. It should be suppressed even if we must close them all up.

Senator Nye said of this book:

> "I understand that this particular volume, Propaganda in the Next War, published last fall and placed in circulation, instead of having its circulation enlarged, now is suffering at the hands of those who desire to retire it from circulation. A few days ago I came on the floor of the Senate with the volume itself. I am sorry I have not it with me today. I am told that it is the only copy of Propaganda in the Next War available in the United States. It can be had; I can borrow it again if there is cccasion and need for it in the Senate; but it is no longer easy to obtain. I wish the entire work might be read by every Member of the Senate."

Apparently it is a semi-official book of the British government. The destruction of these copies of the book was probably by order of her Jew Secretary of War, Hore-Belisha, or other Jewish "Elders," following an ancient Jewish custom.

That is what they did to the protocols and to Pinckney's diary and probably also to the American Official Services Report mentioned above.

XI.

League of Nations

> "By all these means we shall so wear down the goyim that they will be compelled to offer us international power of a nature that by its position will enable us without any violence gradually to absorb all the State forces of the world and to form a Super-Government. In place of the rulers of today we shall set up a bogey which will be called the Super-Government Administration."—From Protocol 5.

When World War I ended, the Rothschilds and their agents were there to administer upon the wreckage. "Elder" Bernard Baruch, who succeeded E. M. House as President Wilson's advisor, induced the President, contrary to all precedent and the advice of his cabinet, to attend the peace conference in France in person. "Elder" Baruch was, during the entire period of the war, Chairman of the War Industries Board which was invested with despotic authority over the production and sale of everything.

In his memoirs, Ike Hoover, Chief Usher at the White House during ten administrations, including the Wilson administration, said:

> "The President and Mrs. Wilson went to the country place rented by Mr. Baruch for lunch today (Sunday) and all of us scattered. The strange part is that each went alone, as if dodging the others. The fact is that we are all tired of looking at one another. At dinner time we had a good laugh when I charged them all with being bored with the others, and all manfully agreed."—Saturday Evening Post, July 7, 1934.

Why should this wily Jewish gambler rent a house and make his headquarters near Versailles during the peace conference, which gave birth to the League of Nations,? What interest had he in the League of Nations?

The terms of the peace treaty and the League of Nations were ostensibly agreed upon and fixed by Woodrow Wilson representing the United States Government, Lloyd George representing the British Empire, and Georges Clemenceau representing the French Empire,—but they were in fact largely the work of men behind the scenes, viz., the "King-Despot of the blood of Zion" and his agents representing the Jewish race and money power. It is obvious that Baruch was then and is now the political representative of the Rothschilds in America. Ile was then President Wilson's adviser.

The Jew mentor of David Lloyd-George was Sir Philip A. G. D. Sassoon, Bart., a direct descendant of Mayer Amschel Rothschild, and a member of the British Privy Council. He served Lloyd-George during the peace conference as private secretary which enabled him to "sit in" on the secret deliberations of the conferees. Jereboam Rothschild (Mandel) appears to have held a similar position with Clemenceau. Baruch's position with Wilson was that of an intimate friend and adviser.

I quote the magazine "Time" as authority for the statement that Georges Mandel, (Jeroboam Rothschild), until recently France's Minister of the Interior, was Clemenceau's "right bower." It says:

> "To the vital Ministry of the Interior, Premier Reynaud appointed energetic, 54-year-old Georges Mandel, till then Minister of Colonies. This was no new job for the sharp-nosed, stocky little Clemencist, who as the Tiger's chef de cabinet during the last war ran the country's domestic affairs and kept up civilian morale. Born Jeroboam Rothschild, Mandel has often been called France's Disraeli, is a super-politician in a country of politicians, lately showed in the Colonial (and Post Office) Ministry that he had lost none of the drive and administrative flare that made him indispensable to Clemenceau. He was so close to the Premier that the Rabelaisian Tiger once quipped: "Quand je pete, Mandel pue."*

We can now properly appraise this treacherous, criminal peace treaty, out of which has grown the present war. It was not Wilson who betrayed the German government by the promise of his Fourteen Points, nor Lloyd George who was false to the promises made the Arabs to induce them to enter the war. It was Jeroboam Rothschild, Sir Philip Sassoon, and Bernard Baruch. Wilson, Lloyd George and Clemenceau are culpable only to the extent that they acted in obedience to a power that they did not dare oppose.

These three Jews, representing the money power of the Rothschild family, determined the essential provisions of the infamous peace treaty. They established the International Labor Board; they made provision for the Reparations Commission and the Brussels Financial Conference; they gave Palestine to the Jews; and established without our membership the League of Nations and the World Court. It was our refusal to join that prevented the consummation of their grandiose elaborate machine for the government of the world.

Congressional Record, Aug. 21, 1940, p. 16368.
*"Time," May 27, 1940, p. 34.

These three Jews are responsible for the abandonment of President Wilson's fourteen points and for the flagrant violation of the promises upon which Germany laid down her arms. If President Wilson's pledges had been observed we would have no World War II. Perhaps if we had joined the League of Nations there would be none, for we would be the subjects of this "King-Despot" who would rule us with an iron hand. They then and there sowed the seeds that have germinated into the present war.

Jeroboam Rothschild (Mandel) was a member of the Reynaud cabinet and resigned with him and fled with him when France refused to be "merged" into the British Empire but decided instead to surrender. The people of France now appear to realize, according to the press reports, that they are the victims of these warmongers.

It will be recalled that on his return to America President Wilson started upon a speaking tour to convert the American people to the League of Nations and that it was during this campaign that, fortunately for America, he had his break down; otherwise he might have put it over. It should also be recalled that due to the opposition of Senators Borah, Johnson, Lodge, Reed, and other stalwart Americans, this grandiose scheme was defeated. It should also be recalled with pride that there was enough Americanism left in the Senate, led by Borah and Johnson and Huey Long, to defeat our entry into the League of Nations through its back door, the so-called "World Court," during the Hoover administration and again during the Roosevelt administration, despite the powerful pressure brought to bear on the Senate by both of these presidents.

The League of Nations scheme did not originate with President Wilson. He made no such claim. Its precise origin is unknown, but the Jews claim credit for it. It is no doubt their baby, for it has all the ear-marks of their craftiness.

Its pretended purposes was to form a league or coalition of all the nations of the earth for the purpose of preventing future wars, but that was not its real purpose. It was a slick scheme to establish a Super-Government to which all the nations of the earth would be subordinate and subservient.

There was no authority under our constitution for our gov-eminent to become a party to it, even though its purpose had been a worthy one. That small detail, however, "cut no ice" with the "Elders" and apparently none with President Wilson. The London Daily Mail said of it that it is "the most elaborate sham which history has yet perpetrated." It has now discharged all of its employees and closed up its shop.

The peace conference appointed Gustav Cassel, a noted monetary authority of Stockholm, Sweden, to advise them, which he did. He wrote for that purpose two memoranda (published in his book entitled "World's Monetary Problems,") in which he set forth logically and conclusively that it was absolutely necessary to maintain high prices and wages and cheap money in order to enable the people and nations of the world to pay their debts. He showed convincingly that the restoration of the gold standard was impossible, that it would bankrupt the people and governments of all countries, create great distress and unrest and probably lead to war.

In the face of the solemn warning prepared especially for the Brussels Financial Conference, this conference decreed the return of the gold standard, with its cheap prices and wages. Professor Cassel told in words of prophecy precisely the results that have since happened. The shrewd monetary experts of the Brussels Conference knew what would happen without such advice and they intended the very consequences that followed and that now prevail.

Under the pretense of writing a peace treaty with Germany this peace conference established Palestine as a home for the Jews and invested the British Government with a mandate for the government of the country. The Jews have been at war with the Arabs since and the situation has become so intolerable that the British Government sought to divide the country between the Jews and Arabs and to surrender its responsibility, which pleased neither Jew nor Arab.

The Arabs want all of Palestine because it belongs to them and the Jews want it all, although they have not settled it and do not expect to do so. Less than 500,000 Jews have moved there during the twenty-two years since the establishment of this alleged Jewish home. Many of them, after locating there, have moved to America and other countries. More Jews have migrated to America during that period than have settled in Palestine. America is now the "Palestine" of the Jews. They don't want to be farmers and craftsmen;—that is not their ticket. They prefer that the "Goyim" do the work, and themselves to live among them and trade with them and manipulate their currency systems.

The establishment of this "Jewish home" was not involved as an issue in the world war or in the peace treaty with Germany. The Arabs were our allies and they fought side by side with the soldiers of the allies. It was cold blooded, indefensible robbery perpetrated at the instance of the "Elders" by Lloyd George and Woodrow Wilson and Georges Clemenceau.

There would have been some justification for it if the British Government had acquired the lands of the Arabs with their consent, paying for them and buying lands sufficient for the whole Jewish race and had thereafter forced all the Jews from all countries to migrate there; that would have done more toward preserving the peace of the world than all of their mandates, the Brussels Financial Conference, the International Labor Board, and the League of Nations combined.

The worst of it is that the establishment of this "Jewish home" was cold blooded treachery to the Arab Government and people. The Arabs claim that they were induced to enter the war on the side of the allies by the promise that what is known as the Balfour Declaration would be rescinded and that the Arabians would not be molested in the peaceable ownership and possession of their country. This contention is not denied by the British Government, but the excuse is made that Woodrow Wilson insisted that the Jews be given this home and that Lloyd George consented as a matter of policy and in order to get some other things in the peace treaty that he desired. Palestine is now properly called the "twice promised land." It is likely that Germany also promised it in consideration of the Russian deal.

The defenseless Arabs were treacherously ravished by their comrades in arms. If the Jews want this or any other home, let them buy it. That is the honest way to get it, and they have plenty of money for that purpose. Palestine does not belong to them because their ancestors lived there more than fifteen hundred years ago. The most of them have no sentiment about it, for sentiment is not a Jewish characteristic;—with them it is always strictly business.

In any event, this home of the Jews was not involved in a peace settlement with Germany; nor was the establishment of an International Labor Board to regulate the wages and conditions of labor; nor was the restoration of the gold standard; nor was the League of Nations. These are not international subjects, but they are local to each country. It is the province of each and all of the countries of the world to define their own national policies regarding each and all of these important matters. They were all projected into the peace treaty by the Jews."

XII.

Gold

> "With gold we can buy the most rebellious consciences, can fix the rate of all values, the current price of all products, can subsidize all State loans, and thereafter hold the states at our mercy."—From Funeral Oration of Rabbi Reichhorn.
>
> "You are aware that the gold standard has been the ruin of the States which adopted it, for it has not been able to satisfy the demands for money, the more so that we have removed gold from circulation as far as possible."—From Protocol 20.

The fixed policy of the management of the Rothschild fortune is and has always been, monopoly. They brook no opposition and they fix the tolls of whatever business they engage in. In the beginning their operations were confined to government loans, not only for the profit involved but for the political power that it gave them. As the fortune grew their field of operations expanded until it embraced everything. Originally, the Rothschilds had competition for these government loans and consequently were not always able to fix the rate of discount, but this opposition was soon crushed or absorbed.

Among their early competitors was the Bank of England, which was chartered in 1694 for the purpose of financing the British Government. In consideration of a loan of 1,200,000 pounds the British government granted the Bank of England the exclusive privilege of issuing currency in the City of London and within a radius of 65 miles thereof. Originally it was granted an annuity of 100,000 pounds a year for handling the government's business, and its property and operations were exempted from taxation.

Adam Smith says of the Bank of England:

> "She acts not only as an ordinary bank, but as a great engine of state. She receives and pays the greater part of the annuities which are due to the creditors of the public; she circulates Exchequer bills; and she advances to the Government the annual amount of the land and malt taxes which are frequently not paid till some years thereafter."

These functions were in line with the operations of the Rothschilds and consequently they coveted the bank. There is no record of when they acquired it or how much they paid for it, for that is not the Rothschild way; it is one of their secrets. It was probably acquired by Nathan during the hey-day of his activity, sometime around 1830 and as a result of an assault that he himself made on it.

Pretending a grievance, Nathan Rothschild bought up its outstanding notes and personally presented them to the bank for payment day after day, and received coin in payment therefor until he practically exhausted the bank's supply. The management of the bank capitulated. From that time until this day the Bank of England has been one of the most effective agencies of the Rothschilds in promoting their plans.

The charter of the bank was amended eight times during the period from 1694 to 1844 when the Peel amendment was adopted; it has never been changed since. The original government loan of 1,200,000 pounds, instead of being paid, was increased from time to time until it had reached the sum of 11,-015,000 pounds in 1844, when the Peel amendment was adopted.

This amendment provided in substance that the Bank of England might issue its currency notes up to 15 million pounds upon its general assets, and that all currency issued in excess of this sum must be secured by an equal amount of gold coin or bullion; it also provided that other banks of issue should thereafter increase the amount of their currency notes, and then as their charters expired the privilege of issuing curreny should be cancelled.

The Peel amendment had far-reaching consequences apparent upon its face: (1) It demonetized silver, which theretofore circulated in England and throughout the world money; (2) it gave the Bank of England a monopoly of the rency of the British Empire; (3) it established the gold vertible note on the basis of a 100% gold coverage; (4) it made the Bank of England the clearing house of the British Empire and established the British pound as world currency; (5) it gave the management of the bank the power to fix and regulate prices and wages throughout the British Empire and to materially influence them throughout the world.

The Encyclopedia Britannica* states regarding the Peel amendment:

> "It was indispensable, in attempting to obviate the defects inherent in our currency, to proceed cautiously, to respect, as far as possible, existing interests, and to avoid taking any step that might excite the fears or suspicions of the public; but the > measures . . . were so skilfully contrived as to provoke little opposition, at the same time that they effected most important and highly beneficial changes"

*Vol. III, p. 323.

Sir Robert Peel was then Prime Minister of Great Britain and no doubt favored the amendment to the bank's charter which bears his name, but it was his bill only in the sense that the Federal Reserve Act is President Wilson's bill. The apostate Jew Benjamin Disraeli was then at the head of the opposition party whihc overthrew the Peel ministry in 1848. Disraeli was subsequently Prime Minister of England.

Disraeli was then the intimate friend of Lionel Rothschild whose family at that time owned and controlled the Bank of England and the greater part of the gold of the world. It will be noted that the authority mentioned states that the act and its adoption "were so skillfully contrived as to provoke little opposition." Evidently it had the support of the leaders of both political parties, and evidently it was not understood by the members of parliament and by the people generally, and evidently Disraeli had much to do with it, if he was not in fact its author.

It is a singular fact that the bill was put over by the Rothschild agents in precisely the same manner that they put over the Federal Reserve Act. The setting for it was the same, viz: the catastrophe of 1840, which the Rothschilds precipitated;—the Federal Reserve Act grew out of the panic of 1907, which the Rothschilds also precipitated. It was similar in its obscure meaning to our Federal Reserve Act. It was put over as a result of a coalition of both political parties,—as was our Federal Reserve Act. It gave the Rothschild management complete dominion over the welfare of the British Empire and our Federal Reserve Act gave it to them over the people of America.

It is worthy of note that the Peel amendment was adopted during the same year that Disraeli published his book "Coningsby," which was intended to exalt the Rothschilds and the Jews. Disraeli then said of Lionel Rothschild: "He was lord and master of the money markets of the world, and of course virtually the lord and master of everything else."

The so-called Peel amendment enormously magnified the Rothschild power. If there was any question about the head of the Rothschild fortune being "lord and master of everything else" prior to 1844, there can be none about his power since. This amendment made him the absolute "lord and master of everything" since 1844,—and that was the secret purpose of its real authors.

The gold standard was designed to limit the volume of currency in order to enhance the power and value of gold and its owners. The currency cannot expand beyond the quantity of gold in circulation and it therefore presents an absolute artificial limit to the expansion of currency and credit and of business, which is based thereon. As a result the currency systems based on it always break down when there is an unusual demand for currency and credit created by war. All the nations of the world were compelled to abandon the gold standard during World War I, and consequently the Rothschild interest sought to restore it immediately thereafter.

The conferees at the peace conference, Lloyd George, Clemenceau and President Wilson, created two subordinate committees to work out the details of their schemes:—one called the Economic Section and the other the Financial Committee. President Wilson appointed "Elder" Baruch as the American representative on the Economic Section and Thos. W. Lamont, a partner of J. P. Morgan & Co., as our representative on the Financial Committee; both of them Rothschild agents.

The committee of the Economic Section held its session at or about the time of the Versailles Conference but the Financial Conference was held later at Brussels. The Economic Section's committee fixed the German reparations at $12,000,000,000 in flagrant violation of the terms of surrender as proclaimed in President Wilson's fourteen points.

The Brussels Financial Conference in the face of the official advice of Professor Cassel decreed that the world should return to the gold standard. This necessarily meant that all monies, including the dollar, would be greatly enhanced in value, and prices and wages would be reduced accordingly. The dollar has in fact been enhanced from two- to three-fold, and prices and wages and values have been reduced to the same extent. It also necessarily meant that it would be impossible for Germany to pay the reparations fixed by the Economic Section, and for the Allies to pay the monies borrowed from America.

Following the decision of the Financial Conference, the "Elders" sent Professor Kemmerer and their other lackeys to the principal countries of the world to reorganize their financial systems upon a gold basis. They even established the gold standard in poor old defenseless China that had always been on a silver basis and with a limited currency volume of only about $2.50 per capita of silver and a negligible quantity of gold, with the result that millions of Chinese perished from starvation.

The victorious Allies turned Germany over to the tender mercies of the Jews. After having fixed the German reparations at an impossible figure under the gold standard, they drove another nail in the coffin of prostrate Germany in order to make assurance doubly sure. They not only re-established the currency of Germany upon a gold basis but they imposed upon the German people our infamous Federal Reserve System, calling it the "Dawes Plan," by which they gave the Elders the power to control the volume of currency and credit and the level of prices and wages.

They likewise made it impossible for our Allies, Britain, France and other countries, to repay the loans we made them. It was probably never intended that they should be repaid. Elder Baruch is primarily responsible for them for at the time they were made he was President Wilson's right hand man and was directing his foreign policy. There is no authority in our constitution for loans or gifts to the Allies. They were made in utter and flagrant violation of law. They were made for the purpose of enabling foreign countries to remain on the gold standard and pay their debts to the Rothschilds.

Thus, for the pretended purposes of writing a peace treaty that would establish permanent peace among the nations of the world and of collecting German reparations, the "Elders" partially established their League of Nations and their International Labor Bureau, and re-established the gold standard,—but for only a brief period.

All countries have since been compelled to abandon the gold standard, but this was not done until after it had impoverished the people of the world and impaired their morale. The people in their despair have overthrown their governments and created dictatorships and semi-distatorships; nations are at war with each other; and a general war is on. This is all precisely according to the program of the Elders as set out in their protocols.

Thos. W. Lamont knew that the return to the gold standard would be the ruin of all of the States that attempted it, for that result was clearly pointed out to him by the report to the Brussels Financial Conference of his specialist, Professor Gustav Cassel of Sweden. He no doubt knew it apart from this report, but this report made it clear and certain.

Professor Cassel was appointed to advise the committee and he did advise them that the restoration of the gold standard would make it impossible for all of the nations of the world to pay their respective debts; that it meant bankruptcy and ruin for all of them. He made an unanswerable argument in support of his thesis and yet Mr. Lamont and his fellow conspirators decreed that the world should pay its debts and base its values upon Rothschild owned and manipulated gold.

There could be but one purpose in view and that was to destroy all of the States of the world, for that was the necessary effect and it was the known effect. Their purposes were poverty and suffering and unrest and communism and war, for these were the necessary and known results. It was for the purpose of destroying all governments and establishing their Jewish world empire with their "King-Despot of the Blood of Zion" as emperor, for that is the plan of their protocols.

The present war has now developed into a struggle for the preservation of the gold standard. In the beginning Hitler sought only the restoration of pre-war Germany, but it has now passed that stage. It appears to be his present purpose to destroy the Jewish Empire which is so interwoven with the British Empire that the two apparently must go down together. The hybrid Churchill is ready to sacrifice the last Englishman to preserve the Jewish Empire;—the British empire is only an incidental consideration. With victory within his grasp Hitler proposed to negotiate a peace on the basis of preserving the British Empire, which Churchill rejected.

It is the Jewish Empire that is of such deep concern to our hybrid President. He appears to be willing to sacrifice the youth and wealth of this nation to presedve it. It was for that purpose that he caused to be acquired and stored more than 20 billion dollars of gold; that he sent Sumner Welles on his scouting expedition ; that Secretary Hull called the Havana conference; and that he is organizing a huge army and navy.

XIII.

World War II

"We must be in a position to respond to every act of opposition by war with the neighbors of that country which dares to oppose us; but if these neighbors should also venture to stand collectively together against us, then we must offer resistance by a universal war."—From Protocol 7.

The first world war deposed the Kaiser and Bethmann Holweg, but did not depose Rathnau and the other Jews; it transformed the German government from a Jew-controlled monarchy to a Jew-controlled democracy. It is true there was a different set of Jews in control of the democracy; different men, but the same old Rothschild influence, Rothschild ideals, and Rothschild program.

Their first act was to debase the German currency, the reichsmark. They issued many billions of it and continued to issue it until it had no value. They sold vast quantities of this money at heavy discounts in America and other countries, and then made it utterly worthless, thereby fleecing real money from the people of the world. They bought German properties, factories, lands, etc., on time at high prices and paid their obligations in worthless money. After all of this wild inflation and after having acquired and paid for their properties with nothing, this same malign Jewish influence through the Dawes Commission brought about a reorganization of the German Reichbank, a restoration of the gold standard, and deflation.

Thus the Jews have oppressed and impoverished the people of Germany. They have had a great picnic and very rich picking, and they are now paying for their fun. It was estimated by Adolf Hitler that the Jews owned four-fifths of the wealth of Germany. Think of it. This alien race comprising less than 1% of the population owned 80% of the wealth of the country. The worst of it is that they stole it by the manipulation of the German currency system—in the same way that they have stolen the wealth of our country. The wonder is that Hitler has been so patient and forbearing.

President Wilson proclaimed his famous fourteen points to Germany and the world as a basis for a truce and peace. In substance they assured Germany that if she would cease hostilities that the German people and government would not be penalized. The terms of the peace were formally accepted by the Kaiser, and accordingly an armistice was declared which was later followed by the Versailles treaty.

When Germany had laid down her arms and was prostrate and defenseless she was turned over to the Jews to be dissected and sterilized. In a radio speech made by Adolf Hitler a few months before World War II, he recited the promises that were made to induce the surrender of the German army by President Wilson in his famous fourteen points, the flagrant breach of those promises although impliedly guaranteed by the American Government, the dismemberment of the German Empire and the imposition of impossible penalties, and the great depth to which the Jewish Administration of the German government following the, war had reduced the people. Of this he said:

> "Jewish parasites, on one hand, plundered the nation ruthlessly, and, on the other hand, incited the people when it had been reduced to misery. As the misfortune of our nation became the only aim and object of this race it was possible to breed among the growing army of unemployed suitable elements for Bolshevik revolution.
>
> "Decay of political order and confusion of public opinion by the irresponsible Jewish press led to ever stronger shocks to the economic life and, consequently, to increasing misery and to greater readiness to absorb subversive Bolshevik ideas. The army of Jewish World Revolution, as the army of unemployed was called, finally rose to almost seven million."

That is precisely what they are now doing in America, and for precisely the same purpose. That is the manner by which they gained temporary control of the Austrian government. It is their method of operation. Our people have not yet sunk to the depth of poverty and misery and despair suffered by the German people, following World War I, but they are rapidly approaching that condition, and even now they provide fertile soil for the seeds of communism and revolution.

Hitler's speech was not one of an ambitious, sabre-rattling braggart, but it was that of a sober, deliberate, determined man, with a mission to perform, who abhors war.

He said of the war-mongers:

> "If the cry of 'Never another Munich!' is raised in the world today this simply confirms the fact that a peaceful solution of the problem appeared to be the most fatal thing that ever happened in the eyes of those war-mongers. They are sorry no blood was shed—not their blood of course-—for these agitators are, of course, never to be found where shots are being fired, but only where money is being made! No, it is the blood of the nameless soldiers."

In his speech Adolf Hitler plainly and unequivocally said to Poland that Germany must have Danzig and the Polish Corridor, both formerly German, but he did not demand Silesia, also formerly German. He said that in the interest of World Peace he had made a treaty with France regarding Alsace, also formerly German, and he proposed to abide by it.

Hitler undertook to negotiate a treaty with Poland by which these fractions of Germany would be restored, by agreement. Pending these negotiations there was a pogrom against the resident Germans of Poland. Despite that fact Hitler made an appointment with the Jewish Polish foreign minister Beck to conclude the treaty, which Beck failed to keep. Instead of doing so he went to Downing Street in London for advice. Hitler then sent an army to suppress the Polish uprising and thereupon England and France declared war on Germany;—thus World War II began.

When war was declared the Allies sought to encircle Germany; to that end they sought to make an alliance with Soviet Russia and the Balkan states. Pending these negotiations Germany effected an alliance with Russia, the terms of which are not clear, but it appears to be an economic alliance and not a military one.

Both the Russian and German governments have been criticized for this alliance, which appears to be a misfit. The Germans claim that it was a matter of self-preservation on the part of Germany and that if she had not entered into an alliance with Russia the Allies would have done so,—which is probably true. The communists claim that it is entirely consistent with their principles, that it is to the advantage of communism to engulf the entire world in war and then administer on the wreckage,—which is also true, and which is in keeping with their principles and program. That no doubt accounts for the fact that communists of all countries approve this misalliance.

After conquering Poland Hitler again proposed to the Allies and to the world to make peace on the basis of restoring to Germany only that which was taken from her by the treaty of Versailles, with the exception of Alsace. The only difference in this and his original proposal was that it involved the return of the colonies which the treaty of Versailles awarded to Great Britain. The answer to this overture was that they would not treat with the Hitler government; that Hitler and Hitlerism (meaning anti-Semitism) must be destroyed.

True to her ancient strategy it was the policy of England to starve the enemy by blockade with her sea power. In violation of international law, which has been made largely by the British Empire, she imposed a blockade upon both German exports and imports. This Germany met with her submarines and air force, with the result that the starving has been "the other way round." Britain is now getting a dose of her own medicine and it Is evidently very distasteful to her.

Up to this time Germany has fought the war according to the rules of civilized warfare; she has not abused her superior power in the air by attacking with poison gas, as the British evidently expected; she has not attempted to assassinate any British leader; she has given shelter and transportation to the soldiers and seamen of Britain when her ships were destroyed.

There were a number of these prisoners of war on the "Altmark" which was anchored in a Norwegian port. By order of Churchill a British cruiser, in violation of the neutrality of Norway, attacked the Altmark, anchored in a Norwegian port, shot several of the crew who were unarmed and did not offer resistance, and released the prisoners. It is obvious that Germany could have left all of these prisoners to their fate when their ships were sunk. The dastardly, cowardly, murderous attack of the British upon the defenseless Altmark was applauded by the Jewish British and American press as a great British victory.

According to the Associated Press the distinguished Norwegian novelist, Knut Hamsun, addressing his countrymen, said of this banditry:

> "When the Britishers in their prodigious savagery forced a passage into Jossing Fjord and infringed our neutrality, you did nothing about it. But when the Germans occupied Norway to prevent war in our country you did something: You conspired with our runaway King and his private government and mobilized. Norwegians! Throw away your rifles and return home. The Germans are fighting for us and now are crushing England's tyranny over us and all neutrals."

Winston Churchill also violated the neutrality of Norway by mining her territorial waters.

It has been conclusively shown by official papers which fell into the hands of the Germans when they captured Oslo, as well as by other facts, that the British through the Jew Hambro, head of the Norwegian government, had previously arranged to send troops to Norway and to take charge of all of her strategic ports. They appear to have been actually en route when Germany, having a shorter distance to travel, and superior generalship, landed her troops in Norway first. She "beat them to the draw." Norway capitulated and is now under the control of Germany.

The Allies were very much disturbed by this victory. The Jewish press demanded a more vigorous prosecution of the war. Despite the fact that Lord Admiral Churchill, then head of the War Board, had been primarily responsible for the Norwegian defeat, the British government retired Chamberlain, and Churchill was made Prime Minister. Churchill re-organized the cabinet, bringing into it two other pro-Jews and Hitler-haters,—Anthony Eden and Duff-Cooper. They boldly announced that the Allies would take the offensive and would attack Germany; about the same time they transferred the British fleet from Scapa Flow to the Mediterranean.

This meant one of two things: either that the Allies meant to attack Germany through the Balkans or that they had moved the fleet for the purpose of deceiving Hitler into the belief that they would do so, while their real purpose was to attack through Holland and Belgium. If the fleet was moved for the purpose of deception the ruse was an ineffective one and probably an unfortunate one for the Allies. Hitler was not deceived.

The Germans claim that the Allies had made arrangements with the governments of Holland and Belgium to make the attack through those countries, and Germany again "beat them to the draw." We don't know the truth. It will likely be revealed later.

The Allies have not won a single battle or diplomatic victory, with the possible exception that they bought the support of Turkey with a loan of $140,000,000 which has proven to be a barren victory. The Germans apparently have had superior equipment and they undoubtedly have had superior generalship and morale of soldiers. The most important of these requirements is the morale and fighting spirit of the soldier.

The cause and results of the present war prior to the surrender of France are graphically stated by Newton Jenkins of Chicago, as follows:

> "What made Austria as an independent nation fall? Why did Czechoslovakia lose her independence? What made Poland pass out? What caused Denmark, Norway, Holland and Belgium to cease operations as free countries? Why are England and France likely to meet the same fate? German aggression, you say. Not at all. Organized Jewry is the answer.
>
> "Organized Jewry made Schushnigg and others in Austria pursue a mad policy of national suicide and Germany rescued that nation from the unholy alliance. Organized Jewry made Benes, young Massaryk and others in Czechoslovakia pursue a policy of sheer madness. They lost their country. Organized Jewry drove Negrin, Del Vayo and other leaders in Spain along their mad course until the people under Franco rescued that nation. Organized Jewry drove Beck, Smigly Ridz and other leaders in Poland along the same mad course toward destruction. In Norway organized Jewry, working through the part Jewish Hambro, drove that nation along a path of pro-British sympathy and it ceased to exist as an independent nation. The King of Belgium and the Queen of Holland played the game of organized Jewry and now foreign troops are in command of their towns and cities.
>
> "England and France for decades have become the nesting grounds of organized Jewry. The Churchills, Edens, Duff Coopers, Hore Belishas and many others in England, and the Reynauds, the Daladiers and others in France have been the pawns of the Rothschilds, the Sassoons and others. Many of the political leaders themselves have a mixture of base blood coursing through their veins in all of these countries.* These two great empires under the lash and whip of organized Jewry are tramping straight and inevitably to their doom.
>
> "The American foreign policy of the Hoovers and the Roosevelts, the Hulls and the Tafts, the Landons and the Frank Knoxes and Key Pitmans are heading us straight down the same path of despair. The Baruchs, the Kuhn Loebs, the Morgenthaus and others in our land are lashing our weak political leaders to unwittingly destroy our nation in the same way that European nations have been destroyed. America will not follow the dance of death. America will throw off the rule of Jewry and her bailiffs. America will remain the same glorious republic she has always been."

The Germans have experienced defeat once. They have been administered on by the Jews once and they know that defeat means another Jewish administration and the dismemberment of Germany. They know this from the private to the general and by bitter experience. They are fighting for their freedom. "Thrice armed is he whose cause is just."

> It is said that Churchill and Cooper are hybrids and that Eden's wife is a Jewess.

The British and French soldiers are good soldiers and brave men; it is in their blood and sinew and bone,—but they fought half-heartedly. They are beginning to learn, if they have not already done so, that this war is a Jew's war for Jewish power and purposes.

The defeat of the Jews is now apparent. The Germans are moving with irresistible power toward London and they will likely reach their destination before Roosevelt will be able to inveigle America into the war. The Jews, as stated in their protocols, have met Germany's "act of opposition by war" but they have not been able to "offer resistance by a universal war," In the same protocol they say that they "shall respond with the guns of America or China or Japan," but China and Japan are now otherwise engaged, and "Uncle Shylock" wants to stay out of it.

XIV.

"Our Despot of the Blood of Zion"

> "However, it is probably all the same to the world who is its sovereign lord, whether the head of Catholicism or our despot of the blood of Zion! But to us the Chosen People, it is very far from being a matter of indifference."—From Protocol 5.

The people of America do not want a super-government or to be ruled by the pope of Rome or a "despot of the blood of Zion." We barely escaped it when the republicans, with the aid of "twelve willful" democrats defeated the League of Nations project by a very small margin; for the League of Nations meant that very thing.

The Jewish press informs us that one of the original objectives of the present war, called World War II, was the creation of the United States of Europe,—in fact Prime Minister Chamberlain stated the same purpose in one of his speeches,—but it has gotten beyond that stage. It is now a struggle to preserve the British Empire and the gold standard.

The Jews have bled the British Empire white. They have exploited all of the colonies, particularly India and South Africa, but Australia, New Zealand and Canada have not escaped them. They impoverished Ireland to the extent that that country revolted. It is significant that India and Ireland have not come to the rescue of the "mother country, England," in this her hour of peril, and that she has had no support from Arabia, her former ally. The Arabians have been fooled once with the promise of Palestine, and while this has been renewed in a modified form they did not fall for the bait.

Nor has England had any support from the Jews of Palestine so far as we have been informed by the Jewish press. It is certain that if they had raised a corps of thirty men the press would have heralded it all over the world. The Jews prefer that the Gentiles do all of the menial work and all of the fighting. When one of them is drafted he is usually a "conscientious objector" or he finds his way to the commissary department. One of the troubles with the Allies is the graft of the Jews in their Ordnance and Commissary Departments which are in Jewish hands.

If we must choose between being ruled by the Pope of Rome and a "despot of the blood of Zion," the Pope is preferable. He at least will let us live and will not enslave us.

But there does not appear to be any ground for the implied charge in the protocols that the Catholic hierarchy is actively seeking to recover its lost political power and to reestablish its temporal dominion. Undoubtedly the Pope would be delighted to see a Catholic government in America and in every other country of the world. But there is no evidence known to me that the Pope is seeking to gain these ends in the clandestine, subterranean manner as set out in the protocols or that he is cooperating with the Elders for such ends.

The Pope is now having great difficulty in maintaining the status of the church in its ancient strongholds, viz., Mexico and Czecho Slovakia. It is hardly conceivable that under these circumstances he or the Catholic hierarchy would be actively at work undermining the governments of other countries through the impoverishment of the people and the destruction of their governments.

On the contrary there is evidence that the Pope does not approve the present Jewishized administration. The most effective and boldest critic of it has been Father Coughlin of Detroit. If the press is to be believed, (and I do not swear by it), the Pope actually approved Father Coughlin's campaign against the Roosevelt-Jewish-deflation administration.

The Catholic church ruled practically all the countries of Europe for a period of more than a thousand years following the fall of the Roman Empire. It is the period known as the "dark ages." The people were ignorant, superstitious, and desperately poor, and the church was at no pains to enlighten them and to help them. The church has surrendered its temporal authority grudgingly and after much bloody strife. Even now it maintains the semblance of a political government at the Vatican, to which some nations send their ambassadors. Contrary to the policy and tradition of our government the President appointed Myron C. Taylor, Chairman of the Board of the United States Steel Corporation, as our ambassador to the Vatican.

There was a political party in most countries of Europe known as the "Catholic Party," which was devoted primarily to the interests of the church. The Order of the Jesuits was formerly the political organization of the church, which appears to have had a code of political morality as cynical as that of the Jewish "Learned Elders of Zion." The Jesuit organization does not appear to be active in America.

The present war is a death struggle between Hitlerism (anti-Semitism) and Jewish imperialism. It is not primarily for the restoration of Poland or Czecho Slovakia or any other country except insofar as such restoration contributes to Jewish imperialism. It is primarily to destroy Hitler and Germany because they are both anti-Semitic, and to preserve the gold standard because through it the Jews control the economic destiny of all countries.

Hitler abandoned the gold standard, since which date Germany has been prosperous and with no unemployment. Germany is fighting this war without gold and is thereby demonstrating to the world that it is not necessary to borrow gold from the Jews in order to wage war.

Hitler threatens the very foundations of the Jewish empire throughout the world and he now appears to seriously threaten the British navy which the Jews have used to preserve their empire. Our beloved (?) President Roosevelt is itching to get into this war to save world Jewry and to promote himself and not to save America. All of this war hysteria in the United States has been created by the Jewish press and F. D. Roosevelt to serve their fellow tribesmen and not to serve their fellow Americans.

In a speech delivered before the National Social Congress at Nurnberg, Germany, on Sept. 13, 1935, Dr. Joseph Goebbels, Mr. Hitler's assistant, said:

> "Where are the men behind the scenes of this virulent world movement? Who are the inventors of all this madness? Who transplanted this ensemble into Russia and is today making the attempt to have it prevail in other countries? The answer to these questions discloses the actual secret of our anti-Jewish policy and our uncompromising fight against Jewry; for the Bolshevik International is in reality nothing less than a Jewish Internationale.
>
> "It was the Jew who discovered Marxism. It is the Jew who for decades past has endeavored to stir up world revolution through the medium of Marxism.. It is the Jew who is today at the head of Marxism in all the countries of the world. Only in the brain of a nomad who is without nation, race and country could this satanism have been hatched. And only one possessed of a satanic malevolence could launch this revolutionary attack."

Every word and every sentence of the above statement is true. It will bear reading a second time. It not only explains the "actual secret" of the anti-Jewish policy of Germany but it explains the "actual secret" of anti-Semitism in America and throughout the world.

The Jews have in times past been expelled from every country in Europe and some of those of Asia. They were expelled long before their scheme was brought to light by the publication of the protocols and perhaps before any protocols were written, but not before the Talmud. They were expelled twice from France and were expelled and kept out of England for 400 years after their expulsion. Why? It was not because of the ignorance and brutality of all peoples in all ages but because the Jews have been what they are, with the same characteristics and the same ideals and purposes throughout the ages. These characteristics and ideals are reflected in their Talmud and protocols and communist code.

Before any World Empire can be established it is necessary first to destroy the American form of government. The plan of the protocols for that purpose is to impoverish the people, impair their morals and nullify their constitution. There can be no dictator or king or emperor so long as the people are happy and prosperous and patriotic and adhere to their established form of government. The method set out in detail in the protocols is the only possible way to subjugate the American people to the "Despot of the blood of Zion" or any other despot. The destruction of our government has been the principal objective of the "Jew Deal" and the present Jewish administration.

XV.

Our Undeclared War Against Germany

> "We have harnessed them all to the task; each one of them on his own account is boring away at the last remnants of authority, is striving to overthrow all established form of order. By these acts all States are in torture; they exhort to tranquility, are ready to sacrifice everything for peace; but we will not give them peace until they openly acknowledge our international Super-Government, and with submissiveness . . . And the weapons in our hands are limitless ambitions, burning greediness, merciless vengeance, hatreds and malice."—From Protocol 9.

Soon after the German order of fine and expulsion of the Jews, President Roosevelt withdrew our Ambassador to Germany for consultation, (as announced in the press), but he is still at home. Quite a lengthy consultation. This is an act of war; it is usually the first step preceding a declaration of war, but Hitler refused to accept the challenge for the obvious reason that he does not want war with us, despite the fact that we are wholly unprepared.

The treaty of Munich was a sad disappointment to International Jewry and to Franklin D. Roosevelt. Mr. Roosevelt showed his resentment by imposing a 25% tariff on German importations and attaching the monies of the Reichbank on deposit in New York banks. These were overt acts of war which Hitler has met with firmness and dignity. He could do no less than withdraw his own Ambassador and impose a like tariff upon our exports to Germany. If he desired war with our country he has ample grounds for it. It is probably a disappointment to the President that he did not accept the challenge and declare war.

In his first message to the 76th Congress, the President said:

> "Words may be futile, but war is not the only means of commanding a decent respect for the opinions of mankind. There are many methods short of war, but stronger and more effective than mere words, of bringing home to aggressor governments the aggregate sentiments of our own people."

It is significant that no other country of the world has imposed such a tariff upon German imports. Germany can get along without our wheat and corn and cotton and meat and dairy exports as well as we can get along without her market for them, but both countries are being injured. This argument, however, has no force with men who are seeking to impoverish our people and to destroy our government.

Apparently the President made some sort of a secret military alliance with the governments of England and France. At a secret meeting with the Senate Military Affairs Committee he is reported to have said that the "frontiers of France are our frontiers." That is the traditional position of Great Britain.

He denounced this report as a "deliberate lie" but he would not release the members of the Military Affairs Committee from their pledge of secrecy, and he suppressed an investigation. Senator Lundeen of Minnesota, who is a member of this committee and attended this conference with the President, said in a speech in the Senate that the President's statement to this committee, if revealed, would "shock and stun" the American people.

The President pretends that he does not want war and that he is trying to avoid it. He made two dramatic appeals to Hitler to halt,—the first by radio, the second by message. In the second he proposed to act as mediator and to call a conference of the nations of the earth to enter into a ten-year truce. On the day preceding this message he denounced Hitler in a much publicized speech, as an aggressor and a disturber of world peace.

This was not the way to bring about a conference and a ten-year truce. If Mr. Roosevelt really desired such conference and truce he would have submitted his offer in the usual way through diplomatic channels, and not by proclaiming it from the housetops. He desired that the offer should be rejected, and made it as offensively as he could. It was made for "home consumption" and to rally the people of America behind him.

He does not appear to have fooled many people. Dorothy Thompson (Levy) and the other war mongers, all with one accord clapped their hands and applauded—not because they thought his offer was a step in the direction of peace, but because they believed it to be a step in the direction of war. Nor did it fool Hitler and Mussolini. Mussolini's paper said of it:

> "We deny the President any right to intervene in European questions because his country is not directly interested as well as because he personally has not the slightest claim to assuming the role of friendly and impartial mediator."

The article said President Roosevelt's appeal evidently was for internal use. It charged him with wanting to divert American opinion from "the unemployment which grows day by day."

When the Allies declared war on Germany President Roosevelt immediately got busy. His first act was to create an international commission headed by Myron Taylor, Chairman of the Board of the United States Steel Corporation, to assist in the migration of the Jews. We do not know what this commission has done or is doing, but it is still at work and we are putting up the money, and the Jews are landing here by the ship-load.

No country except the United States,—not even Russia—has volunteered a home for the Jews. They have been sent to various South American countries and have been turned back. But we are sending our ships for them and their gold, and congress has recently appropriated $50,000,000 for their maintenance.

In defiance of our immigration laws, which are entirely too lax, the President and Madam Secretary Perkins are admitting Jews, without limit, to America. It was reported that 3,000 per day are now being received without restriction, and the balance of them on a six months visit, which means permanency—at least so far as this Administration is concerned. They are evidently coming now at an even faster rate.

The immigration law provides for quotas for all races and nationalities except the Jew; there is no limit as to Jews. The immigration authorities class the Jew as a religion and not a race, with the result that the great majority of the immigrants we are now receiving from all countries are Jews.

They are in fact an alien people with alien characteristics—mental, moral, and physical—which are always the same and remain the same whether they are German, Russian, Spanish, American, or what not. They don't merge in the melting pot or by intermarriage except to bequeath their Jewish characteristics to the offspring. They are as distinct in their characteristics and as undesirable as are the Japanese and Chinese, which we exclude. The Jews should be excluded for we already have too many of them.

America is now the haven and refuge for the Jews of the world. We have more Jews in the United States than there are in England, France, and Palestine combined. If it is true that there are only 15 million Jews in the world then we have about half of the Jewish population of the world for we now have within our borders between seven and eight million Jews.

It is said that in the Constitutional Convention both General Washington and Benjamin Franklin opposed the admission of Jews into America. Robt. E. Edmondson is authority for the following quotation from the diary of Charles Pinckney of South Carolina, a member of that convention. The Jews deny the authenticity of this historical memo but that is characteristic of the Jews. It is their custom to destroy documents of this type and then deny their authenticity. The statement is evidence of the vision and wisdom of Washington and Franklin :

" 'I agree fully with General Washington—that we must protect this young nation from an insidious influence and impenetration. That menace, gentlemen, is the Jew.

" 'In whatever country Jews have settled in any great numbers, they have lowered its moral tone; depreciated its commercial integrity; have segregated themselves and have not been assimilated; have sneered at and tried to undermine the Christian religion upon which that nation is founded by objecting to its restrictions; have built up a state within a state; and when opposed have tried to strangle that country to death financially, as in the case of Spain and Portugal.

" 'For over 1700 years the Jews have been bewailing their sad fate in that they have been exiled from their homeland, as they call Palestine. But, gentlemen, did the world today give it to them in fee simple they would at once find some cogent reason for not returning. Why? Because they are vampires, and vampires do not live on vampires. They cannot live only among themselves. They must subsist on Christians and other peoples not of their race.

" 'If you do not exclude them from these United States, in this Constitution, in less than 200 years they will have swarmed in such great numbers that they will dominate and devour the land, and change our form of government, for which we Americans have shed our blood, given our lives, our substance, and jeopardized our liberty.

" 'If you do not exclude them, in less than 200 years our descendants will be working in the fields to furnish them substance while they will be in the counting houses rubbing their hands. I warn you, gentlemen, if you do not exclude the Jews for all time, your children will curse you in your graves.

" 'Jews, gentlemen, are Asiatics, let them be born where they will, or how many generations they are away from Asia they never will be otherwise. Their ideas do not conform to an American's, and will not even though they live among us ten generations. A leopard cannot change its spots. Jews are Asiatics, are a menace to this country if permitted entrance, and should be excluded by this Constitution.'

> "Pinckney is further quoted as saying: 'We were amazed at the words of Mr. Franklin, especially as there are only about 500 Jews in the country. I trow Mr. Franklin may be right. In less than 200 years, if we admit them the scoundrels will be calling US their ANCESTORS'."

Every word of the above statement is true. It is a pity they were not heeded.

It is not for us to get excited about Germany's treatment of the Jews. If the German government thinks that they brought about World War I with its frightful consequences to the German people; if they believe that they are responsible for the present war; if they believe the murder of Ernst von Rath was the act of International Jewry; if for these or other reasons they consider the Jews undesirable and wish to fine and expel them,—that is their affair and not ours.

When World War II was declared the Americans in Europe hurried home. About 1500 of them were on the Athenia which was torpedoed and sunk in British waters. The Germans claim that they had no U-boats in that vicinity and that the ship was sunk by the British themselves for the purpose of influencing our government to declare war on Germany,—which Churchill denies.

There was no reason for Germany to sink the ship for it was en route to America, and it had no provisions or war supplies or soldiers on it. There was good reason, however, for the British to sink it because of the American passengers on it—which was the casus helium of our entry into World War I.

We cannot accept Mr. Churchill's statements at par. He is the Jewish-type of politician that only says and does those things that will promote his own purposes. In fact he has publicly stated, boastfully, that he only gives out such information as he thinks it is good for the public to know,—of which he is the exclusive judge.

President Roosevelt sent his envoy, Sumner Welles, abroad for the pretended purpose of sounding out the warring countries and the Pope of Rome on the subject of peace. There was much secrecy attending this mission. It was stated in the press that the President wanted to get first hand information about the situation and about the terms of peace. The real purpose was to effect a truce until we were better prepared for war.

More recently still the President, according to press reports, appealed to Mussolini not to enter the war. We do not know what he said to Mussolini and what Mussolini said in reply further than that he made a courteous reply. It may be that his last note to Mussolini contained a threat in accordance with suggestions of the British press,—that the United States would enter the war if Italy did so.

We do not know the truth. We do know, however, that Mr. Roosevelt is meddling in European affairs to the full extent of his ability, and that he is rendering every possible aid to Britain and is feverishly preparing to join her in the present war.

We know furthermore that Germany is not now threatening us with war and has never done so. Germany has not searched our mails or impounded our ships as have the British. In our whole history Germany has never made a war-like demonstration against this country,—while we have had two wars with Great Britain.

XVI.

Plan of Mobilization

> "It is only with a despotic ruler that plans can be elaborated extensively and clearly in such a way as to distribute the whole properly among the several parts of the machinery of the State; from this the conclusion is inevitable that a satisfactory form of government for any country is one that concentrates in the hands of one responsible person. Without an absolute despotism there can be no existence for civilization which is carried on not by the masses but by their guide, whosoever that person may be."—From Protocol 2.

We are now preparing for war on a gigantic scale. With an admitted national debt of $45,000,000,000, with the taxpayers taxed to the point that industry is no longer attractive, and with poverty and distress stalking throughout the land, Congress has authorized about 17 billions of dollars for war purposes.

In a speech in the United States Senate on March 6, 1939 (see Congressional Record of that date, page 3224), Senator Lynn Frazier of North Dakota said:

> "No one can make me believe that all these war preparations are for defense. In my opinion they are preparations for war, and a foreign war at that. Does anyone know what nations are expected to attack us? Does anyone know who is going to invade our shores? Surely all the great nations of the world have their hands full at home at the present time, and there is no imminent danger of any attacks upon the United States . . .
>
> "We have recently heard about secret conferences and secret sessions here at home. The question naturally arises, Are we ourselves already involved in foreign entanglements and secret treaties? Who knows? If there is anyone who knows, he will not tell, because we have been unable to find out what these secret agreements are, if any, and whether or not we have any."

Surely the members of the United States Senate should be advised of "foreign entanglements" and "secret treaties." The Constitution provides that they must be ratified by the senate. If the President made such commitments he has already assumed the powers of a dictator.

Upon conclusion of the military compact between England and France, England's King and Queen visited the President of France, which visit he later returned. Magnificent receptions of mediaeval splendor were held in both England and France. The King and Queen then came to America, visited President Roosevelt at the White House and also at his Hyde Park residence. These visits, both to Paris and Washington, were evidently arranged by the Jewish administrations of the three countries to effect the triple alliance they were attempting to make in preparation for the war.

It is likely that President Roosevelt is responsible for the Russian invasion of Finland. Soviet Russia sought in advance to obtain from Finland by negotiation, the territory that was taken from Russia by the Treaty of Versailles. This failed upon the advice of the Allies and upon their promises to help Finland in case of war. They no doubt made these promises believing that if Finland was attacked that the United States would come to her aid because Finland alone of all European countries had recognized her obligation to the United States to repay the moneys loaned her. They no doubt made them on assurances that had previously been given by the President.

Although deeply sympathizing with Finland, the people of America were not willing to go to war in her behalf. "Uncle Shylock" has become "gun shy;" he has been worked once too often. If it is true that Finland was made a sacrifice to get us into the war, as appears to be the case, then she is another "Athenia" and another victim of British diplomacy and duplicity.

Senator Frazier said further, in the speech mentioned:

> "There is agitation for the passage of the so-called industrial mobilization bill. According to my information, the bill has not been introduced at this session of the Congress, but it was introduced at the last session, and a great deal was said about it. It was modified somewhat at the last session, and still there is much agitation about it . . .
>
> "This industrial mobilization bill was introduced in the last Congress—it was an administration measure—so that in the event of war the President of the United States would be given the power to draft about 4,000,000 young men for war purposes."

This mobilization plan was gotten up about five years ago by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, which indicates that they have been contemplating war for at least that length of time. Indeed, all of this regimentation of the laborer and the farmer and the industrialist has been priming us for war, and with war as the objective.

The plan has been amended, making it a little less drastic, and in its final form appears in a government document called

"Industrial Mobilization Plan, Revised 1936." As soon as war is declared a bill embodying it will be introduced in both houses of Congress and rushed through as an emergency measure under whip and spur of the Administration.

The following are some of its salient provisions:

> "With respect to any product, foodstuff, material, real property, or right declared by him essentially for the national security and defense in the prosecution of war, to fix and establish just and reasonable maximum, minimum, or absolute prices or rates or rentals at which such product, foodstuff, material, commodity, real property, or right may be bought, sold, rented, or otherwise contracted for, whether such transaction be with the Government or between persons of the civilian population or between any other parties whatsoever . . .
>
> "(i) To regulate, limit, or prohibit the purchase, sale, use, IMPORT, EXPORT, * * * transportation, manufacture, or distribution of any product, foodstuff, material, commodity, real estate, or right;
>
> "(j) From time to time, whenever he shall find it essential to license the 'production, manufacture, sale, USE, IMPORT, EXPORT, storage, distribution, or transportation of any product, foodstuff, material, commodity, real property, or right . . .
>
> "(1) To requisition and take possession of any product, foodstuff, materials, commodity, real property, or right, and on such terms as he may deem advisable to sell or otherwise dispose of such product, foodstuff, material, commodity, real property, or right . . .
>
> "The power and authority conferred by this title upon the President may be exercised in whole or in part under his direction and during his pleasures by such agencies or offices of the United States as he may designate, and he shall have power to appoint an administrator or administrators to exercise such designated powers. Such administrator or administrators shall receive salary or saralies of $10,000 per annum. The President is authorized to create or provide for such additional agencies of the Government as he may deem necessary to execute the functions authorized under this title, and to appoint and dismiss at pleasure such officers and employees and to fix their salaries and compensation."

"It is," said Congressman Shafer of Michigan, "the most astounding document ever published in a democracy."

If it does not mean a dictatorship, what does it mean? The President is given absolute dictatorial power to conscript the people of America and all of their possessions, which means that this power will be exercised by the bunch of Jews that are now in control of the executive department of our government. It means that our constitutional form of government has been discarded,—not temporarily but permanently.

Barney Baruch or some other Jew will be Chairman of the War Industries Board, and he will not relinquish this post when the war terminates; nor will our President relinquish any of his war powers. There will be no more elections. It will be goodbye to our constitutional form of government, to our state governments, and to our freedom.

It was stated in the press that Bernard Baruch had lunch with the President and had a conference with him regarding the war situation. Baruch was non-committal after this conference as to whether or not they had discussed the subject of his being appointed chairman of a War Industries Board soon to be created. It is likely that he wants the job and that he will get it in due time.

It is a matter of some surprise to have my conclusions fully confirmed by no less an authority than General Hugh Johnson, the President's former administrator of the N. R. A., and Baruch's former associate. He knows both Roosevelt and Baruch intimately, and his words are entitled to great weight. In a syndicated article in the press of April 18, 1939, he said:

> "Freedom of speech and press, the right of assembly and petition and practically every guaranty of the bill of rights would go down automatically . . .
>
> "If war comes soon, the Administration which has advocated these trends, if not these objects, would be continued another term, because of war. Having attained these objects because of war, how many of them would be relinquished at the coming of peace?
>
> "Woodrow Wilson gave up most of his war powers immediately after the Armistice—because he detested them. Would the present Administration give them up, having greatly desired them? Has it ever willingly given up a single extraordinary emergency power since March 4, 1933? It would give up nothing of power . . .
>
> "No matter who wins, the next world war will permanently destroy the democracy of every nation, that gets into it. If we want to save democracy for the world, we will keep out of European war."

This is the key that explains the Jew deal, the Roosevelt deflation, and every act of the Roosevelt Administration. Mr.

Roosevelt has been "On Our Way" up to now, but when war is declared he will have reached his destination. Congress and the State governments will then be cast aside and our dictators will be handed down to us instead of elected.

Whether our sympathy is with the British or not, we must recognize that the probabilities are that the President will drag us into the war unless Germany wins a quick victory. Even if we escape this war there is cocky little Japan, ready and willing to fight us at any time we want to fight. The Jews are saying that such a war is inevitable. There will undoubtedly be plenty of provocation for it, and if Mr. Roosevelt gets his third term we will soon be up to our necks in war.

All of these elaborate preparations mean war, and war means that Roosevelt will be dictator with Baruch and Morgenthau as his assistants. It means the destruction of our republican form of government and the loss of our liberties. Indeed, it must be admitted that our own morale is at the lowest ebb in our history. Hunger stalks throughout the land, and hunger has no patriotism; the farmer and the laborer have been corrupted by gratuities; the rich are notorious cowards, and the poor are discouraged and beaten. These are the logical and intended consequences of the "Jew Deal."

By act of congress the State Militia (396,000 men) have been drafted into the United States Army. The act requires that they undergo one year of military training, and it authorizes the President to impress them into service at any place in the western hemisphere. These patriotic men enlisted into the State Mliitia for service in their respective states, and congress is without legal authority to force them into the United States Army in time of peace.

At this time (August 17, 1940) President Roosevelt, the Rothschild- power, and the Jewish press are endeavoring to drive through congress a conscription bill known as the Burke-Wadsworth bill. This measure appears to have been written by one Grenville Clark of the law firm of Root, Clark, Buckner & Ballentine,—Morgan attorneys, and to have been inspired by the Jew, Julius Ochs Adler, general manager of the New York Times.

It appears that on May 23, 1940 the said Morgan attorneys and Henry L. Stimsom (our present Secretary of War and then attorney for Kuhn, Loeb & Co.), Julius Ochs Adler and others held a conference at the Harvard Club in New York City and organized a drive for conscription.

> "On the 3rd day of June they met again. They met to raise money . . . A quarter of a million dollars was raised at one time. Think of that—men raising a quarter of a million dollars to conscript boys in America."*

The Record does not show who put up the quarter of a million dollars but it is a safe guess that a substantial part of it was subscribed by the Rothschilds' banks of Morgan & Co., and Kuhn, Loeb & Co. What for? What did they expect to buy with it? Not propaganda, for the Jew press are for conscription and no money was needed to obtain that support. Five thousand dollars would have been more than enough to have covered all legitimate expenses of presenting the bill and the arguments in support of it, to congress. Another $10,000 should have been ample to have paid for the telegrams that they showered upon congressmen.

This $15,000 ought to have covered also the taking of the Gallup poll. This poll showed that 67% of the American people favored conscription,—which is simply preposterous. One of two things is true: either no poll was taken except of the few employees constituting the so-called "Institute of Public Opinion," or else the poll was confined to the Jews.

This Gallup poll is one of the greatest hoaxes that the Jew press have perpetrated upon the American people. It is usually given front page publicity in the "Jewspapers." A poll is taken upon every subject that is of current interest to the public. Nobody knows anything about the voting until the result is announced. Nobody ever received a ballot or heard of anybody who received a ballot. To take a poll of our 131,000,000 American people would require several weeks time and many thousand dollars. Apparently these Gallup polls are taken in 30 minutes time with an expense of less than 30 cents, and the result announced is always as the Jew press desire it to be.

My estimate of $15,000 to cover the legitimate expenses of the conscription drive, plus the Gallup poll, may be a trifle conservative but surely they would not exceed $25,000, which leaves $225,000, for other purposes. What are those purposes?

---

*From Speech of Senator Holt, Congressional Record, Aug. 6, 1940, p. 15167.

The corrupt purpose of these conspirators is obvious. I do not know whether they could or did buy any congressional supports hope not. I do not care to comment on the subject further than to say that it is a horrible thing to sell the liberties of 12,-000,000 men for $225,000. It is as cheap and as detestable as the betrayal of Christ for thirty pieces of silver; and the money appears to have been furnished in both instances by the Jews.

This amazing revelation was scarcely discussed by the senators. Perhaps they were shocked speechless. It has not yet been denied, despite the fact that our present Secretary of War was one of the conspirators. Senator Minton of Indiana defended the meeting and made a vicious personal attack on Senator Holt. Minton appears to have been supported by Barkley of Kentucky, Pepper of Florida, and Lee of Oklahoma. And thus the matter rests.

The original conscription bill as written by Mr. Clark called for the registration of all men between the ages of 18 and 65, estimated at 42,000,000 men. From this vast number the President was authorized to immediately impress into training and service 4,000,000 men.

The measure was materially modified by the Senate Military Affairs Committee who fixed the age limit at 21 to 31, and the estimated number of men at 12,000,000, all of whom are subject to draft for training and service for a period of ten years. The measure contemplates training 1,000,000 men a year, at an estimated cost of $1,000,000,000.00 per annum for each 1,000,000 men.

We have never had conscription in this country except during brief war periods. All of the requirements for the army and navy in peace-time have been filled by voluntary enlistment. Conscription will never be necessary to repel invasion. It is not necessary now, nor is it legal now.

Canada did not resort to conscription for the first twelve months of the present war. Her very recent conscription measure limits the period of enlistment and training to thirty days instead of twelve months, and Canada is now at war with Germany and we presumptively are not.

Senator Norris, who heretofore has been a consistant supporter of the New Deal, says this of the conscription bill;

> "It will bring about a radical change in the historic course we have taken since the birth of our Nation. As I see it, Mr. President, that change, if it takes place, will inevitably lead > us into a realm where we will have what we are complaining about in other nations—a dictatorship. I can see no escape from it. If we are to have compulsory military training in time of peace, we shall put ourselves on a level with the dictator nations of the world."*

It is reassuring that so trusting a supporter of the New-Deal as Senator Norris has heretofore been, has finally caught the drift of it. It is precisely for that reason—a dictatorship—that Henry L. Stimson, Frank Knox, Kuhn, Loeb & Co., Morgan & Co., and Julius Ochs Adler are spending their money for conscription. It is for that reason that the President of the United States has endorsed this bill and in employing the full power of his high office to put it over.

---

* Congressional Record, Aug. 12, 1940, p. 15535.

PART II.

THE SUBJUGATION OF AMERICA

XVII.

Franklin D. Roosevelt

"In order that our scheme may produce this result we shall arrange elections in favour of such presidents as have in their past some dark, undiscovered stain, some "Panama" or other—then they will be trustworthy agents for the accomplishment of our plans out of fear of revelations and from the natural desire of everyone who has attained power, namely, the retention of the privileges, advantages and honour connected with the office of president."—From Protocol 10.

"The way we do things and not merely the way we say things is nearly always the test of our sincerity."—Roosevelt's Speech, Butte, Mont., April 19, 1937.

There are certain unerring guides to a man's character, viz.: his associates and his work, "the way we do things." Generally speaking, a man is no better than the people he chooses for his companions, ("birds of a feather flock together,") and he should always be judged by what he does. None of us can be judged by our pretensions and our professions, and this is particularly true of politicians.

This chapter will discuss briefly the President and his pals; his work will be discussed in greater detail in later chapters. I do not personally know the President and his intimate associates, but the late Huey P. Long knew them well and intimately. His judgment of men and his estimate of them can be accepted with confidence, for he was fearless and honest, and capable in his appraisements. He was originally a strong Roosevelt man and he is said to have contributed more than any other one man to Roosevelt's first nomination;—indeed, such nomination appears to have been due largely to Mr. Long's support and effort. He often referred to this achievement as one of his greatest mis-Lakes, regretfully saying that he swallowed Mr. Roosevelt with his blarney,—"hook, line and sinker."

He said of the President and his administration that it was but a continuation of the Hoover deflation administration under another name and in a slightly different form; that the difference between them was the difference between "tweedledum and tweedledee" and "low cockalorum and high cockalorum." He stated in an interview that was publishd throughout the country that President Roosevelt is a "liar and a four-flusher" and he challenged an investigation by the United States Senate,—and no one accepted the challenge.

The "kitchen cabinet" is composed of the men behind the scene who actually run the government. The Roosevelt administration up to this hour has been directed by his "kitchen cabinet. No important step has been taken, no important appointment made, no important speech delivered, that has not first had the approval of one or more members of his "kitchen cabinet." They are here stated with their background, in the order of their apparent importance, as follows:

Barney Baruch, Jew; New York stock gambler;
Felix Frankfurter, Jew; New York; Judge U. S. Supreme Court;
Henry Morgenthau, Jew; New York; Secretary of U. S. Treasury;
Sam Roseman, Jew; New York judge; Roosevelt biographer;
Ben Cohen, Jew; New York attorney;
Harry L. Hopkins, New York; non-descript;
—all deflationists, warmongers, and un-American.

Baruch has often been called the assistant to the President. He is the most active and cunning of them all. It was reported that when Roosevelt was first elected Baruch planned to occupy one of the executive offices, but was advised against it; he had, however, just as well be there. Senator Long has furnished us a striking description of him and his methods:

> "There is such a thing as a bird flying when he sees you are going to shoot at him. We boys used to go out in the woods and try to get another kind of bird that does :not wait for you to get ready to get a shot at him, but flies before you ever get a gun in your hand. I remember one time when I tried to shoot an old crow that I saw. I was riding along in a buggy and saw the crow on top of an old log off in the field, so I just rode up right behind a thicket so the crow could not see me at all, and reached into my buggy to get the gun to shoot, the crow. Thick as that thicket was, the minute my right hand got back near the gun the old crow flew away. (Laughter.) The minute Brother Barney Baruch saw this thing squiggling he "got his" and got out, and appeared before the committee and, oh, he was a good man, and we have not seen him since. (Laughter.) He stood with the Hoover Administration until it was wrecked, inside and out. Mr. Hoover was flattened out worse than a pancake, and took his crusade over to Palo Alto, Calif., where, under the shade of the umbrellas, and cooled by the breezes wafted by the palms, he could sit and watch the wreckage, as old Nero watched the burning of Rome,—but old Brother Baruch came right on back down to the White House and got hold of another President.

> "We have Presidents and Presidents, but Baruch goes on forever; and his clique, Baruch and Morgan, have managed to see to it that, notwithstanding the prerogatives and rights that have been granted to them, none have been granted to the two or three million soldiers who saved their hides."—Congresssional Record, 75th Congress, p. 7592.

Elder Baruch was chairman of the War Industries Board during the period of World War I, and as such enjoyed the power and the delights and perquisites of being our Industrial Dictator. This rich, slick, wily and ambitious Jew stock-gambler aspires to again be our dictator, with political as well as economic power. He could now be Secretary of the Treasury, according to a press report, but he prefers to let Elder Morgenthau hold that job, and to bide his time for a bigger one. There is reason to believe that he is the political agent of the Rothschilds.

Morgenthau holds the most powerful and important position in the cabinet, viz: Secretary of the Treasury. There is the foreign Viennese Jew, Felix Frankfurter, appointed Justice of the U. S. Supreme Court by Roosevelt. General Hugh Johnson said of him that he is "the most powerful single individual in the United States." He estimated that Frankfurter is "responsible for the appointment of 125 men to key position in the government." The Jew Ben Cohen is one of his nominees. He actually writes the reform bills that are designated as "Administration measures" and that are tendered to Congress with presidential endorsement and usually adopted without material changes.

The President is himself of Jewish extraction. He admits it. It is immaterial whether he is one-fourth or one-half Jew, for the taint of blood is like the "leaven that leaveneth the whole lump." It is a biological fact that the hybrid inherits the characteristics of both breeds,—and Mr. Roosevelt is no exception to that rule.

The mule provides a striking example of the truth of this law of nature. There was never a mule that did not have the long ears and general appearance of the jack. It is said of the mule that he is without "pride of ancestry or hope of posterity." It is impossible to reproduce a race horse from a combination of a scrub with a thoroughbred.

We indulgent Americans do not appreciate the importance of preserving the purity of our race. We think and speak indulgently of the "melting pot" but to the extent we melt and merge with inferior races we deteriorate. No one can imagine that a mulatto or a hybrid China-man would make a good ruler. It is not in the blood and it is impossible. We instinctively regard the mulatto as a Negro, no matter how white he may be in appearance. The hybrid Jew is likewise a Jew and should be so regarded. A celebrated authority says on that subject:

> "Only one of (the great questions of the times) is of causal importance, that is, the question of the racial preservation of the nationality. In the blood alone there rests the strength as well as the weakness of man. As long as the people do not recognize and pay attention to the importance of their racial foundation, they resemble people who would like to teach the greyhound's qualities to poodles, without realizing that the greyhound's speed and the poodle's docility are qualities which are not taught, but are peculiar to the race . . . He who wants to redeem the people from the qualities and the vices which are alien to its original nature will have to redeem it first from the alien originators of these expressions. Without the clearest recognition of the race problem and, with it, of the Jewish question, there will be no rise of the German nation."*

Mr. Hitler has resurrected the German nation upon that firm foundation. Even more than that he has redeemed practically all of Europe. He has created a new order that may become world-wide. His achievements would have been impossible upon the basis of Jew government and Jew finance such as we now have.

The Jews and Communists seek to destroy this purity of blood. They preach and practice racial equality. There is never a children's movie that does not have one or more Negro pickaninnies in it. Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt is one of the leaders of the racial equality movement. She has had her picture taken with Negroes, entertains them in her home, and preaches Negro equality.

It was stated in the press that the President is the direct descendant of a Holland Jewish family named Rosenvelt. The President was, of course, not called upon to notice this slander, but he took the opportunity to do so. He said in substance, "What of it? The Jews are as good as anybody else."

It is unusual for a Gentile to admit Jewish blood. There was no reason for him to do so unless the charge was true. This taint of blood explains the President's Jewish companionships and Jewishized Administration. It explains many of his Jewish characteristics:—his bluff and his blarney, his "four-flushing" and his duplicity, and his religious adherence to the program of the "Learned Elders of Zion."

*"'Mein Kampf," p. 469.

The more important and unanswered question is whether or not he is, in fact, a communist. It will be recalled that Dr. Wirt, a reputable educator, published an interview in which he stated that by invitation he attended a secret meeting of the "brain trusters" in which the subject of "paving the way for a Communist Dictator" was freely and frankly discussed.

This caused a great "tempest in a teapot." The President was at the time on a fishing excursion in Southern seas on the private yacht, Normahal, with his friend Vincent Astor. He was met at the railroad station on his return by practically all of the democratic congressmen as a testimonial of their faith in him.

He made them one of his characteristic speeches in which he chided them with going from "Wirt to Wirt" in his absence. They appointed a Congressional Committee of Investigation, composed of the President's friends, who summoned before them several of the members of this meeting. They, of course, denied everything, the committee reported there was nothing to the charges, and the subject was laughed off. But it now appears from the report of the Dies Committee that there are more than 700 federal employees holding key positions who are members of a "communist front" organization, viz: the League for Peace and Democracy.

In a recent speech* Congressman Martin Dies, Chairman of the Dies Committee, said of this pretentious League:

> "Conceived in Moscow, delivered in Amsterdam, nourished in its infancy in America by the famous French Communist, Henri Barbusse, the American League for Peace and Democracy has from its beginning served the interests of the Soviet Government. It has been the chief "transmission belt" for drawing "innocents" into the united front network of the Communist Party. It has fostered sabotage in our basic and war industries. It was intended to serve as a reserve force for the espionage activities of spies of the Soviet Government in the United States."*

And so the brain-trusters, or a considerable number of them, are communists who are seeking to overthrow our government and to establish in place of it a dictatorship. In view of the disclosures of this report, the verdict of the Congressional Committee exonerating these communist office-holders should be re-examined.

*Congressional Record, Oct. 31, 1939.

The testimony before that committee was uncontradicted that they did have a meeting and that Dr. Wirt was invited to this meeting and attended it. It was also uncontradicted that they did discuss the subject of dictatorship. The principal difference between Dr. Wirt's testimony and that of the other participants in the meeting who testified was that Dr. Wirt testified that they said that Roosevelt was the "Kerensky" who would pave the way for a real dictator—a Stalin—which they denied. In view of the fact that it is a part of the code of the communists to lie and deceive, (as was found by the Dies Committee) we should accept Dr. Wirt's testimony as true.

Despite the revelations of the Dies Committee we still have at least 680 communists in Washington on the government payroll who are "boring from within" and seeking the destruction of our government, and paving the way for a dictator. By a word President Roosevelt could have them all removed from office, but he has not spoken that word. Why does he tolerate these traitors and their nefarious work? There is and can be but one answer, and that is that he is in sympathy with what they are doing. They are there to take over when the occasion arises. This throws some light upon the efforts of the President and his wife to suppress and discredit the work of this committee.

Mrs. Roosevelt is also a very decided "pink" or a red. She withdrew from the D. A. R. because one of its chapters refused the use of its hall to a Negro singer. She made a speech at the convention of one of the communist "front" organizations in Birmingham advocating Negro equality and the repeal of the Jim Crow law. She also defended the Jewish race in the Dec. 31, 1938, issue of "Liberty Magazine," arguing that the Jews are smarter than the Gentiles and that the Gentiles are envious of them and persecute them for that reason.

Mrs. Roosevelt appeared before the Dies Committee with communist leaders who were summoned as witnesses by the committee and were there for the purpose of giving testimony. This unusual procedure on the part of the "First Lady" was for one of two purposes: either to show her disapproval of the action of the committee and to intimidate them, or else to give the communists the benefit of her sympathy and support, and to encourage them.

Mrs. Roosevelt's maiden name was also Roosevelt, she is the President's cousin as well as his wife, and has the same Jewish blood in her veins. At a recent convention of the National Youth Congress, composed of communists of all ages from youths in their teens to aged men and women, she appeared on the stage with them and entertained many of them as guests at the White House.

The President has been a politician all of the years of his life and has had Jewish support during that entire period of time. By profession he is a lawyer but has never distinguished himself in that capacity. So far as the record reveals, he has never had a client or tried a lawsuit.

For a time Mr. Roosevelt was vice president of a "fly-by-night" insurance company, and for another period of time he was president of United States Investors, Ltd., a swindling syndicate that sold the public worthless Jewish-manipulated German currency. He inherited a fortune that was acquired by his Jewish ancestry, some of whom were money lenders. When out of office he has lived with mamma and been supported by mamma on Granpa Rosenvelt's money. This is a condensed true story of the life of our glamorous, ambitious, warrior President.

XVIII.

The Reds in the Saddle

> "We appear on the scene as alleged saviors of the worker from this oppression when we propose to him to enter the ranks of our fighting forces—Socialists, Anarchists, Communists—to whom we always give support in accordance with an alleged brotherly rule (of the solidarity of all humanity) of our social masonry. The aristocracy, which enjoyed by law the labour of the workers, was interested in seeing that the workers were well fed, healthy and strong. We are interested in just the opposite—in the diminution, the killing out of the Goyim."—From Protocol 3.

There can be no understanding of Communism and Bolshevism without an understanding of the Jewish question, for they emanate from the Jew as truly as does our banking and currency system. Karl Marx and Frederick Engels, the founders of Communism, were both Jews. Communism is an essential part of the program of the "Elders" for the conquest of the world; just as essential as gold. They employ their banking and currency system to create poverty and unrest, and communism to wreck and destroy.

This explains the riddle of the Lamont family. Thos. W. Lamont, a partner of J. P. Morgan & Co., was our representative to the Brussels financial conference that sought to establish the gold standard throughout the world. His son, Corliss Lamont, is an active communist. Both father and son are working for a dictatorship; the father laid the foundation for it, and the son carries on the active work.

I do not mean to imply that all communists are Jews or that all Jews are communists, but I do mean to say that the communist leaders are Jews and the Jew leaders communists. How otherwise can we explain the financing of Lenin and Trotsky by Schiff and Warburg? How otherwise can we explain the "Jew deal" which was concocted by Baruch, Frankfurter, et al., and put over by Roosevelt? Take the Jews and Jew money out of the communist party and you take out its living, propelling force; it would die overnight.

The active campaign to communize America began immediately following the treaty of recognition of Russia. This treaty provided, according to press reports, which may or may not be true, that the Soviets would not attempt to sovietize

America, but that meant nothing to them. It is one of their boasted, cardinal principles, that the end sanctifies the means, and that they may lie, steal and murder to accomplish their ends. Prior thereto our government and most of the governments of the world refused to recognize the Russian government because it supports the Third Internationale, a political organization for the propagation of communism. It is this organization which is financing the communist movement in this country, which means that the Russian government is doing so.

This infamous treaty was concluded between two Jewish communists, viz., Franklin D. Roosevelt and Maxim Litvinoff (Finkelstein), for the pretended purpose of trade but for the real purpose of undermining and destroying our republican form of government. It has not materially increased trade, but it has enormously increased communism and crime. Maxim Litvinoff is an avowed, full-blooded Jew, and a red communist; Roosevelt is a hybrid and a pink communist; the difference between them being only one of degree.

Mr. Roosevelt has recently made some important changes in his cabinet. He fired ex-Governor Woodring as Secretary of War because he was opposed to selling our army and navy war equipment to England, and was opposed to our declaring war against Germany. He appointed in his place, Henry L. Stimson of New York, for the reason that he favors our intervention in the war and our rendering every possible aid to England. He also appointed Col. Frank Knox of Illinois as Secretary of the Navy, for the same reason.

The following is Roosevelt's present cabinet, with their Jewish hook-up:

Secretary of State: Cordell Hull, Tennessee; wife, Rosie Mix, Jewess;

Secretary of the Treasury: Henry Morgenthau, New York, Jew;

Secretary of War: Henry L. Stimson, New York, attorney for Kuhn, Loeb & Co. (Rothschild Bank) ;

Secretary of the Navy: Frank Knox, Chicago; publisher Daily News (Rothschild paper) ;

Secretary of the Interior: Harold F. Ickes, Chicago; member "American Civil Liberties Union" (communistic) ;

Secretary of Labor: Madam Frances Perkins (nee Wutsky), New York; "pink;" nationality unknown;

Secretary of Commerce: Harry L. Hopkins, New York; "pink;" nondescript.

What a Rothschild aggregation! What a Jewish and pro-Jewish aggregation! What a warmonging aggregation! The cabinet is presumed to represent the people of the United States and to be selected from different sections of the country. Who is represented here except the Jews? And what sections except the cities of New York and Chicago ?

What chance is there for us to keep out of the war with these Jews, Jew-in-laws and pro-Jews in charge of our government? The cards are stacked against us. It is not the people of England that they are seeking to rescue, but it is the Jews of Europe. It is not the British Empire they are trying to save, but it is the Jewish Empire they are seeking to preserve and promote. All of this war hysteria, war expenditure, and war taxes are primarily for that purpose.

It is reported that there are 18,000 Jews and many thousand communists holding government positions in Washington. It is not yet quite as bad as it was in Russia before the purge, where it said that 76% of the Jewish population held government jobs. The most outrageous of all the President's appointments was that of the Jew-Communist, Felix Frankfurter, to the Supreme bench. Frankfurter is the reputed author of the N. R. A. and other new deal legislation, and will, of course, as a judge, sustain their validity. Worse than that, he is an active "Elder" and an active member of the "American Civil Liberties Union," a communist organization whose object is to impair and destroy our government.

The United Mine Workers make the following report as to the purposes of the "American Civil Liberties Union":

> "Active among the 'intellectual' classes of the country, and posing as a champion of the 'liberties of speech, press, and assembly,' is the American Civil Liberties Union at New York. This organization is working in harmony and unity with the Communist super-structure in America, engaged in the dissemination of radical utterances and propaganda, and conducting a nationwide campaign for the liberation of Bolshevik agents and disloyal agitators who have been convicted under the war-time laws, or the syndicalist laws of different states, for unpatriotic or revolutionary activities."*

This report is fully sustained by the evidence reported by the Dies Committee. Roger Baldwin, the national director of this "Liberties Union," testified that it advocated the overthrow of our government "by force and violence," and "murder and assassination." It appears also from this evidence that both Felix Frankfurter and Harold Ickes are members of it. It also appears that it is allied with and supports the "International Labor Defense Organization" which is the legal department of the Communist Party. (See Report of the Dies Committee, pages 83-86.)

*Quoted from Senate Doc. 14, 68th Congress, Page 7.

It is this latter organization that defended Mooney, and Sacco and Van Zetti and the murderers of the officers at Gastonia,—Marion, North Carolina, and the Negroes in the Scottsboro case. They were all convicted communist murderers, except the Negroes, who were convicted for the rape of a white woman. These dastardly convicted criminals have been lionized by the Jew press as if they were persecuted heroes.

The President appointed Kamerads Frankfurter and Ickes to two of the highest offices in our government. He must have known when he appointed them that they were communists and advocate the overthrow of our government. If he did not have this knowledge in the beginning he has it now, and he has not called for their resignations. He must have had it in the beginning, for they are his intimate bosom friends and are frequent visitors in his home.

In its report filed Jan. 3, 1940, the Dies Committee reports the following findings:

> "According to one of the recent minutes of the Washington, D. C, branch of the American League, it was decided to 'set up League committees in the units of Government agencies with our present membership in those agencies as a nucleus.' These nuclei of the League are now formed in more than a score of Government agencies. H. C. Lamberton, chairman of the "Washington branch of the League, testified under oath before the committee that there are 700 Government employees who are members of the American League for Peace and Democracy."*

The committee further reports:

> "American League for Peace and Democracy.—The committee finds on the basis of overwhelming and conclusive evidence that the American League for Peace and Democracy is a Communist "front" organization . . .
>
> "These self-styled Social Democrats pledged themselves to work for civil war in their respective countries in the event of another international conflict."*

*Report 1476, House Representatives, 76th Congress, 3rd Session.

The committee further reports that this organization (American League for Peace and Democracy) is financed by the Communist Party. Thus it appears that this is a militant organization, not for peace but for war; that its real purpose is to promote a revolution to overthrow our government when we become entangled in war, which means that if Mr. Roosevelt inveigles us into World War II that this organization will then get actively to work to overthrow our government.

"There are 700 Government employees . . . in more than a score of Government agencies" who are set and ready to go when the occasion arises and the command is given. If Mr. Roosevelt did not know that these employees were communists and revolutionaries when they were appointed, he knows it now because this official report is available to him and his interest in the subject is such that he has undoubtedly read it.

The President has clandestinely subjected us to the jurisdiction of the "World Court," correctly called "the back door to the League of Nations," despite our refusal to join either the League or the Court. By proclamation issued August 24, 1924, the President accepted membership in the International Labor Organization on behalf of the United States.

This organization is a creature of the League of Nations, composed exclusively of members of the League. One of its purposes is to standardize the hours and wages of labor throughout the world, and its decisions are subject to review only by the world court and not by our Supreme Court.* It can hardly be called a coincidence that John L. Lewis now seeks to carry out in America the mandates of the I. L. O.

The President is now eniploying the full power of his office to communize the labor organizations of America. He called the officials of the A. F. L. and the C. I. 0. in conference at the White House and told them in substance to get together or else he would find means of forcing them to do so. So far the A. F. L. has bravely refused to yield to this pressure. Jno. P. Frey, a member of this conference, stated in the press that the terms of union offered the A. F. L, by the C. I. O. are precisely those proposed by the communists two years ago.

This is what the Special Committee of Investigation of the United Mine Workers of America said of the program of the Communists:

"The major points in this revolutionary program of the Communists are:

(1) Overthrow and destruction of the Federal, state, and provincial governments, with the elimination of existing constitutional forms and foundations.

(2) Establishment of a Soviet dictatorship, absolute in its exercise of power, owing allegiance to, and conceding the authority only of the Communist, or Third International, at Moscow, as a "governmental" substitute.

(3) Destruction of all social, economic, and political institutions as they exist at this time.

(4) Seizure of all labor unions through a process of "boring from within' them, and utilizing them as a strategic instrument in fulfillment of their revolutionary designs upon organized and constitutional government." * * *

"The revolutionary leaders in America are making a nation-wide attempt to obtain control of the American Federation of Labor, reorganize the craft unions on the basis of 'one big union' in an industry, and weld them into the central revolutionary agency in America." (Senate Document No. 14, 68th Congress, pages 2 and 6.)

During this long and much publicized controversy between John L. Lewis and Wm. Green, we have heard a great deal about "one big union" and "crafts union"—Lewis' organization being a "one big union" organization and Green's a "crafts union." That is now, and has been from the beginning, the fundamental difference between them. But we did not know that the "one big union" is a communist scheme for satbotaging American institutions and the American government. This report of the United Mine Workers is cited with approval by the Dies Committee.

The Dies report mentioned says this of the C. I. O.

"With the formation of the C. I, O. the principal efforts of the Communists were turned in the direction of that organization . . . The evidence before the committee indicates, however, that the leadership of some 10 or 12 of the constituent unions of the C. I. O. out of a total of some 48 unions is more than tinged with communism. The evidence shows that some of their leaders are either card-holding members of the Communist Party or subservient followers of that party's 'line'."

It is Stalin's plan to overthrow the American government through one huge labor organization. In order to bring this about it is necessary to communize the A. F. L., which he has in the past vainly tried to do. He promoted the C. I. 0. as a rival organization, but since it has been unable to absorb the A. F. L., the next best thing is to amalgamate the two, and through "boring from within" to finally communize organized labor.

*See Government Document No. 874 and Senate Joint Resolution 131.—Congress.

Is not that also the purpose of the President of the United States? If that is not his purpose then why has he sought to bring about a coalition between two rival labor organizations, not once but repeatedly and persistently? The answer and the only answer is that it is the program of the protocols, of the Third Internationale, and of the Communist party. They seek to create one huge labor organization and to gain control of it, and through it to overthrow our government. Ezra Chase, a communist organizer, testified before the Dies Committee that the Communistic plan for subjugating America was to bring about a general strike in case of war, and thereby to bring about revolution.

And who will be our dictator? Who now, and for the past seven years has been working feverishly to obtain the powers of a dictator? Who has bankrupted our national government and the people of America in order to bring about revolution and dictatorship? None other than the man who arose from a bad dream in the middle of the night to inform the American people that he was not suited for the job of dictator,—when nobody had accused him of it. None other than the man who for the first time in the history of our country now seeks to be elected President for a third term.

XIX.

Report of the Dies Committee

"Who and what is in a position to overthrow an invisible force? And this is precisely what our force is. Gentile masonry, blindly serves as a screen for us and our objects, but the plan of action of our force, even its very abiding-place, remains for the whole people an unknown mystery."From Protocol 4.

The House of Representatives appointed a committee to investigate "Un-American activities," known as the Dies Committee. This committee is composed of the following members, viz:

Martin Dies, Chairman, (Texas) ;
Joe Starnes (Alabama) ;
John J. Dempsey (New Mexico) ;
Jerry Voorhis (California) ;
Jas. E. Casey (Massachusetts) ;
N. M. Mason (Illinois) ; and
J. Parnell Thomas (New Jersey).

The first four named are Democrats and the latter three Republicans, but the committee nevertheless filed a unanimous report.

The committee started out by investigating Nazi activities. It appears from their report that there is a "German American Bund" that has some connection with the German government. It states that Fritz Kuhn places the membership at 20,000 to 25,000, but that the Department of Justice estimated it at 6500 in 1937. There is also an "American Italian Black Shirt Legion," about 10,000 strong. While the committee finds that the German Bund "must be classified as an agent of a foreign government" there was no evidence or finding to the effect that it is seeking the overthrow of our government. On the other hand, the purpose of the German Bund appears to be to develop loyalty to both their fatherland and their adopted country.

So long as the committee confined its investigation to Nazi activities everything was fine and lovely, but when it turned to the Communist what a howl went up from the Jewish press and leaders—led by Franklin D. Roosevelt, Harold Ickes, and Madam Perkins. In the beginning it was,

"O noble judge! O excellent young man!
O wise and upright judge!
How much more elder art thou than thy looks!
"Ay, his breast:
So says the bond:—doth it not, noble judge?—
'Nearest his heart:' those are the very words."

But when the committee began to examine the record of the Communists, the President, from his high office, denounced and belittled them; something unprecedented in American history. Why? Answer that to your satisfaction if you still believe in the sincerity of Franklin D. Roosevelt. There is but one answer and that is that the President wanted to suppress the investigation of the Communists and to disparage the report of the committee.

Why should he want to do that? No answer except that he is a Communist and he does not want the truth revealed. He wants the Communists to succeed in their secret, nefarious work. Whatever else may be said of Mr. Roosevelt, he is no fool. He and his Jewish advisers know what they want and how to get it, and they are working adroitly and secretly and relentlessly to accomplish their ends. If the President and Secretary Perkins do not stand for sabotage and communism, why do they so steadfastly refuse to deport the alien red, Bridges, and others of his kind?

Be it said to the everlasting credit of the Dies Committee and the House of Representatives that the committee was not swayed or intimidated by this fulmination of the President, and that the House by an overwhelming majority re-appointed them, and by a vote of 320 to 27 appropriated sufficient funds to continue their work.

I quote from the report of the Dies Committee liberally because the subject is one of such vital importance to us all:

> "We have shown that communism is a world-wide revolutionary movement aiming ultimately at the setting up of a world union of soviet socialist republics. This is a proposition which is beyond dispute. It is substantiated by voluminous literature of the Communists themselves . . .
>
> "The Communist code of ethics not only permits, but actually glorifies as virtuous, such immoralities as perjury, destruction of property, the beating and maiming of workers who refuse to follow the dictates of the Communists, shootings, stabbings, kidnappings, and bombings. It is even a matter of boasting among Communists that Stalin robbed banks in the days before the Communist regime was set up in Russia.
>
> "To summarize: The Communist code of ethics is based upon the principle that the ends of revolution justify any means, no matter how lawless, violent, dishonest, or indecent from the standpoint of accepted American standards of morality."*
>
> *House Report No. 2, 76th Congress, 1st Session, pages 26 and 29.

How familiar this sounds. This is the cruel, diabolical code of the "Elders" called the "Protocols." They represent the same plan for subjugating peoples and governments, and establishing their kingdom of the elders. They both originated in distorted Asiatic minds and are both founded upon the philosophy of the Talmud.*

The committee summarized their findings in part as follows:

> "Whereas it once employed the frank slogan of "the Defense of the Soviet Union," it works today to embroil this country in a foreign war by the propagation of the doctrine of 'collective security.'
>
> "It seeks ultimately the overthrow of the American form of government as established by the Constitution of the United States.
>
> "It aims to set up a dictatorship of the proletariat in this country, notwithstanding its present tactical silence on this fundamental tenet of communism . . .
>
> "It hides behind civil liberties in pursuing ends which will destroy civil liberties for all but the ruling few of the proletarian dictatorship . . .
>
> "It stifles the creative impulses of the individual by its deadening regimentation . . .
>
> "It seeks to sabotage and cripple our economy on every possible front, with a view to its profiting by the resulting economic crises . . .
>
> "It has penetrated the Government itself, with the result that some Communists hold hey positions in Federal agencies and projects . . .
>
> "It aims to incite race war by its special agitation among the Negro population of this country . . .
>
> "It seeks to silence all hostile criticism by charging its critics with red-baiting, while, at the same time, it viciously baits those who dare oppose it . . .
>
> "It dangles the promise of economic security before the victims of economic distress, offering them a new slavery in the name of emancipation."

That is precisely what the New Deal is now doing.

The findings read like a chapter taken from the protocols. They have the same philosophy, the same objective, and advocate the-same methods as set out in the protocols. They represent the plan of the Elders and the "Jew deal," and of the present Jew administration for the destruction of our government in order to pave the way for their soviet dictatorship. The committee in fact finds that it is the purpose of the communists to "overthrow the American form of government . . . in order to establish a dictatorship of the proletariat."

*See "The Talmud Unmasked," by Col. E. N. Sanctuary.

House Report No. 2, 76th Congress, 1st Session; pages 118-119.

This Jew-deal "stifles the creative inpulse of the individual by its deadly regimentation." It "seeks to sabotage our economy" by maintaining deflation. Through its Resettlement Administration it has organized "the Negro population" and is seeking to communize them and "promote race hatred." It "seeks to silence hostile crticism by charging its critics with red baiting while at the same time it viciously baits those who dare oppose it."

This Jew-deal administration has knowingly employed 700 communists in "key positions in federal agencies," paying them salaries of from $1200 to $7500 per annum because they are communists and for the purpose of communizing our government. In spite of the exposure of the Dies Committee, all of them, except twenty who resigned, are still at work "boring from within" and ready to take over at the appointed hour.

The number of communists in the United States is variously estimated at from two to ten million. This report of the Dies Committee and the previous report of the Committee reveal the fact that the communists have many organizations under high-sounding and attractive names, in addition to the Communist Party which is avowedly communistic; that all of these organizations are abundantly supplied with money for their work, the greater part of which is furnished by Moscow.

It is reported that there are now 80 times as many communists in America as there were in Russia when the Russian government was overthrown, and three and one-half times more than there are in Russia today; that they have in the United States 800 national organizations with thousands of branches having an estimated membership of 6,500,000; that they have 600 newspapers and magazines printed in all languages and circulated regularly in the United States; that they own publishing houses, book stores, film laboratories and theatres, etc., that they maintain 200 national so-called cultural movements, 62 national communist youth movements and 33 national so-called defense movements; and that they spend an estimated $10,000,000 annually in the United States to promote civil war.*

*See Report of Walter S. Steele, of the National Republic, Washington, D. C.

In view of this menace to our country, it detracts from the report of the Dies Committee for it to devote several pages to a discussion of the German Bund and to classify this Bund with the communists. Even if it has 25,000 members, and even if they are actively at work (and the report of the committee does not disclose it) they are a mere bagatelle as compared with the activities of the communists. It is the contention of the Bund leaders that they are combatting communism and that that is the purpose of their organization.

Undoubtedly George Deatheridge, Robt. E. Edmondson, James True, General George Van Horn Mosely, Col. E. N. Sanctuary, Gerald B. Winrod, Win. Dudley Pelley, and Chas. B. Hudson are fighting communism. They are not racketeers, as the committee intimates; they are not "selling religious and racial hatred," as the committee states. It does not add to the dignity and weight of this report for the committee to go out of its way to besmear these patriots who are endeavoring to render a service to their country in its hour of great peril.

General George Van Horn Mosely submitted a strong statement to the committes in which he showed conclusively that this communism that now confronts us and which the committee so clearly portrays and forcefully condemns, is of Jewish origin and is financed and promoted by Jews. The committee knows that this is true but they refused to accept General Mosely's carefully prepared and truthful statement to that effect. In their two reports there is not a word that reveals the real authors of the deviltry that they condemn. Why? It is because of the "invisible power and its abiding-place."

I do not wish to detract in the least from the committee's very able report. They have honestly and courageously revealed a threatening situation that we did not know existed. In passing judgment upon their work we should take into consideration the invisible power that rules our country and our government. Already this power has publicly threatened to contribute $250,000 to defeat Martin Dies, chairman of the committee, in his present race for re-election. This invisible force "whose abiding place is unknown" has the power to defeat any member of this committee for office, and the power to elect a president of the United States.

This power is manifested in the effort of President Roosevelt to suppress the work of the Dies Committee, in the propaganda of the press and radio to drag us into war, and the distress and poverty that pervades the land. Its "abiding place" has been in Paris, France, and in the directing head of the Rothschild fortune, to-wit: Jeroboam Rothschild alias Georges Mandel. All of this pernicious activity by many agencies to subvert our government, in the final analysis reaches back to that head.

No foreigner should be admitted to citizenship or to hold office, whether Jew or Gentile. We, the American people are the "chosen people," and not the Jews and the foreigners. We are capable of running our own government in our own way without their help; and they are not capable of doing so. They have not had the necessary training, and a few years of residency here does not imbue them with our spirit of morality and government. They can not be changed over night by merely taking the oath of allegiance.

We should classify the Jews as a race and bar them from entering the United States. We have barred other Asiatics,—Japanese, Chinese, etc. Why not the Jews? They are less desirable than the Chinese and Japanese because they are shrewder, more destructive, and their goal is to fleece us and to destroy our government. All Jews who have migrated here since 1914 should be deported, together with their progeny.

The foreigners have polluted our citizenship and our government. They are our communists and our gangsters. They are the authors and promoters of the new deal.

The effect would be to relieve us of Mr. Justice Felix Frankfurter, the author of the N. R. A., etc.; Congressman Sabath, chairman of the powerful Rules Committee of the House; Congressman Dickstein, chairman of the Immigration Committee; Congressman Sol Bloom, Chairman of the House Foreign Relations Committee, and many other foreign-born officials holding key positions, that we can very well spare.

XX.

Corruption, Everywhere Corruption

> "We shall create an intensified centralization of government in order to grip in our hands all the forces of the community. We shall regulate mechanically all the actions of the political life of our subjects by new laws. These laws will withdraw one by one all the indulgences and liberties which have been permitted by the goyim, and our kingdom will be distinguished by a despotism of such magnificent proportions as to be at any moment and in every place in a position to wipe out any goyim who oppose us by deed or word."—From Protocol 5.

Tammany Hall is not the good old Irish Catholic organization that it used to be. Corrupt as it has always been reputed to be, it is infinitely worse now. There was some limit to its graft, even in the days of Boss Tweed, but there is none now.

Jno. J. Hines, recently convicted of graft, was the dispenser of relief funds for the Roosevelt regime in New York City. He was an appropriate and an artistic administrator of these funds. The corruption was so foul and rotten that it appears to have turned the stomach of even so tough a politician and so loyal a friend as Jim Farley.

It is the philosophy of the Roosevelt regime to "tax, tax, tax, and spend, spend and spend, and elect, elect and elect." According to the press reports Harry Hopkins, our former relief administrator and present Secretary of Commerce, actually boasted of it,—which he of course denied. Whenever they make a slip and give us a glimpse of what they propose to do to us it is always a "damned lie" or a "deliberate lie."

Everywhere it is bribery and corruption. Senator Tobey, in a speech in the United States Senate, said:

> "Shame on the American people! There is something the matter with us today. Are there any strings on us? Are we still free men? If so, we should cry out, 'Unclean! Unclean!' and determine that so far as lies within our power we will put the bars up against a repetition or recurrence of such practices."

Never before this regime have we had anything like it. We have never before had a President whose family personally profited or sought to profit through his prestige and power. The Roosevelt family are "out for the dough." They appear to be content for the balance of us to be poor, but for themselves they prefer "the fleshpots of Egypt."

The Saturday Evening Post (before the Jews bought it) published a series of articles revealing Col. Jimmy Roosevelt's enormous profits from the insurance firm of Sargent & Roosevelt. Insurance is a favorite method of graft because it is semi-legitimate, easily concealed, and the "picking" is rich. A suit was filed by a firm of insurance brokers against a Boston bank for $25,000 for insurance premiums, alleging that they were entitled to these premiums and that the bank had diverted them corruptly to Roosevelt & Sargent in order to obtain favors from the Roosevelt administration.

The above quotation from Senator Tobey was about insurance that a ship-building company had been forced to place with the son of a powerful Washington official, without naming the father or the son. If it was not Jimmy there must be others in the same game, but the probability is that it was Jimmy.

Shortly before or after this exposure by the Saturday Evening Post, Jimmy was made secretary to the President and a Colonel in the Marines. The latter position is a sinecure since he performs no service, but it carries a salary of $10,000,—a rather generous gift from Dad, of the despised taxpayers money.

Jimmy held the position of secretary to the President only a short time when he resigned to become associated in some capacity with Samuel Goldwyn of the movies. (It is a matter of conjecture whether he resigned his position as Colonel of the Marines with its $10,000 salary.) The press reported that this change was made because of the affection recently developed between the Jew, Sam Goldwyn, and Colonel Jimmy. It appears to have been a case of love at first sight.

It has since developed that indictments were pending against Sam Goldwyn and others for violation of the anti-trust laws, and that Jimmy was made a defendant in these bills of indictment. Does anyone imagine for a moment that Jimmy will be prosecuted, convicted and punished? How can he be released without releasing the others? These slick Jews don't pay big salaries from love and affection; it is always quid pro quo with them. But Jimmy proved a disappointment. He did not get the anti-trust suit dismissed and the love match is over. Some coarse grained observer unfeelingly said that when Sam discovered that Jimmy was not president of the United States he fired him. Jimmy is now a producer on his own, or with his mother.

The Associated Press carried a story on August 6, 1940, that Jimmy and his mother (Eleanor) have been sued by the estate of Ernest Tollor (a notorious Jew communist who committed suicide) for using the play "Pastor Hall" without paying for the privilege. The play is an anti-Nazi propoganda play. It is evidently being produced for the purpose of promoting war hysteria and incidentally to realize a little coin in the operation, or vice versa.

When Col. Jimmy went with Sam he resigned his position with Sargent & Roosevelt; and his mother, Eleanor, was elected a director in his place; the business was too profitable to allow it to get out of the family. Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt is writing a daily column for the press under the caption "My Day,"—and surely it is her day and also that of her family. It is a profitable day and they are all "making hay while the sun shines." She is periodically advertising a cosmetic over the radio. From these activities she is receiving large emoluments;—not by virtue of her ability, for she is mediocre, but because she is the wife of the Presdient of the United States.

The President's second son, Elliot Roosevelt, made a deal with the Russian Government to sell the soviet 50 Douglas military planes, from which he received or was to receive a commission of $500,000. Mr. Fokker, in testifying before the senate committee investigating the munitions industry, explained that he thought the price excessive but that he had been persuaded by Elliot and his associate Mr. Stratton, that Elliot had enough influence with the Export-Import Bank and the Russion Purchasing Commission to swing the deal.*

The Roosevelt family are thrifty people; they overlook no opportunities. It is in the blood. The New Deal regime is rotten from top to bottom and from, center to circumference. It is an alien regime;-—alien to our code of morality, to our system of government, and to the spirit of our institutions. It is a typical Jewish Administration.

It is reported that when the President visited Brazil in November, 1936, he made a speech in which he said:

> "I am leaving you tonight with great regret. There is one thing, however, that I shall remember, and that is that it was two people who invented the New Deal—the President of Brazil and the President of the United States."—From Congressional Record, March 17, 1939, p. 4805.

*See Speech of Congressman J. C. Shafer of Michigan; Congressional Record, Nov. 1, 1939.

No, the Presidents of the United States and Brazil did not "invent the new deal" as Mr. Roosevelt boastfully says. It was handed to both of them by International Jewry, the "learned Elders of Zion." To Mr. Roosevelt through Elders Baruch and Frankfurter, and to Mr. Vargas through other Elders.

The President of Brazil was elected as a liberal. Soon after his election he overthrew the constitutional government of Brazil and assumed the role of a dictator. It was a mere "push over."

Two kindred spirits with the same plan and the same objective. The difference between them is that Vargas has got there and Mr. Roosevelt is still "On Our Way." We can well imagine what would have happened if the President had succeeded in his "purge" campaign; and it will happen anyway, if he is elected for a third term.

I fully endorse the sentiments expressed in the following anonymous verses:

"An applicant stood at the gates of hell,
And the devil himself had answered the bell.
He looked him over from head to toe
And said: "My friend, I'd like to know
What you have done in the line of sin
to entitle you to reside herein.'

"Then Hyde-Park D., with his kosher guile,
Stepped forth and flashed his toothy smile.
'When I took charge in Thirty-three,
A nation's fate was mine,' said he.
'I promised this, I promised that,
Then calmed 'em down with a fireside chat.

" 'I spent their money on fishing trips,
And fished from the decks of their battleships.
I gave them jobs on the W. P. A.,
Then I raised their taxes and took it away,
I bossed their wages and closed their shops,
I killed their pigs and burned their crops.

" 'I double-crossed both old and young,
And still the goofs my praises sung.
I brought back beer, and what do you think?
I taxed it so high that they couldn't drink.
I supplied them cash with government loans;
When they missed a payment, I took their homes.

" 'When I wanted to punish the folks, you know,
I'd put my She on the radio.
I paid them to let their farms lie still,
And imported food-stuffs from Brazil.
I curtailed crops when I felt real mean,
And shipped in beef from the Argentine.

" 'My workers worked with the speed of snails,
While taxpayers chewed their fingernails.
When the Red-Jew mobsters needed dough,
I closed up plants for the C. I. O.
I ruined jobs by my New Deal stealth
And put the screws on rich men's wealth!'

"Now Hyde-Park talked both long and loud,
While the devil stood and his head he bowed.
At last he said: 'Let's make it clear,
You'll have to go—you can't stay here.
For once you mingled with my mob,
I'd have to look for another job!"

Mr. Roosevelt has built on his Hyde Park estate in New-York a mausoleum or sanctuary in which all of his personal papers will be stored and his remains interred, and which will be open to the public. Evidently he anticipates that he will be worshipped as the founder or a new order and that there will be pilgrimages to his tomb, as there are to Lenin's. "Vanity, vanity, all is vanity" and conceit. In the language of Puck: "O what fools these mortals be!"

We are now suffering from a transitional period when the Jews are attempting to create an "intensified centralization of government," and to "regulate mechanically all the actions of the political life by new laws." They are seeking to bring this change about by lies and corruption. Everything they propose is explained with a lie and often sugar-coated with corruption.

The most dastardly form of this corruption is that of the youth of the land. Rabbi Reichhorn said in his oration to the Jews:

> "But above all let us monopolize Education. By this means we spread ideas that are useful to us, and shape the children's brains as suits us."*

When the Learned Elders came to write out their plan of conquest, for their own instruction and guidance, they said on that subject:

> "We have got our hands . . . into education as being the corner-stone of a free existence. We have fooled, bemused and > corrupted the youth of the goyim by rearing them in principles and theories which are known to us to be false, although it is by us that they have been inculcated."

*See Appendix II.

It is a fact of common knowledge that Jews and reds now occupy many of the chairs in our colleges and universities. They appear to specialize on the chair of Political Economy where the students are taught to believe in the infamous gold standard. Many of our leading institutions of learning are now properly regarded as hot-beds of communism.

Our fine inexperienced young men and women, eager for knowledge, receive and absorb this insidious poison and their minds and characters are warped by it. These false political and financial theories are all a part of their plan for the subjugation of the people of the world. It was the plan pursued in eGrmany, even in the age of Disraeli, which culminated in World War I and finally World War II. Sidonia (Rothschild) then observed that most of the "professorial chairs are now in our (Jew) hands" and that the result would be revolution and war. That situation prevails here today.

From Protocol 9.

XXI.

Federal Reserve System

> "The present issue of money in general does not correspond with the requirements per head, and cannot therefore satisfy all the needs of the workers. The issue of money ought to correspond with the growth of population and thereby children also must absolutely be reckoned as consumers of currency from the day of their birth. The revision of issue is a material question for the whole world."—From Protocol 20.

The expansion and contraction of currency and credit is the method of the Elders for absorbing the wealth of the world, and it is the surest and quickest plan. Compound interest would eventually do so except for the increasing supply of the precious metals and increasing wealth. This method, as certain as it is, is too slow for the "learned," greedy, and ambitious Elders. By expansion and contraction of currency and credit the rich are always made richer and the poor are made poorer; and the possessions of the weak are acquired by the strong, and thus great wealth and great poverty are created.

Obviously, a country can not be subjected to currency and credit manipulation that has a sufficient quantity of money or currency in circulation, for credit is directly dependent on the quantity of money in circulation;—the more money the greater the basis of credit; the less money the less the basis of credit. Credit is, of course, dependent upon the will of both the man who seeks the credit and the one who extends it, but it will not be sought or extended if there is thought to be an inadequate volume of money for its redemption. It is essential in order to control at will the expansion and contraction of credit that there be some supreme authority with the power to increase or decrease at will the volume of money in circulation.

Prior to the regime of the Rothschilds this power resided in the kings and emperors of the world, for they were then the supreme authority. In our country our National Constitution vested this power in the Congress of the United States. At the time of the adoption of our National Constitution state banks issued their currency notes payable in gold and silver which circulated as currency, and this system continued until after the Civil War. This state bank currency added materially to the volume of money in circulation and to the stability of credit and of values. Since the Civil War and until recently National banks issued their currency notes, based upon United States bonds and redeemable by the national government, which circulated as currency and which contributed materially to the supply of money and the stability of credit and of values.

Under the Rothschild influence the banking systems of the world were all radically changed. The supreme authority to issue money, as well as to extend credit, was transferred by the various governments to the bankers of their respective countries. The Bank of England became the model for other central banks of the world.

At the time of the establishment of the Federal Reserve System our government was the only one of any consequence that even pretended to exercise its sovereign right to issue and control the volume of money in circulation. The establishment of the Federal Reserve System operated as a complete surrender to the banking fraternity of the sovereign power of the American people to regulate values through their congressional representatives, as guaranteed to them by their national constitution.

The panic of 1907 was, like all of our other panics, a manipulated one. It was brought about by the refusal of the reserve banks of New York to pay currency to their country bank depositors, which in turn made it necessary for these banks to refuse to pay their depositors in currency. It was therefore due primarily to an insufficient quantity of currency in circulation and an inadequate method of increasing the supply.

There was universal demand for a change of the system and for an adequate volume of money to meet the demands of commerce. Congress appointed a committee, called the Monetary Commission, with Senator Nelson W. Aldrich of Rhode Island as chairman, to study the banking systems of the world and to report its findings. This committee made one or more trips to Europe and some two years after its appointment filed an exhaustive report of more than four thousand pages, which was never read by anybody. In the meantime the bankers and the various commercial bodies and the farmers and the laborers in their conventions, and the politicians and the press were all with one voice demanding a banking and currency system that would make future panics and depressions impossible.

The keynote of President Wilson's campaign for the presidency in 1912 was the reform of our banking and currency system and he was elected upon that issue. Immediately after his election he submitted that subject to Congress in a very strong message, pointing out the inadequacy of the existing system and the necessity for a system that would provide an adequate supply of currency and credit to meet the demands of industry and commerce and that would insure the full employment of labor, and high prices and wages. His message and his campaign speeches all indicated that he had a keen understanding of the money question and that he desired to establish a system that would afford an adequate volume of money and credit, and would sustain high prices and wages.

There then followed a great struggle, feigned or real, between the big city bankers and the Administration. The bankers sought to establish a central bank with power to control currency and credit and with themselves in control of the bank. They threatened that if this was not done that they would denationalize and would have nothing whatever to do with the system. The Administration apparently sought to reserve to the government its sovereign power to issue money and to establish a decentralized banking system to supply credit. The question of the conditions under which new currency would be issued and whether or not the currency note should be a bank note or a government note were important issues in the struggle.

The original Federal Reserve Act emerged as a result of this controversy. The big banks without a single exception were satisfied and accepted this system. President Wilson and Secretary McAdoo were apparently satisfied with it. President Wilson said of it, that it was a charter of freedom to commerce and industry and that men could go forward with their undertakings with assurance and without fear that their possessions would be taken from them by the contraction of currency and credit.

In the midst of this campaign for the reform of our banking and currency system Paul Warburg, a German Jew, migrated from Frankfort-on-Main, the original home of the Rothschilds, to America. He was at the time a member of the Rothschild banking firm in Frankfort-on-Main and he became a member of Kuhn, Loeb & Company in New York, the American branch of the Rothschilds, upon his arrival here. The following is the Naval Secret Service report on him in December, 1918:

> "Warburg, Paul, New York City, German; was naturalized an American citizen 1911, was decorated 1912 by the Kaiser; was vice-chairman of United States Federal Reserve Board; is a wealthy and influential banker; handled large > sums furnished by Germany for Lenin and Trotsky; subject has a brother who is leader of the espionage system (of Germany)."

The brother here mentioned was Felix, who afterward migrated here and was a member of Kuhn, Loeb & Co., and Chief of the American Elders. Soon after his arrival in New York Paul Warburg called in conference the leading New York bankers and submitted to them a plan for the reform of our banking and currency system, which they enthusiastically endorsed. It was then submitted to the Aldrich Monetary Commission and approved by the commission, despite the fact that they had spent two years of study and filed a four thousand page report on the subject. It was in its essential features the charter of the Bank of England. The Aldrich Monetary Commission submitted this plan to Congress in the form of a bill known as the Aldrich Bill.

The Democrats immediately arrayed themselves solidly against it. There was great opposition to it throughout the land, because it was openly and brazenly a centralized banking system that vested the bankers with the sovereign power to issue and control the volume of money, and because also of our very sad experience with the First and Second Banks of the United States. Upon this issue primarily the Republican Party was defeated and President Wilson and the Congressional Democratic candidates elected.

It thereupon became necessary to revise and rewrite the Aldrich Bill and to at least camouflage it in order to make it acceptable to the country. Frank A. Vanderlip, then President of the National City Bank, gives an account of this revision in his memoirs. It appears therefrom that he and Henry Davison of J. P. Morgan & Company, and Paul Warburg of Kuhn, Loeb & Company held a secret conference on Jekyll Island (how appropriate the name) near Savannah, Georgia, and that they then and there rewrote the bill conforming it in appearance to the requirements of President Wilson and the Democratic Party, but preserving the substance of the Aldrich Bill.

The honor, such as it is, for this iniquitous bill is claimed by many people. The Republicans claim it because it was in fact the Aldrich Bill in disguise, and the Democrats because it was in fact endorsed and adopted by a Democratic Administration. Carter Glass claims it because he was then Chairman of the House Banking and Currency Committee and it bore in part his name. Paul Warburg claimed it because it was in fact his baby and he acknowledged it as such. He supplied the frame work of it, which was colored and mildly altered by Vanderlip and Davison. But President Wilson and McAdoo and Glass had practically nothing to do with it except to pilot it through Congress.

The Federal Reserve System is the product of the Rothschilds and its adoption was secured in the same underground, deceptive manner that they always employ to obtain their objectives. Paul Warburg evidently came to America to reform our banking and currency system and evidently he and the Rothschild interest then anticipated the world war, although it did not come about until some three years later.

They, of course, knew that such war would necessarily produce great expansion of currency and credit and of values and that money would be cheapened accordingly and that a "killing" could be made by contracting it. They also knew that America as the producer and seller of food and war materials would receive vast quantities of gold in payment for them. They also knew that under our financial system as it then existed this great influx of gold would enormously increase our volume of money and basis of credit, that money would be correspondingly cheapened and values increased and that great and permanent prosperity in America would be the inevitable result, and that this inflation and prosperity would likely extend to all other countries. It was, therefore, necessary to their plans to sterilize this gold and to put the American banking and currency system on a credit basis and to bring it under their own control.

This is the sordid story of the greatest disaster that ever befell the American people. We then surrendered to Jeroboam Rothschild and his successors, complete dominion over our currency and credit, over prices and wages, and over our welfare and happiness. Prior thereto he had great influence through his Morgan & Co., and Kuhn, Loeb & Co., banks and their subsidiaries and affiliates, but now his authority is made supreme and unlimited. This surrender perfected his control over the economy of all the people of the world.

XXII.

Deflations of 1920 and 1930

> "Economic crises have been produced by us for the goyim by no other means than the withdrawal of money from circulation. Huge capitals have stagnated, withdrawing money from States, which were constantly obliged to apply to those same stagnant capitals for loans. These loans burdened the finances of the State with the payment of interest and made them the bond-slaves of these capitals . . . The concentration of industry in the hands of capitalists out of the hands of small masters has drained away all of the juices of the peoples and with them also of the states."—From Protocol 20.

The language and the phrases of the original Federal Reserve act were so obscure and ambiguous, that President Wilson and Congress may have been deceived into believing that it was in fact what it pretended to be. It may be that the President accepted it as being in his judgment an improvement over the then existing system and as being the best bill he could then get. It may be that he expected to later perfect it by amendment and to make it the reliable servant of commerce and industry and of the people, and not their tyrannical master.

If such was the President's purpose it has operated "the other way around." It has been perfected, it is true, but it has been perfected as a central bank with the sovereign power in the "Federal Reserve Board" to "issue money and control the value thereof" in plain violation of our National Constitution.

Every perfecting amendment that the Elders have wanted has been adopted by a complaisant Congress until it now has infinitely more power than either the First or Second Banks of the United States ever had and more than the Aldrich Bill proposed, and it has abused such power shamefully and to the irreparable injury of the American people. Senator Glass may be entitled to credit for these perfecting amendments though they bear the earmarks of the Rothschilds. It is he who has sponsored and piloted them through the United States Senate and through Congress.

Upon the adoption of the bill President Wilson appointed Paul Warburg as deputy governor and a few months later as governor of the system. He held that position until 1919 when he resigned and his assistant, W. P. G. Harding, was made governor. In the meantime William G. McAdoo had resigned his position as Secretary of the Treasury and David Houston, Secretary of Agriculture, had been appointed Secretary of the Treasury. In the meantime, also, Barney Baruch had supplanted Edward M. House as President Wilson's confidential adviser. This was the set-up when the deflation of 1920 was decreed.

It was a great shock to the bankers of the country when they found that they could not discount their "eligible" notes and bills at the Federal Reserve Banks. It had been proclaimed throughout the length and breadth of the land that agricultural and commercial notes could, by the endorsement and guaranty of member banks, be converted into currency ad libitum. The banks and the people were importuned by the treasury department and other government authorities to buy government bonds and to produce food in order to help win the war, and consequently the people had borrowed liberally and the banks had extended credit liberally, believing that the Federal Reserve System would extend credit if needed.

Then without previous warning the Federal Reserve management arbitrarily refused to extend credit to the member banks that served thp commercial and agricultural interests of the country. The Federal Reserve authorities at first denied responsibility, claiming that the deflation was a natural reaction from high prices and wages, that it originated in Japan, etc. After the publication of the minutes of the secret conference of May 15, 1920, of the Federal Advisory Council, Federal Reserve Board and the Governors of the Federal Reserve Banks, they then admitted that the job was theirs and admitted also that it was a mistake.

These minutes, which they thought no one could ever dig up, set out in detail what they proposed to do, the manner of doing it and the reasons therefor. They said in substance that the "vicious circle of increasing prices and wages must be checked;" that people were extravagant and that this must be corrected; and strange as it may now sound they said also that people were not working hard enough and not producing enough goods to meet the demands of the world!

They proposed to correct all of these things by refusing to issue currency and extend credit. Of seventy bankers, who attended this conference, only two voted against this unjust, illegal and destructive program, which demonstrates, if demonstration Is necessary, how unwise it is to invest an interested class, even as intelligent and righteous as the bankers profess to be, with the sovereign power to fix and regulate values and the prosperity of the country. No doubt some of the bankers who voted for this program suffered grievously as a consequence of it.

There followed one of the most destructive panics and depressions this country has even known. The borrowers who had extended their borrowings to meet the demands of their government, and the banks that extended credit most liberally for the same purpose, suffered most. Many of them became bankrupt and many of them, both borrowers and lenders, died by suicide and despondency and disease as a result thereof. Even government bonds were depreciated to such an extent that the original owners lost them and the banks that took them under foreclosure lost money on them.

The national wealth was estimated prior to this depression at from 500 to 600 billion, afterward at from 250 to 300 billion. This meant a general reduction in values of from 200 to 300 billion dollars. This huge sum is more than the expenses of our National Government, including all of its wars, from its establishment up to 1914.

With such terrible consequences and with proven and admitted responsibility for them it is difficult to believe that Congress would do nothing about it. But strange as it may seem no serious effort has ever been made to curtail the power that brought such disaster upon the country. On the other hand, it has been enlarged and amplified and legalized, as far as Congress can do so, by perfecting amendments;—always sponsored by Carter Glass.

It was, of course, necessary for the Federal Reserve banks to loosen up in order to prevent a debacle, with the result that there was considerable recovery in 1927, 1928 and 1929, and with the result also that there was considerable speculation in 1929 in anticipation of still further recovery. For the pretended purpose of checking this speculation the Federal Reserve management again decreed deflation, which they brought about in 1930 in precisely the same manner as in 1920, viz: by the contraction of currency and credit.

They made no "bones" about it this trip; it was done openly and above board and they have never denied it, Congress having condoned the crime once it was assumed it would do so again. And Congress not only condoned both crimes but it has legalized the methods employed; and not only that, it has granted an indefinate charter to the system and has given it additional power to deflate.

The 1930 deflation was a reproduction of 1920 with substantially the same results. Our national wealth which had increased during the ten years intervening to about 400 billion dollars, was reduced 40 to 50 per cent. It bankrupted many men and many banks that had survived the depression of 1920 and many younger men who were in the midst of establishing themselves ; it transferred the property of the debtor to the creditor; it operated with the greatest severity on the farmer and the laborer and their families; it reduced the value of farm products below the cost of production, in consequence of which many farmers lost their homes and means of living; it closed factories, and thereby about twelve million laborers lost their jobs and means of living and many of them lost their homes and became public charges.

Both of these depressions were far more serious in their results than the short lived manipulated panic of 1907. The panic of 1907 was over almost as soon as the banks resumed their ordinary function of paying the checks of their depositors in currency. At that time it was beyond the control of the Elders to force a substantially lower level of values because our banking system was then on a currency basis and not wholly on a credit basis as it was in 1920 and in 1930 and is now.

Organized ostensibly to supply an adequate volume of currency and credit the Federal Reserve System has been perverted into a vast money and credit hoarding machine; organized for the pretended purpose of preventing panics and depressions, it has been employed to create the three most disastrous ones in the history of our country. Obviously, the remedy for the panic of 1907 was for the government to put into circulation a greater volume of money and to outlaw as traitors the conspirators who brought it about. Obviously, the remedy was not to turn over to these pirates the sovereign function of issuing money, as the Federal Reserve Act did.

The remedy for the catastrophes of 1920 and of 1930 was and is now to get more money into circulation and to free the country from the control of this iniquitous Federal Reserve System. Obviously it was not to extend the power and charter of the system; and obviously also, it was not the "new deal." The remedies suggested are so clear and simple, and those adopted are so inadequate and grotesque that even a congressman ought to be able to see and understand the sham and hypocrisy of it all. The methods employed in putting over the English Bank Act were almost identical with those used here in perpetrating the Federal Reserve Bank hoax. The British people did not understand that they were contracting their currency by demonetizing silver, and that their government was forever abdicating its sovereign right to control currency and credit and values, any more than we understood these things.

They, however, obtained two important advantages that we did not get: (1) They were paid for the charter and for every one of its eight renewals, whereas we gave the Elders the charter and then renewed it indefinitely and we did not recieve a "thin dime" for this valuable monopoly; (2) The Bank of England (and for that matter the central banks of issue of all other countries) lends money direct at a low rate of interest to the people, whereas the Federal Reserve bank is authorized to lend only to member banks;—a "banker's bank" they call it, and so it is—"lock, stock, and barrel."

XXIII.

Deflation of 1937

"'The principal factor of success in political is the secrecy of its undertakings; the word should not agree with the deed." —From Protocol 7.

It should always be remembered that the Federal Reserve System was created for the avowed purpose of supplying the country with an adequate volume of currency and credit. At the time of its consideration and adoption the commerce of the country was in the process of recovery from the panic of 1907. This panic was, as has been stated, a manipulated panic, precipitated by the central reserve banks of New York City, and primarily due to the fact that we did not have a sufficient volume of money in circulation; the system was changed for the purpose of supplying such volume.

There was universal demand for such change, led by the bankers of New York City. So eager were they for a change of system that the elder J. P. Morgan and the elder Geo. F. Baker (president of the First National Bank of New York) testified before the Pujo Committee that there was a "Money Trust" and that it was in the public interest that it be controlled. This admission was at the time a matter of great surprise; the purpose of it is now better understood. In the light of subsequent events and of our present knowledge, we are justified in suspecting that the panic of 1907 was brought about for the purpose of establishing the system we now have.

I prefer to believe in the integrity and sincerity of Woodrow Wilson. I supported him for the presidency, in ignorance, however, of the fact that his campaign was financed by Jews. Despite my bias, I must admit that the Wilson Administration was responsible for the deflation of 1920.

President Wilson appointed Paul Warburg, a member of the Rothschild banking firm, as deputy governor and later governor of the Federal Reserve System. Warburg was the real author of the act and was also author of the Aldrich bill. He openly advocated a central bank, and publicly testified that the system could be transformed by administration into a central bank,—and he proceeded to so transform it. He proposed the amendment that gave the system the power of deflation, which President Wilson approved. Warburg, however, resigned before the deflation process was begun and thereby escaped the odium of it.

When the Federal Reserve Act was adopted the Democrats thought they had won a great victory, but nevertheless many well informed Republicans claimed credit for the Act and that the bill was in fact the Aldrich Bill under a different name and in a different dress. The Democrats thought that the Federal Reserve Board was only a medium of contact between the twelve reserve banks and that the banks would be governed by their respective boards of directors and would function independently of it. It was originally provided that a member bank could at will convert its eligible notes into currency by simply endorsing them and sending them into the reserve bank of its district for discount; and the notes of the farmer and those given in the course of commerce were in the preferred class.

This method of issuing currency was intended to supply the adequate volume of currency and credit that the people of the country desired and were promised by the Democratic Party. It has all been changed since. The original purpose of the act has been entirely lost sight of and has been grossly perverted. Paul Warburg was right when he testified before the Senate Committee that the system could be transformed into a good system (for the Elders) by administration. It has in fact been transformed adroitly by administration but more radically by legislation.

Just prior to the panic of 1920 Congress adopted an amendment empowering the Federal Reserve Banks to limit the discount privileges of member banks and to refuse to discount eligible notes. This amendment changed the whole character of the system. It could no longer operate automatically in response to the demands of the people. Thereafter currency could only be issued at the discretion of the Federal Reserve Banks,—which was subsequently changed to the Federal Reserve Board.

The Federal Reserve Banks promptly exercised this power and promptly brought on the panic of 1920 in pursuance of the resolution adopted at the conference between their representatives and the members of the Federal Reserve Board on May 15, 1920. The depressions of 1920 and of 1930, and the present depression would not have been possible except for this change in the act.

Every step in the administration of the system and every act of Congress amending the law since its enactment, have been in the direction of a centralized banking authority with the power of life and death over commerce and industry. Without authority of law the Federal Reserve Board established an "open market committee" to fix and regulate the volume and value of money, with the Governor of the New York Federal Reserve Bank as chairman. It is and was the office of this committee to expand the currency by buying securities, etc., on the open market in New York and Chicago, and issuing in payment therefor the notes of the Federal Reserve banks. To contract the currency the process is reversed; they sell securities and receive currency in payment therefor, which is thereby withdrawn from circulation.

This supplanted the original system of issuing currency in payment of eligible notes discounted by member banks. The difference is that under the present system the "open market" committee determines how much currency is good for us; under the original system the demands of commerce and industry and the member banks determined the quantity of it; the one depends on the integrity and wisdom of the committee, the other responds automatically to the currency and credit needs of the people.

The depression of 1930 and the remedy for it was the issue in the 1932 campaign. Mr. Roosevelt charged that President Hoover was responhible for the depression and that he had adopted inadequate measures to restore prosperity. There was no demand by either political party or any candidate for office that the Federal Reserve System be converted into a centralized banking authority and that its powers be enlarged. No man could have been elected President of the United States on any such platform.

Under the pretense of protecting bank deposits and of creating a corporation for that purpose, for which there was some demand,—the Congress enacted the bill known as the "Banking Act of 1935." This bill completed and perfected the system as a centralized banking authority with much greater power than was provided in the original Aldrich Bill. Among other things it legalized the "open market committee" and provided that the members of the Federal Reserve Board and five members of the Federal Reserve banks (to be selected by their directors) should constitute this "open market committee."

The Bank Act of 1935 called for a new Governor, and new members of the Federal Reserve Board to be appointed by the President,—and Mr. Roosevelt named Marriner S. Eccles as Chairman of the Board and appointed an entirely new board. All of them were new members with the exception of Professor Miller who had been a consistent and trustworthy deflationist from the beginning.

The original Federal Reserve Act required the member banks to maintain reserves in the Federal Reserve Banks as follows: country banks and those in smaller cities, 7% of the amount of their deposits; banks in reserve cities, 10% ; and in central reserve cities, 13%. These reserves were not subject to check ad libitum by the banks, as under the former system, but could only be checked against "under the regulations and subject to the penalties, provided by the Federal Reserve Board." They were intended to be and were in fact, static and sterilized. To check against them meant the suspension of the bank,—and its insolvency. They served no purpose except to sterilize and impound that much currency and credit, and the country did not suffer from them except to that extent. There was no need, or public demand for increasing them.

The "Banking Act of 1935" authorized the Federal Reserve Board "in order to prevent injurious credit expansion or contraction" to double these reserve requirements. Obviously there could be no "credit expansion" by doubling the amount of sterilized money and credit, and obviously it meant only to empower the Board to bring about credit contraction. Such delegation of power was wholly unnecessary because the Board had absolute power to expand and contract the volume of currency through the operations of the "open market committee," which involved the power to expand and contract credit, for credit is dependent wholly on the supply of currency to support it. Moreover the Board had fully demonstrated its power to "prevent injurious expansion" in the catastrophes of 1920 and 1930.

Evidently the purpose of this amendment was to provide a new method for bringing about deflation,—a different one from the old plan of refusing loans and advancing the discount rate. The old plan had come to be too thoroughly understood, and discredited by too frequent use. Since Mr. Roosevelt had been elected to correct the evils of the Hoover administration, he could not bring about the same character of deflation in the same manner without the risk of having the whole "Jew Deal" upset by Congress; he must employ a different method and a more subtle technique.

The Federal Reserve Board did not permit this power to remain dormant very long. On August 26, 1936, they advanced these reserve requirements 50%, but the result was not satisfactory to them. On January 30, 1937, they adopted the following resolution:

> "Effective at the opening of business on March 1, 1937, the requirements as to reserves to be maintained by each member bank will be 75 per cent above the requirements prescribed by section 19 of the Federal Reserve Act, and effective at the opening of business May 1, 1937, the requirements as to reserves to be maintained by each member bank will be 100 per cent above the requirements prescribed by section 19 of the Federal Reserve Act."

That did the job, and the Roosevelt depression soon followed and is still on, and prosperity is not "around the corner" as the Elders and their sycophants tell you it is. There is now sterilized and hoarded in the "reserve accounts" of the Federal Reserve Banks the huge sum of $13,863,000,000. This is more than ten times the volume of money we have in circulation. It would furnish a sound basis for at least $70,000,000,000 of credit if this money was in circulation and in the vaults of the member banks. The depression would not have occurred if this money and credit had remained in circulation. It was withdrawn for the purpose of bringing on the depression.

This order of the Federal Reserve Board operates with the greatest severity on the small and weak banks. They, together with all other banks, have been forced by the Roosevelt Administration to subscribe for government bonds, with the result that they are loaded down with U. S. bonds. The government has now taken from them a large percentage of their liquid capital, which has left many of them with insufficient resources to meet the ordinary demands of their customers, or to earn reasonable profits. There is no precedent in other countries for such banking practice and for such abuse of governmental authority.

The "Bank Act of 1935," insofar as it provided for guaranteeing bank deposits, originated in the House and it was limited to that one subject. The amendments were added by Carter Glass when the bill reached the Senate. Glass was on the conference committee between the two bodies and succeeded in putting over these amendments and afterward boasted of the achievement in the press. This ever-faithful servant of the Elders is always on the job with his amendments when there is a banking or currency measure before the Senate, for it is much easier to tack them on to some popular measure than to get them through independently upon their own merit or lack of merit.

We may choose to believe in the good intentions of Mr. Roosevelt and to excuse him for this terrible crime, but we cannot close our eyes to the cold facts. The Federal Reserve Board is wholly of his selection and it has no doubt carried out his express orders. No official appointed by him will dare disobey him; should he do so he would be "fired," for Mr. Roosevelt brooks no opposition.

In one of his press conferences Mr. Roosevelt sought to excuse the order of the Federal Reserve Board on the ground that some unnamed prices were too high and out of "alignment," but even if that be true, it is a silly excuse for bringing such great distress upon the innocent people of the country. The fact is, some prices always have been and always will be out of "alignment" due to supply and demand.

There is this substantial difference between the Wilson 1920 deflation and the Roosevelt 1937 deflation: In 1920 prices and wages were high and money of course correspondingly cheap. We had $3 wheat, $2 corn, 40c cotton, $1.50 to $2 per hour wages, labor was fully employed and scarce.

In 1937 we had been suffering from the Hoover deflation for more than five years; we had spent billions of dollars upon Mr. Roosevelt's recommendations for the pretended purpose of relieving it; there was no substantial relief; prices and wages were still low and labor unemployed; we still had approximately 10,000,000 unemployed, and many millions on the dole. There was absolutely no excuse for the Roosevelt deflation. It was a deliberate effort on his part to wreck the country and to prepare the ground for revolution and dictatorship.

XXIV.

"On Our Way"

(Whither?)

"The political has nothing in common with the moral. The ruler who is governed by the moral is not a skilled politician, and is therefore unstable on his throne. He who wishes to rule must have recourse both to cunning and to make-believe. Great national qualities, like frankness and honesty, are vices in politics, for they bring down rulers from their thrones more effectively and more certainly than the most powerful enemy. Such qualities must be the attributes of the kingdoms of the goyim, but we must in no wise be guided by them."—From Protocol 1.

President Roosevelt, in his inaugural address on March 4th, 1933, said:

"Primarily this [the present depression] is because the rulers of exchange of mankind's goods have failed through their own stubbornness and their own incompetence, have admitted their failure, and have abdicated. Practices of the unscrupulous money changers stand indicted in the court of public opinion, rejected by the hearts and minds of men.

"True they have tried, but their efforts have been cast in the pattern of an outworn tradition. Faced by failure of credit they have proposed only the lending of more money. Stripped of the lure of profit by which to induce our people to follow their false leadership, they have resorted to exhortation, pleading tearfully for restored confidence. They only know the rules of a generation of self-seekers. They have no vision, and when there is no vision the people perish.

"Yes, the money changers have fled from their high seats in the temple of our civilization. We may now restore that temple to the ancient truths. The measure of the restoration lies in the extent to which we apply social values more noble than mere monetary profit , . . and there must be prevision for an adequate but sound currency."

Fine words, very, very fine, and very, very true. This was the program he deliberately promised the people of America in his inaugural address.

This message states clearly conditions that then existed, and the cause and the remedy therefor. There was great rejoicing among the people; for the people, while not understanding the money question, knew in a general way that their destressful situation was due to the corrupt management of our banking and currency system and here was promise of relief.

If the Elders believed the President's sincerity there must have been "weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth" among them, for here was a man, whose election they had brought about, calling them selfish Shylocks and incompetents, and accusing them of responsibility for the deplorable conditions he so graphically depicted, and threatening to destroy their control of the system which had caused so much wreck and ruin.

On the day following the delivery of this splendid speech the farm leaders, John N. Simpson, et at., called on the President and asked him to explain what he meant by the phrase "There must be provision for an adequate but sound currency." The President said, according to press reports, that he meant that the government would exercise its constitutional duty to issue money and control its value, that he would promptly cause enough money to be issued and put into circulation to restore wages and markets and values and prosperity to the country, and give a job to every man in the land who wanted to work.

One of two things is true: either the President did not mean a word of his speech and of his clarifying statement to the farmers, or else he changed his mind on the following day, viz., March 6th. We cannot know which is true. It is difficult to believe that the President of the United States would make such statements with his fingers crossed and for the purpose of deceiving his friends and supporters; but it is equally inconceivable that he would change his mind upon this important subject, upon which he had deliberately spoken after having evidently given it great thought, within the short space of twenty-four hours time.

It is of course possible that Brother Baruch or some of the other Elders interviewed him shortly after the farmers and changed his purpose and his program, but it is not probable. His message turned out to be mere "cunning and make-believe" and it was no doubt intended as such. Whatever the truth may be, on the following day, March 6th, he issued a proclamation closing all the banks of the United States,—state as well as national, and good as well as bad. This was arbitrary, high handed, destructive, and illegal.

Upon the point of its legality he says in his book, "On Our Way," page four, that "a friend of mine (probably Frankfurter) suggested that some of the war emergency legislation of 1917 had not been repealed and found for me a statute of that year covering the point." Even so, such statute could not be applicable to peace conditions, for Congress has no power to suspend the Constitution and laws of the land except as a military measure, and its power even then is limited to military necessity.

Besides, there was then no necessity for the grant or the usurpation or the exercise of such power. The banks of the country were as a rule sound and well managed. The trouble with them was that many of their customers had been bankrupted by an illegal deflation or were near bankruptcy, and as a consequence their collateral had been impaired. It was the direct and intended consequence of the contraction of currency and credit by the Federal Reserve management in 1930. They suffered from the further trouble that there was not enough money in their vaults and in circulation to enable them to pay their depositors in currency. The only place that they could get the money was from the Federal Reserve banks, which had the exclusive power of issue, which it refused to exercise.

The clear remedy therefore was not the closing of the banks and the utter destruction of many of them, but it was for the government to take over the Federal Reserve System or compel it to perform the service for which it was organized, or for the government to exercise its constitutional power to issue and put into circulation a sufficient quantity of money. The obvious and quickest remedy was for the President to remove the Federal Reserve management and appoint one that would discount the eligible paper of the member banks and issue them currency and thereby enable them to meet the currency demands and credit requirements of their customers.

The obvious remedy was to reverse the deflation program of the Federal Reserve System and to bring about just and reasonable inflation through the expansion of currency and credit. The President knew this to be the remedy and he promised to employ it, both in his inaugural message and in his statement to the farm representatives. If he had done so there would have been no occasion or excuse for his extravagant and unconstitutional reforms and his subsequent attack upon the Constitution itself.

My own view is that Senator Long's estimate of the President is correct, and that he did not mean a word of what he said in his message and to the farmers. I think that he intended his so-called reforms from the beginning and that he needed a bewildered and poverty stricken people in order to put them over. As Senator Long so graphically said, it was "high cockalorum Roosevelt and low cockalorum Hoover," the difference between them being only the difference between "tweedledum and tweedledee." Mr. Roosevelt is only a "skilled politician who has recourse to cunning and make-believe."

In 1929 there were more than 30,000 state and national banks. The number had been reduced by deflation to 19,163 in 1932. As a result of this order 4,541 banks or approximately one-third of the remainder were permanently closed and their deposits aggregating $4,356,799,000 were thereby frozen and a large percentage of them lost. (See Comptroller of the Currency Report of 1936, page 112.) The President thus ruthlessly destroyed the property of the several thouand stockholders of the closed banks and of their several million depositors in flagrant violation of law and of our National Constitution, and later boasted of this achievement in his book "On Our Way."

The effect of this order was further deflation, and to make bad matters worse. It froze the life savings of many thousand depositors and transferred them from a state of comfort to one of poverty. They could have been saved, and the country could have been saved the expense of their maintenance, by the mere act of correcting the crime of 1930 in a legal way, viz., by reversing the process by which it had been perpetrated. The worst of it is that the President then knew that this could be done and promised to do it.

This does not tell the whole story. The banks had already been reduced in number by the 1930 deflation (for which President Hoover is justly held responsible) from 30,000 to 19,163. This further reduced the number to 15,806, or about half the number that existed in 1929. The human imagination can scarcely conceive such ruthless and reckless destruction of men and of values and it cannot estimate the injuries that the people sustained. It meant that the fortunes of approximately one-half of the thrifty men and women of the nation were either utterly destroyed or badly impaired;—and the other half did not escape without serious injury.

On January 15, 1934, the President submitted a special message to Congress, as set out in his book "On Our Way," in which he said:

> "Permit me once more to stress two principles. Our national currency must be maintained as a sound currency which, in so far as possible, will have a fairly constant standard of purchasing power and be adequate for the purposes of daily use and the establishment of credit.

> "The other principle is the inherent right of government to issue currency and to be the sole custodian and owner of the base or reserve of precious metals underlying that currency. With this goes the prerogative of government to determine from time to time the extent and nature of the metallic reserve."

John Stuart Mill or his disciple, David Ricardo, could not have stated the orthodox principles of monetary science more clearly and forcefully. The President cannot plead ignorance of the money question, for every message and speech that he has delivered on the subject shows that he understands it. There can be no restoration of values until there is a sufficient volume of money in circulation to support them. That is as certain and as inevitable as the law of gravitation. If this volume of money rests upon the discretion of the Federal Reserve Board then those values will be whatever this Board chooses to make them, and they will be as stable as the mind of the Board is stable.

Prior to the adoption of the Federal Reserve System the basis of our values rested upon the volume of money in circulation, and they were stable because the supply of money, except for hoarding, was stable,—but it has been unstable and erratic since, because it rests wholly upon credit and upon the discretion of selfish and designing men.

What has the President done to give effect to his brave promises? What has he done to wrest the control of our currency system from the Shylocks, charged in his inaugural speech with controlling it, except to leave them in control and to perfect their control ? What has he done toward increasing our currency supply in order to restore employment and prosperity except to further reduce it? What has he done to restore the solvency of our country except to enormously increase debts and taxes? Truly, the Elders have furnished us a ruler of their own kind, a "skilled politician who has recourse to cunning and make-believe," and whose "words do not agree with his deeds."

XXV.

Liars and Thieves

"Gold always has been and always will be the irresistible power. Handled by expert hands it will always be the most useful lever for those who possess it, and the object of envy for those who do not. With gold we can buy the must rebellious consciences, can fix the rate of all values, the current prices of all products, can subsidise all State loans, and thereafter hold the states at our mercy."—From Funeral Oration of Rabbi Reichhorn.

The following is a fac simile copy of page 171 of the report of the Comptroller of the Currency for the year ending Oct. 31, 1938,—which is the latest published report:

"76th Annual Report of the Comptroller of the Currency covering the Year ended Oct. 31, 1938, (page 171).
{Amounts stated in Thousands of Dollars)"

Stock of money in the United States, in the Treasury, in reporting banks, in Federal Reserve banks, and in general circulation, years ended June 30, 1914 to 1938

Year Ended June 30–	Coin and other money in the United States	Coin and other money in Treasury as assets[1]		Coin and other money in reporting banks[2]		Held by or for Federal Reserve banks and agents		In general circulation exclusive of amounts held by reporting banks, Federal Reserve banks and Treasury
		Amount	Per-cent	Amount	Per-cent	Amount	Per-cent	Amount	Per-cent	Per capita
	Millions	Millions		Millions		Millions		Millions
1914	$3,797.8	$ 338.4	8.91	$1,630.0	42.92	.....	.....	$1,829.4	48.17	$18.46
1915	4,050.8	348.2	8.60	1,447.9	35.74	$ 383.0	9.45	1,871.7	46.21	18.56
1916	4,541.7	299.1	6.59	1,472.2	32.41	593.3	13.06	2,177.1	47.94	21.24
1917	5,678.8	269.7	4.75	1,487.3	26.19	1,342.7	23.64	2,579.1	45.42	24.74
1918	6,906.2	363.5	5.27	882.7	12.78	2,061.0	29.84	3,599.0	52.11	33.97
1919	7,688.4	585.1	7.61	981.3	12.76	2,226.7	28.96	3,895.3	50.67	36.67
1920	8,158.5	490.7	6.01	1,047.3	12.84	2,200.2	26.97	4,420.3	54.18	41.50
1921	8,174.5	463.6	5.67	926.3	11.33	2,799.9	34.25	3,984.7	48.75	36.71
1922	8,276.1	406.1	4.91	814.0	9.84	3,406.8	41.16	3,649.2	44.09	33.18
1923	8,702.8	386.5	4.44	777.1	8.93	3,493.0	40.14	4,046.2	46.49	36.20
1924	8,846.5	359.4	4.06	900.8	10.18	3,637.8	41.12	3,948.5	44.64	34.69
1925	8,299.4	363.9	4.38	938.3	11.30	3,120.3	37.63	3,876.9	46.69	33.58
1926	8,429.0	353.2	4.19	975.2	11.57	3,190.5	37.85	3,910.1	46.39	33.35
1927	8,667.3	350.9	4.05	985.1	11.36	3,465.1	39.98	3,866.2	44.61	32.57
1928	8,118.1	351.3	4.33	866.5	10.67	2,970.2	36.59	3,930.1	48.41	32.72
1929	8,538.8	373.1	4.37	799.1	9.36	3,419.4	40.04	3,947.2	46.23	32.47
1930	8,306.6	247.2	2.98	853.8	10.28	3,537.3	42.58	3,668.2	44.16	29.76
1931	9,079.6	254.9	2.81	865.5	9.53	4,002.7	44.08	3,956.5	43.58	31.87
1932	9,004.4	278.2	3.09	774.1	8.60	3,031.1	33.66	4,921.0	54.65	39.41
1933	10,078.4	314.5	3.12	649.9	6.45	4,043.2	40.12	5,070.8	50.31	40.32
1934	13,634.4	2,955.9	21.68	689.6	5.06	5,305.0	38.91	4,683.9	34.35	37.03
1935	15,114.0	2,865.9	18.96	760.0	5.03	6,680.0	44.20	4,808.1	31.81	37.79
1936	17,402.5	2,496.4	14.35	987.7	5.68	8,664.9	49.79	5,253.5	30.19	40.89
1937	19,376.8	3,444.5	17.78	920.8	4.75	9,485.1	48.95	5,526.3	28.52	42.71
1938	20,096.9	2,302.6	11.46	991.5	4.93	11,333.4	56.39	5,469.4	27.22	42.02

[1] Public money in national-bank depositories to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States not included.

[2] Money in banks of island possessions not included.

NOTE.—Population estimated at 123,250,000 in 1930 ; 124,135,800 in 1931 ; 124,881,806 in 1932: 125,753,206 in 1933; 126,485,606 in 1934; 127,233,106 in 1935; 128,475,000 in 1936; 129.399,000 in 1937, and 130, 147,000 in 1938.

Please note the italicized figures opposite the years 1914 and 1938. They give you the detailed estimates of the Treasury Department of our stock of money for these years, and where it is located. You will observe that in 1914 all of the "reporting banks," which means all of the banks of the country except the Federal Reserve banks,—had in their vaults $1,630,000,000; and that in 1938 they had $991,500,000. Thus it appears that the banks had $638,500,000 more money in their vaults when the Federal Reserve system was established, 24 years ago, than they now have.

You will observe also under the last column of figures that they estimate that there was in "general circulation" $1,829,-400,000,—or $18.46 per capita in 1914; and $5,469,400,000 or $42.02 per capita in 1938. You will observe also that they do not count money in the Treasury, in the reporting banks or in the Federal Reserve banks as being in "general circulation."

This method of estimating the money in "general circulation" is obviously true as to money in the Treasury and in the Federal Reserve banks, for these moneys are hoarded and are not subject to check. But it is obviously false as to the moneys in the "reporting banks" for these moneys are subject to check and they pass from the banks daily by check to the people, and are therefore in circulation.

Where is all of this money that they say is in "general circulation" and that they say is over and above the money that is in the Treasury and banks? There is only one place that it can be, to-wit: distributed among the people and in their "tills and pockets." Any man of common sense knows that the people have not now an average of $42.02 in their pockets, and that they did not have an average of $18.46 in 1914. Any man of common sense knows that now, with business stagnant and prostrate, and with half of the people in poverty that they do not now possess more than double the amount of money that they had in 1914, when people generally were prosperous.

The Treasury Department explains this obviously false report by saying that there has been no "corrected statement" of the money in general circulation since 1861 and that their estimate "includes all United States paper money in other lands, all money worn beyond possibility of redemption, and all money lost."

In other words, they count as money in circulation in the United States all moneys issued since 1861, whether in circulation or not. But even this lame explanation does not explain the fact that the moneys in the pockets of the people (according to the official report) have increased from $18.46 per capita in 1914 to $42.02 in 1938,—whereas during the same period the moneys in the banks have decreased from $16.30 per capita in 1914 to about $7.00 in 1938,—which is simply preposterous.

Vast quantities of money have been lost or destroyed by fire, ship wreck, and otherwise, in the 80 years since a "corrected statement" was made; and vast quantities of it are now in foreign lands. The all-important question to you and me is: how much of it is now in the hands of the people of this country?

And that is a matter of supreme importance to us for by all of the accepted authorities the quantity of money that circulates among the people, including the reporting banks determines all values and measures all values. Money is called the "yardstick of values"; the more money the higher values, and the less, the lower. We are entitled to know what that yardstick is, and to have a yardstick that will establish and maintain reasonable values.

Who can say what it is today? One man's guess is as good as another's. The only estimate that has ever come under my observation was made some years ago by a treasury expert by the name of McCoy who estimated it at $440,000,000, which at that time was about $4.00 per capita. It is probably less than that now, for the banks have less now than then, and conditions are much worse now than then, which indicate it.

You can make your own guess. What would you say the people have in their pockets in your town? Let us take for example a town of 1,000 population, with a bank and 20 business houses. It will be composed of about 300 men and women over 21 years of age, and 700 children under 21 years. The 20 business houses may normally have an average of $50 each in their tills, amounting to..... $1,000;
the 300 men and women may have $5 each, or 1,500
the 700 children may average $1 each, or..... 700

A grand total of $3,200; or $3.20 per capita. If we add to that the cash in the vault of the bank, which I estimate at..... 5,000

we have a total volume of money in circulation in the town of ____ $8,200 or $8.20 per capita.

But the Treasury Department does not count as money in circulation the $5,000 in the vault of the bank; they only count as money in circulation that which is in the hands of the people, and estimate it at $42.02 per capita. That estimate is not true and they know it. There is not a town or village or city in this broad land of ours where the people have an average of $42.02 of money in their pockets,—not one.

If their estimate is correct the figures given in the example above would be about fourteen times more. The 20 business men must have an average of $700 each, amounting to—$14,000; the 300 men and women must have an average of $70 each, or ..... 21,000; and all the children, including the babies, must have $10 apiece, or ..... 7,000.

This makes a total of $42,000 or $42 per capita for the people of the town. Would it not be fine if they had it! Talk about "buying power," the people would have it; of our surplus products and poverty and distress, there would be none.

"Oh," but they say, "look at the $50,000,000,000 on deposit in the banks;" the banks are just "bulging with money." That is not money, and even the Treasury Department does not count it as such, it is only bank credit, which must be paid in money.

The banks, according to their sworn statements, only have $991,500,000 of real money with which to pay this 50 billion dollars,—which means that if all of them were called upon at one time they could only pay about 2 per cent of their deposits. They are in a helpless and precarious position, and they do not dare to extend credit liberally; too many of them have been ruined by doing so.

The moneys that measure values are bank notes and silver and gold and silver certificates,—primary money, as they call it. This primary money is our yardstick of value. We are entitled to know what this yardstick is. What is it? They have deceived Congress and the country with lying reports of it, to the very great injury of the people. Let us now have the truth, for "truth is mighty and will make us whole."

This report is true as to the monies in the banks on the respective dates mentioned, for it is based on the sworn reports of all the banks of the United States, which are in turn based on an actual count of the money.

In 1914 the people were prosperous and happy, and the dole and the C. C. C. camps were unknown,—and according to this official report the people then had in their pockets an average of $18.49. Now eleven million of our people are out of jobs, and one-third of our population (according to the President) is poorly housed and clothed and fed, and yet they have in their pockets (as stated by this official report) an average of $42.02.

I do not pretend to understand the trick or the system by which they count money in circulation that is not in circulation, but I do know that the people have not now and have never had an average of $42.02 per capita in their pockets. I assert that we now have in actual circulation less than $12 per capita, of which less than $4 is in the pockets of the people; and that there can never be any enduring prosperity or any stability of credit and values until this basis is broadened by an adequate volume of money in circulation.

This startling fact has been repeatedly called to the attention of the President and many members of Congress, but the lying statements of the Treasury and Comptroller of the Currency have been repeated from year to year since 1920 and accepted as true by Congress and the country. Prior to the creation of the infamous Federal Reserve System true and reliable reports were made. Evidently it is the purpose of the management of the system to deceive Congress and the country, and it has done so to our great injury.

They have recently taken a census of everything we have, including mortgages,—except our money. A census of the volume of money in circulation is the only information of any material importance to us; the other is all "fol-de-rol." A census or an inventory could just as easily be taken of the money in the pockets of the people, and would be of great value. It would show upon what an insecure and flimsy foundation all credit and values rest; it would blast the oft-repeated sophistry that there is plenty of money, that all we need is a little "confidence;" it would clearly reveal the absurdity of all the New Deal rot, for it would reveal the cause of our distress and the remedy therefor; it would, it is to be hoped, cause Congress to take the necessary steps to put in circulation a sufficient volume of money, with adequate measures to keep it in circulation.

If we had $42.02 per capita in actual circulation the prices of all products and wages—the price level—would be approximately that of 1920; we would have no relief rolls and C. C. C. camps, and no curtailment of production; no need for regulation of hours and wages, and no excuse for the destruction of our National Constitution. Instead of being a money and credit expanding system to supply the ever-growing need of expanding population and commerce,—the Federal Reserve System is a vast currency and credit hoarding machine. With its true character and purpose clearly revealed, Congress gratuitously granted it an indefinite charter five years prior to the expiration of the original charter, and by the Bank Act of 1935 gave it carte blanche authority to regulate our welfare.

There can be no stability of values that are dependent wholly upon credit, for there is no foundation for such values other than the will of the creditor. When it is to his advantage to reduce them, thereby increasing the buying power of money, he will do so. It is always to his advantage to have cheap commodities and dear money, and so it is normally that way. Let Congress exercise its constitutional duty and cause an adequate volume of money to be paid into circulation and kept in circulation, and values will adjust themselves to such volume and will be high or low in proportion to the volume, without the operation of an "open market committee" or any other committee.

At the time Hoover left off with his deflation and Roosevelt took over the job, we had in circulation $730,435,000 of national bank notes. By 1936 we had none. All of them had been retired and cancelled by the compulsion of the Roosevelt Administration. (See Report of the Comptroller of the Currency for 1936, page 112.) This meant a cancellation of about $5.50 per capita, or about 50% of the sum of money we now have in circulation. It is but $257,265,000 less than all the banks of the country had in their vaults, of money of all kinds, on June 3, 1936.

If the members of Congress cannot understand this lying deception after reading this very simple explanation of it, let them investigate it themselves. Let them take a census of the money in their respective districts, or better still, let them cause a Congressional investigation to be made of the money in circulation in the United States.

We have, as a matter of fact, about $1,400,000,000, or $11.00 per capita in circulation, composed of $991,500,000 in the reporting banks, and three or $400,000,000 in the pockets of the people, for the money in the "reporting banks" less their legal reserves, is in circulation.

Outside of the banks there is between $3 and $4 per capita in circulation and not $42.02 as they report it. It is utterly impossible to have reasonable prices and wages and prosperity with such a limited volume. China has about $3 per capita, with the inevitable result that her mandarins are exceedingly rich and her peasantry exceeding poor. That is the objective of the "Elders" here in our boasted "land of the free." All of this lying and deception is in accordance with the "law of our bank," viz: the protocols and the code of the communists.

They say that we now have $5,469,400,000 in circulation, or $42.02 per capita. If that were true, which it is not, we clearly haven't enough, for it has been insufficient to lift us out of the depression. We are entitled to have enough money in circulation to do so. Is there any sane reason why this right is denied us?

We now have $20,400,000,000 of gold and about $3,000,000,-000 of silver stored in the United States Treasury vaults in Kentucky and elsewhere. Is there any sane reason why all or the greater part of this money should not be paid into circulation? It would give us more than $150 per capita, restore values and prosperity to the country, and by so doing render useless and unnecessary the entire New Deal with its regimentation. We are like the miser who starves to death while fingering his money and counting it.

It is beyond me to explain how it is possible for responsible treasury officials to make false reports as to the volume of money in circulation from year to year and administration to administration, and how Congress could be deceived by them. But it is obvious that such reports are false, that they are made knowingly and designedly, and that the members of Congress and people generally have been deceived by them. The worst of it is they will not believe the truth even when such falsity is proven beyond controversy. It demonstrates, if demonstration is necessary, the mighty Rothschild power in our government, whether it be a democratic or a republican administration.

The Jews have written several text books on political economy expounding what they call the "qualitative theory of money" in which they assert that gold is the only sound money because of its intrinsic value- If this doctrine is sound we should and would be the most prosperous people of the world because we have 80% of the gold of the world. Thirty years ago we had less than 10% and no dole, no unemployed, and reasonable prices and wages and taxes.

It is another Jewish lie, and propagated for the purpose of deception and injury. In protocol 5 they say:

> "The science of political economy invented by our learned elders has for long past been giving royal prestige to capital."

And so it has. And it has given us the gold standard with its restricted volume of money and credit, and its attendant poverty and misery.

But they claim too much when they say "the science of political economy" was invented by their "learned elders." The true science of money was first discovered by Adam Smith and John Stuart Mill, both of whom were Gentiles. The false qualitative theory was invented by the Jews because until recently they owned and controlled the greater part of the gold of the world and because the gold standard gave them the power to regulate the welfare and destiny of the people of the world.

According to both Smith and Mill all values are fixed and determined by the quantity of money in circulation without regard to its quality. It is the sole and only yard-stick of value. But the Jew economists dispute the truth of this fundamental law, and in support of their argument point to the large volume which they falsely say we have in circulation, but which is not in circulation.

XXVI.

Mismanaged Currency

> "All people are chained down to heavy toil by poverty more firmly than ever they were chained by slavery and serfdom; from these, one way and another, they might free themselves, these could be settled with, but from want they will never get away."—From Protocol 3.

We now have what is called a "managed currency system," with the Rothschild power doing the managing. Make no mistake about that. If it were possible for the people to do the managing the Rothschilds would not want that kind of system. We have had this system since the amendment to the Federal Reserve Act, which took away the right of the member banks to convert their "eligible" securities into currency, and invested the Federal Reserve Board with the discretionary power to issue money.

It is necessary to the success of this system that we have a limited quantity of money in circulation, otherwise they can't manage things; values will find their own level,—as they did prior to said amendment.

With the exception of a few "elder"-manipulated panics, we had a prosperous country up to the date of the establishment of this "managed currency"; we have had the three worst disasters in the history of our country, since. It was the management of our currency system that brought them all about, and that has brought about our present deplorable condition. The worst of it is, they were all brought about designedly, including the present Roosevelt debacle.

It is the Rothschild power that has controlled our financial policy and consequently the welfare of the American people since the Civil War. We call it "Wall Street" but "Wall Street" is only the representative of the Rothschild power. The part of it that is not Jewish is strongly pro-Jewish. Even if that were not true, no financier has ever yet dared to oppose the mighty Rothschild power, and no statesman has ever done so except Abraham Lincoln, and he was murdered.

The "Elders," with their press support, preach a "managed currency," for that is what they want. Congress appears to be sold on it. The very capable and persistent Senator Thomas of Oklahoma had a bill calling for the creation of a "monetary authority" with directions to maintain the price and wage level of 1929. Mr. Eccles, Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, came out against it, arguing that it could not be done,—but it can be done, and he knows it.

It, however, will not be done by an authority that does not want to do it. Mr. Eccles does not want to do it because the Boss does not want it done; Eccles and his board brought the present disaster upon us because the Boss wanted it. The Boss has had this power for four years by virtue of a former Thomas bill,—known as the Thomas amendment, and has not used it except to further deflate, despite the fact that he has repeatedly said that he wanted to restore and maintain the price level of 1929.

We have had enough of managed currency. If we had Jesus Christ to manage our money and establish our price level it might work satisfactorily,—but never with a bunch of Jews in control of it. No man or set of men, Jew or Gentile, are wise enough or good enough to manage our welfare.

If Congress will only repeal the amendment establishing the managed currency system and thereby restore the power to the member banks to discount their eligible paper without limit, the commerce and the people of the country will do all of the managing that is necessary.

But a better plan still is to return to the system that prevailed before the establishment of the Federal Reserve banks. Let Congress resume its constitutional duty to issue money and regulate its value; and let Congress cause to be issued and paid into general circulation $42.02 per capita or more. No man can justly complain of that,—not even the "Elders," for they say it is now in circulation!

I undertake to say that an average of $42.02 in the hand of the people will restore the price and wage level of 1920; that it will automatically do away with the A. A. A., the C. C. C, and all of the other new deal agencies; that it will restore general prosperity to the people of our country, and it may preserve our constitutional government and rescue as from threatened sovietism.

The remedy for our present unfortunate condition is so simple and so plain, that I marvel that our representatives in Congress do not see it and adopt it. They must know that the deflations of 1920 and 1930 and 1937 were all caused by the management of the Federal Reserve system. The obvious remedy therefore is to destroy this system or curtail its power to destroy us.

This system brought about the three catastrophies mentioned, by the contraction of currency and credit. The obvious remedy therefore is to reverse the process and to expand the currency, which will carry with it an expansion of credit. Instead of adopting this remedy they have permitted the system to cancel and withdraw from circulation the greater part of our gold and silver certificates and national bank notes; they have sterilized and buried all of our gold, and much of our silver.

The first step toward recovery and toward peace, prosperity and happiness is to discard our mismanaged currency system; the second is to determine the price and wage level and the volume of circulating medium that the people need in order to pay their debts and taxes and be prosperous; third is to pay such volume into circulation, not in just New York and Chicago, but in such manner as it will reach the people throughout the length and breadth of the land; the fourth is to prohibit the banks and others from gathering in this money and cancelling it or hoarding it; the fifth is to check up on it from time to time and to issue additional currency when required, to take the place of money lost or destroyed or hoarded, and also to cover the increase in population and commerce.

Sad to relate, Congress re-enacted the Thomas Amendment, extending it until June 15, 1941. This bill in substance extends the 2 billion stabilization fund and the authority to purchase gold and silver ad libitum, and empowers the President to issue and pay into circulation 6 billion dollars of money which he refuses to do. In substance it transfers to the President the sole and exclusive power to "coin money and regulate its value," which is the sole and exclusive constitutional duty of Congress.

It was the original purpose of the author of the bill, Senator Thomas, to get into circulation such additional volume of money as would restore prosperity to our stricken land,—as shown from his several speeches on the subject.

But such has never been the purpose of the President, as shown from his administration of the measure. It was his purpose to prevent the issuance of such money by Congress, and the only sure way to do so was to get the power out of their hands and into his own.

The Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry filed an instructive report* pointing out the true and only remedy.

* Congressional Record, 75th Congress, p. 625.

The following are the members of the committee: Messrs. Smith (chairman), Wheeler, Thomas of Oklahoma, McGill, Bankhead, Bulow, Mrs. Caraway, Pope, Hatch, Bilbo, Moore, Schweilenbach, Gillette, Ellender, Norris, McNary, Capper, Frazier and Shipstead. The Committee is composed of ten Democrats, seven Republicans and two Independents. It has among its members some of the ablest men of Congress, whose long records of service have proven them to be the true and reliable friends and champions of the "under-privileged" and of the "forgotten man." This report in substance says to the President of the United States:—Your farm relief bill and your other relief measures are all unnecessary; we have already invested you with the power to restore prosperity to the farmer and to all other classes of our people, and now it is up to you to do what we have authorized and instructed you to do. As to the devaluation of gold the Committee says:

> "The first remedy applied was a monetary one—we went off gold and the dollar was devalued. In 2 months cotton went from 6.35 to 8.95 cents per pound, wheat from 45 to 75 cents, corn from 24 to 46 cents, and wool from 17 to 24 cents. Precisely the same effects had been previously felt in other countries leaving the gold standard, particularly in great agricultural producing countries like Australia, the Argentine, Canada, New Zealand, and Denmark. South Africa, the greatest gold producer in the world, went off gold because the pressure caused by staying on was too great for its agriculture."

The further devaluation of gold will increase the export price of all commodities, for the reason that it increases the supply of gold and thereby cheapens the medium of payment for our exports, but it will only incidentally affect domestic prices. To the extent that our home market for our own product is controlled by the foreign market, it will increase the price of such commodity here, but it will not mean a general increase of our prices and wages. In order to accomplish that end, money must be cheapened in our own country by getting more of it in circulation.

The Committee calls the President's attention to the fact, which he already knew, that the Congress has already invested him with the power to increase prices and wages generally, and to restore employment and prosperity throughout the length and breadth of the land by "(b) open the mints for the free coinage of silver; and (c) have issued additional treasury notes." The President has had this power for the past four years and he has not used it. On the other hand he has employed every power granted him, with one single exception, to further deflate and to thereby carry out the policy which was initiated during the Hoover Administration. The exception is the power granted him to devaluate gold, which he only partially employed.

The delegation of such power to the President by Congress was in violation of Section 1, Art. 8, of the National Constitution, which imposes the duty upon Congress. The President sought this power, and Congress, relying upon his integrity and his good faith, granted it to him. It is evident that Congress would not have granted it except to be used, and it is also evident that the President did not seek it for that puspose. It is also evident that he sought and obtained this delegation of power in order to "head off" Congress and to prevent Congress from relieving the country before he could "put over" his unconstitutional "reforms."

The Committee points out the true and only remedy, as follows:

> "The power over the value of the dollar, now divided among various agencies and departments, public and private, should he coordinated and concentrated in one Federal agency with a definite congressional mandate to such agency to prop erly adjust and regulate the value of the dollar and thereafter to stablilize it at such adjusted value."

Note the language: — "Congressional mandate to such agency to properly adjust and regulate the value of the dollar and thereafter to stabilize it at such adjusted value." That is precisely what the President has so often said in his messages and speeches that he wanted and intended to do. He has said repeatedly that he wanted to fix and adjust it at the 1926 price level, and to stabilize it at that level. And that is also precisely what he has had the power to do for more than four years, but has never yet done, nor taken an intelligent step in that direction.

The report of this committee is so convincing and comprehensive that it deserves to be published in full, but since I am endeavoring to be brief I give space only to the high points of it.

The Committee adopts in part the report of its predecessor on the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1933, as follows:

> "We report these facts and state that no substantial relief is possible for agriculture until the policy of deflation is not only checked but reversed and a substantial sum of actual money is admitted and, if need be, forced into circulation . . .

"We report further that no just, substantial, reliable, or permanent relief can be provided agriculture or any other industry until the money question is considered and adjusted."

The Committee then on its own behalf says:

"Now a new question has arisen, as follows: How cheap should the dollars be made and how high should prices be raised in order to serve the best interests of our people?

"While the dollar was being cheapened and prices were going up, prosperity increased and all were happy. Since last March the dollar has increased in value from $1.13 to $1.19, causing prices to fall, unemployment to increase, depression to come again, and now business of all kinds has slowed down and a new depression is threatened.

"In 1926, during the era of so-called Coolidge prosperity, the dollar was valued in all commodities at 100 cents. In 1929, when the depression came upon the country, the value of the dollar had gone up to $1.05. Today, with much higher taxes and an almost doubled national debt, the dollar value is $1.19.

"The committee is of the opinion and reports that to date we have not cheapened the dollar sufficiently to raise the price level high enough to show sufficient profits upon which taxes are paid to balance the Budget.

"A high price level produces high commodity prices, high wages, high farm income, high national income, and consequently high tax income to the Treasury. A high price.level produces happiness, progress and prosperity. (As true as gospel.)

"A low price level produces exactly the reverse results.

"In 1919, with a high price level, we had incomes and values as follows:

National income	$69,000,000,000
Value of farm property	66,000,000,000
Value of farm income	13,000,000,000
Value of exports	8,200,000,000
Income to Treasury	6,007,000,000

"In 1932, with a low price level, we had incomes and values as follows:

National income	$39,000,000,000
Value of farm property	36,000,000,000
Value of farm income	5,000,000,000
Value of exports	1,600,000,000
Income to Treasury	2,100,000,000

"From the foregoing it is obvious that the price level has a controlling influence upon our domestic economy. The record shows that from 1919 to 1929 we had a price level sufficiently high to permit of the collection of taxes in sufficient sums to not only keep the Budget balanced but, in addition, to reduce the national debt in the sum of $1,000,000,000 per year.

"The committee is of the opinion and reports that the price level is now too low and recommends that existing powers be used and, if necessary, new legislation be enacted for the purpose, among others, of bringing about an increase in such price level to assist the farmers in securing parity prices for their products."

With this clear conception of the one and only remedy by the President and these distinguished Senators, it is difficult to understand or explain why such remedy has not been employed. Indeed, I can find no explanation for it except in the Protocols. This does not imply that the members of this committee or a majority of the members of Congress are the puppets of the Elders. On the other hand I believe in the integrity of Congress as a whole, and in the loyalty and patriotism of this committee. They accepted the President's farm bill as being the best that they could get at this time.

There are many excuses for the members of Congress that do not apply to the President. He and his Administration represent the leadership of the Democratic Party. It is considered mutiny for the members of the party to refuse to follow his leadership. The Republican Party is now so poorly represented in Congress that it can scarcely be called an opposition party.

Moreover, there is the mighty power of the Jewish-owned press to be considered. There is scarcely an editor or columnist who does no decry and ridicule inflation. Many of them do not know what it means, but they do know that their bosses are opposed to it and that they are expected to voice the views of their pay-check. Our members of Congress live, year in and year out, in a political atmosphere created by this "kept" press. They are susceptible to its flattery and fear its ridicule.

Let a congressman stand for the interest of the masses of the people and he is a dangerous demagogue and an irresponsible radical. Let him stand for the program of the "Elders" and he is a great and wise statesman and a profound economist. They have boosted Carter Glass so much that he himself has come to think that he is wise and virtuous and knows more about the money question than John Stuart Mill ever knew. The Elders have made the word "inflation" a by-word and a term of reproach. No congressman will dare confess himself an inflationist. He may not want to be called a deflationist, and he may be willing to be termed a reflationist, but never an inflationist.

The Committee truly said in this report, and it took courage to say it in the Washington atmosphere, "a high price level (inflation) produces happiness, progress, and prosperity; a low price level produces exactly the reverse results." President Roosevelt and Barney Baruch know that is true. President Roosevelt has the power to create the "high price level"; he knows what to do, and how to do it,—but he refuses to act.

He listens to Barney Baruch and his gang, the bunch that financed his campaign, and not to the voice of the people who elected him and who are represented by their congressmen and senators. Barney Baruch's entire argument before the Senate Finance Committee was against inflation; he piously said that if inflation was the only remedy he would favor it, but he knew that it was not, that we had plenty of money waiting for employment and that all we need was "confidence," and he proposed the "new deal" as being the true remedy, outlining the program which the Roosevelt Administration has religiously followed up to this writing.

Congress should either exercise its power to fix and regulate the value of the dollar, or repeal the 10% tax on state bank notes so that the States may do so. If this tax should be repealed each State could issue its own state bank currency and thereby establish its own price level. This was the condition that existed prior to the war between the States.

XXVII.

Bankruptcy

> "Every kind of loan proves infirmity in the State and a want of understanding of the rights of the State. Loans hang like a sword of Damocles over the heads of rulers, who, instead of taking from their subjects by a temporary tax, come begging with outstretched palm of our bankers. Foreign loans are leeches which there is no possibility of removing from the body of the State until they fall off of themselves or the State flings them off. But the goyim States do not tear them off; they go on persisting in putting more on to themselves so that they must inevitably perish, drained by voluntary blood-letting."—From Protocol 20.

If the language of the President in his message to Congress of January 15, 1934, has any meaning at all, it means that the President clearly understands that the Federal government can establish any level of value for money, goods, and service, that it desires, by the employment of its sovereign power to issue money. Every man who has any knowledge of money knows that this is true. It means also that he recognizes that it is the "high prerogative" of government to issue and control the volume and value of money. It means also that he proposed to exercise this "high prerogative" and that he desired the necessary authority for that purpose. He has often expressed his purpose to restore the values of 1929, but has never yet taken an intelligent step in that direction.

Congress enacted the legislation that he desired and recommended. He has been in supreme command for the past seven years. What has he done about it? Has the Federal Reserve System been overthrown or taken over by the government? No. It still operates at the same old stand and in the same old way. Have the values of 1929 been restored and established upon the solid basis of an adequate volume of money? No, no, no; far from it.

In pursuance of the President's message Congress enacted the Connally bill devaluing gold to the extent of 40 per cent, which in terms of dollars increased our stock of gold correspondingly. If this measure had been followed by the increase of currency to the same extent, it would have depreciated the value of money and increased the value of goods and service correspondingly. In other words, it would have increased wages and the value of all products and of all property approximately 40 per cent, and to about the 1929 level.

But not one dollar of additional currency was put in circulation as a result of it. It did, however, increase the value of our export products that must be paid for in gold or its equivalent. Congress also passed the Thomas bill which authorized the President to purchase silver and gold, and which sought to remonetize silver and thereby increase the volume of our circulating medium. The President was authorized by this act to purchase both gold and silver and to pay for the same with gold and silver certificates.

We have bought the huge sum of $8,660,000,000 of gold at $35 an ounce within the past four years, principally from Great Britain and Russia. This gold was worth, prior to its devaluation, $20.67 an ounce. The premium that we have paid for it amounts to $3,500,000,000. The reason we are getting all of it is the fact that we are paying the highest price for it. We are also getting large quantities, sent here for safe keeping, by foreign banks and foreign Jews.

The plan pursued is to sell U. S. bonds and thereby acquire the money to purchase the gold. This necessarily means that our good dollars are sent to Russia, Great Britain and other foreign countries in payment of their useless gold, and to that extent depletes our meager supply of dollars and their meager supply of gold. It should be remembered that this money although sent to foreign countries, is counted by the Treasury Department as being in circulation here and constitutes a part of our $42.02 per capita circulation.

The worst of this operation is that it has saddled the American people with a debt of $8,660,000,00 with an annual interest charge of about $200,000,000. If certificates had been issued against this gold as it was purchased and as was contemplated by Congress, the certificates and gold would offset each other, there would be no liability and no interest charge, and the gold would still be in circulation because the certificate holders could demand it. If certificates should now be issued against it we would have $8,660,000,000 of gold against which there would be $8,660,000,000 of bonds and $8,660,00000 of certificates and we would be out the huge sum of $8,660,000,000 plus interest.

Moreover if certificates had been issued against the gold as purchased there would be that much more money in circulation in the world, and world prices including our own would be higher, precisely to the same extent. As it is, the gold now lies dead and buried. It is of no earthly advantage to us or to the people of the world. The people of the world are poorer to that extent and we are poorer to the same extent plus $8,660,000,000 of bonds; and world prices are lower to precisely the same extent.

Suppose we acquire substantially all of the gold of the world, as appears to be the plan of this regime. Whether it is the plan or not, it is sure to happen if we continue to pay a 41 per cent premium. What then? Obviously we cannot sell our excess products because the people of the world will have no money with which to buy them. Obviously we cannot sell our gold, for the same reason, and for the additional reason that most of the countries of the world already owe us debts that they cannot or will not pay.

Gold must perforce be abandoned as a medium of international exchange and some other medium adopted or else the people of the world must resort to the primitive cumbersome method of barter and exchange of goods. Germany has already been forced to do this very thing and she is doing it so successfully that her people are prosperous. Secretary Hull complains that she has thereby knocked out his reciprocal trade agreements ;—a poor alibi is better than none.

We have bought $1,642,000,000 of silver, issuing silver certificates therefor, which have gone into circulation in the countries from which the silver was bought, including our own. This is in accord with the intent of Congress and of the law, and this is precisely what should have been done in the purchase of gold. These silver certificates would have added to our circulating medium except for the fact that the Federal Reserve management withdrew and cancelled a corresponding volume of Federal Reserve notes.

The net result of the operation of this law is to make a bad situation infinitely worse. We have got $8,660,000,000 of useless gold and issued and sold $8,660,000,000 of bonds that must be paid by the toiling masses. We have $1,642,000,000 of silver certificates but no more money, since they have cancelled the same quantity of Federal Reserve notes. In fact, we have less, for they have sent vast quantities of our money to England and other countries in payment of gold and silver.*

*See Congressional Record, 76th Congress, April 20 and 21 1939, Pages 6366-8 and 6421-5.

This infamous stabilization-fund bill passed the House by a strict party vote; all of the Democrats voting for it and all of the Republicans against it. The party management of the two parties must have "cracked the whip." It appears from the discussion that the Wall Street gang was on hand, as usual on money bills, urging the adoption of the bill. This means that the Rothschild power was behind the bill. If the Republicans had been in power the result would probably have been the same, viz: all of the Republicans would have voted for the bill and all of the Democrats against it. If the Rothschilds had needed a few Republican votes to pass the bill they would have found them.

It is estimated that as a result of the administration of this Act we now have, dead and buried, "sterilized" if you please, the huge sum of about $20,400,000,000 of gold and that we are acquiring it at the rate of $3,276,000,000 per annum. There is left only $7,462,000,000 in the balance of the world. At the rate we are going we will get it all in about two years. What then? Besides this, there is or may be another $2,000,000,000 that Congress gave Morgenthau for the stabilization of foreign exchange. It has passed out of sight; the Lord only knows what he has done with it. He reports that he made $10,000,000 on the purchase of French francs and kindred activities during his four years administration of the fund. If he had paid off government bonds instead of speculating with the fund he would have saved the taxpayers about $240,000,000 in interest. It was charged that he clandestinely loaned the greater part of the fund to England and France; and he very strenuously objected to an audit of it.

If all this money was resurrected and brought to life through putting it in circulation by the payment of government bonds or otherwise, it would not only reduce the national debt about $20,000,000,000 but it would establish a home market for substantially all of our products, restore the full employment of labor, and restore values and the solvency of men and governments, would automatically do away with all of the plausible excuses for the New Deal and there would be no need for Morgenthau's stabilization fund.

The late lamented Arthur Brisbane said of the burial of our cold: "It is enough to make angels laugh to see men of South Africa digging gold out of a hole, and Americans buying and burying the same gold in a hole!"

The President is now proposing to increase the national debt limit from $45,000,000,000 to $49,000,000,000 and to levy additional taxes. His chief aims have been from the beginning to create more debt and levy more taxes and bankrupt the country and he has pursued these aims consistently from the very begining. Our national indebtedness, funded and unfunded, and including appropriations is now more than $70,000,000,000 and it is being increased at a very rapid rate.

It is reported that Roosevelt has created 51 new bureaucratic agencies with the power to legislate, to interpret, and to administer their own rules and regulations. During the seven years of his administration he has received $40,089,857,000 from taxes and spent $65,628,526,000,—leaving a deficit of $25,-538,668,000, which has been funded into bonds. With the exception of the administration of President Wilson the total expenditures of our government from its beginning in 1776 up to the "Jew Deal" have been only $55,265,107,000. Thus it will be noted that he has spent more than $10,000,000,000 in excess of the expenditures of all administrations from Washington's down,—with the single exception of Wilson's. This does not include the money recently authorized for alleged defense purposes amounting to about $17,000,000,000.

President Roosevelt and the Jew kept press and the Jew columnists are now whooping up a war scare. They have already stampeded Congress into authorizing about $7,000,000,000 for armaments when we are now in less danger of invasion by a foreign foe than in the past thirty years. Our most promising prospect is Japan, but she is busy in China and will be exhausted by the time she gets through with that job.

Germany is not even a remote prospect, for she is no longer ruled by Jews. Germany, even if she conquers Britain, will likely create a United States of Europe, which they said was their objective. It will be less aggressive than a United States of Europe under Jewish control for the German people are an industrious, home-loving, peaceful people, who acquire wealth by creating it, and not by manipulation of currencies and markets, as do the Jews.

Germany has never acquired or sought to acquire a foot of soil in our country, as have both Britain and France. She could not be more of a bully as mistress of the seas than Great Britain has proven herself to be.

Great Britain has, in flagrant violation of international law, declared a blockade of the entire world, from the Arctic Circle to Africa, to prevent the possibility of suppiles reaching Germany. She has announced that she would not even allow the shipment of food to the famine-stricken people of Europe. This is all manufactured war hysteria for the purposes of getting more money to be squandered, and of bankrupting our country and of creating a dictatorship of the proletariat and of continuing Franklin D. Roosevelt in office as our dictator. It is either for these purposes or for intervention in the present war. IT IS NOT FOR DEFENSE.

Our national government and many of our city governments are now bankrupt. They have reached their limit of taxation. Real estate has become more of a liability than an asset and much of it has been sold for taxes. The national government has levied a heavy income tax on undistributed profits which is stifling small industries, retarding the expansion of the large ones, and discouraging the creation of new ones. And now they have made a flat increase of the rate that will crush many of the small industries. But few people care to invest in a new industry, assuming all the risk of loss if it is a failure, when the government will get most of the profits if it is a success.

President Roosevelt stated the situation that prevailed at the time of his election, on page 62 of his book "On Our Way," as follows:

> "In talking with people about our basic economic troubles I have often drawn for them a picture showing two columns, one representing what the United States was worth in terms of dollars and the other representing what the United States owed in terms of dollars. The figure covered all property and all debts, public, corporate and individual. In 1929, the total of the assets in terms of dollars was much larger than the total of the debts. But, by the spring of 1933 while the total of the debts was still just as great, the total of the assets had shrunk to below that of the debts.
>
> "Two courses were open: to cut down the debts through bankruptcies and foreclosures to such a point that they would be below property values; or else to increase property values until they were greater than the debts. Obviously, the latter course was the only legitimate method of putting the country back on its feet without destroying human values."

That condition is infinitely worse today. There has been no increase of our property values, but there has been a very great increase in our debts and taxes. Our situation is now more critical than ever before in the history of our country. Our national wealth is now estimated at about $250,000,000,000, which is too high, and our aggregate debts are estimated at about the same figure. We are insolvent and on the brink of a debacle. This is all in accord with the protocols and the code of the communists ; "the law of our bank."

The only remedy is the cancellation of all bonds and mortgage debts. This can be done either by inflation or by law. The former is the method adopted by the Jews when they were in control of the German government, is the less painful, and therefore the best. The protocol quoted above says in substance that "debts are leeches" but that we haven't sense enough to "tear them off;" that if we do not do so we will "inevitably perish by voluntary bloodletting." The latter statement is true, but let us hope that we do have sense enough to "tear off the leeches" before it is too late to save ourselves and our government.

It is but just that these bonds and mortgages should be cancelled. They are owned largely by the Rothschild and other Jew institutions. They—the Rothschilds and their lackeys—have robbed us of our substance and exhausted our resources and forced us to borrow their money.

The cancellation of debts is by no means a novel experiment. It was adopted by the rulers of Rome and Greece, and history records the fact that by reason thereof the lives of both of these empires were prolonged. The Jews themselves had their "jubilee" year every fifty years, when they cancelled all mortgage debts and freed those of their own race who had themselves become bonded by debt.

XXVIII.

Poverty and Despair

> "The aristocracy, which enjoyed by law the labour of the workers, was interested in seeing that the workers were well fed, healthy and strong. We are interested in just the opposite —in the diminution, the killing out of the Goyim. Our power is in the chronic shortness of food and physical weakness of the worker because by all that this implies he is made the slave of our will, and he will not find in his own authorities either strength or energy to set against our will. Hunger creates the right of capital to rule the worker more surely than it was given the aristocracy by the legal authority of kings. By want and the envy and hatred which it engenders we shall move the mobs and with their hands we shall wipe out all those who hinder us on our way."—From Protocol 3.

In the administration of law we are conclusively presumed to intend the consequences of our acts. This standard applies to all of us, high and low, rich and poor, male and female, black and white; it is universal. We cannot commit murder or theft and be heard to say that our intentions were good. If this standard be applied to President Roosevelt—(and why should it not?)—we must conclude that the President has intended and still intends to bankrupt the government and people of the United States; to destroy local self-government and to create a Super-Government having sovereign power over all the activities of the people, intra-state as well as inter-state.

Why should the President do these wicked and terrible things to us, his trusting friends? Why such evil designs, and why does he pursue them so ruthlessly and so relentlessly ? Why, oh why, does he preach the right remedy and adopt the wrong one? If the Protocols and the designs of the Elders are not the answer, then what is it?

I can find but one answer, namely, the Protocols, and the program of the Elders who financed his campaign and brought about his nomination for the presidency. They want a dictatorship and must have it in order to destroy our government and to establish their kingdom. A contented, happy people will not tolerate war except as a defensive measure, but a poverty stricken, discontented, restless people are ready for any change. Really, war, as destructive and horrible as it is, is not much worse than peace with deflation accompanied by its want and misery and degradation.

If war should be declared then all of the President's reforms, including the regimentation of industry, agriculture, and labor, would be legal and defensible as war measures and there would then be no need for packing the Supreme Court. The President would then be our dictator or king, and in his glory.

In his message to Congress, Jan. 3, 1940, the President said:

> "You are well aware that Dictatorships have originated in almost every case in the necessity for drastic action to improve internal conditions where democratic action has failed to respond to modern demands."

There are two routes to a dictatorship: one is poverty and despair and the other is war. The war road led to the dictatorship of Stalin and the very recent one of Winston Churchill; and the poverty route to the dictatorships of Hitler and Mussolini.

President Roosevelt has been pursuing both routes. He and the "kept" press have neglected no opportunities to create a war sentiment and at the same time he has been diligently and relentlessly paving the way for a dictatorship of the proletariat through poverty and distress. There may be some relief from it for a short period of time because of the huge expenditure on government armaments but the underlying conditions remain and our escape will only be temporary. Sooner or later there will be a revolt of such proportions in the form of strikes or otherwise as will enable the President to declare an emergency and himself as dictator.

The following is a comparative statement of the value of our money with that of other leading commercial nations:

FOREIGN EXCHANGE RATES

(Value of foreign currencies in terms of dollars and cents)

	1929	1940
England (pound)	$4.86	$3.15
France (franc)	.039	.17 3/4
Canada (dollar)	.99	.7880
Argentina (peso)	.95	.2260
Mexico (peso)	.48	.1690
Japan (yen)	.46	.2348

The 1929 column represents the comparative values when we had reasonably high prices and wages and a reasonable degree of prosperity. The 1940 column represents the value when we have low prices and wages and 10,000,000 unemployed men.

The explanation is simple. It will be observed that our dollar is more than double the value of most foreign currencies. This necessarily means that the foreigner must pay $2 of his money to buy $1 of our products as measured by our money. It means also that he will buy from other countries that can supply him with the same products whose money is near a parity with his own and where he will not be required to pay this premium.

Conversely it means that the Jewish importers—and practically all of them are Jews—can buy $2 of foreign goods with $1 of our money. It means also that the foreign manufacturer can manufacture his goods at approximately half the cost of ours because he pays for his raw material, labor, taxes, etc., with cheaper money. It means also that the importer can sell the imported article at a less price than it can be produced in this country.

To illustrate further: With wheat at $1 per bushel a Canadian dollar would have bought one bushel of our wheat in 1929, it will now buy slightly more than three-fourths of a bushel; two Mexican pesos would have bought practically a bushel, it now requires six pesos; an Argentina peso would have bought a bushel, it now takes four; two Japanese yen would have then bought a bushel, it now takes four. The worst of it is that these two Japanese yen could in 1929 have bought a bushel of Argentine wheat, but now they can buy four bushels, which means that they will buy Argentine wheat in preference to ours.

Congress extended the life of the Hull reciprocal trade program by a strict party vote; a majority of the democrats voting for the extension and all the republicans against it. This means that the American producer cannot have the advantage of even his home market. It also necessarily means his bankruptcy and the unemployment of labor. These two New Deal policies taken together will drive the final spikes in the coffiin of the American producer, whether farmer or manufacturer. They are fine things for the comparatively few Jewish importers, but they will complete the ruin and destruction of the American farmer, industrialists and laborers. They pave the way for the dictatorship of the proletariat, and they were intended for that purpose. The following lines from an unknown author describe present conditions:

"Mr. Roosevelt is my shepherd
And I am in want;

He maketh me to lie down on park benches,
He leadeth me beside still factories,
He disturbeth my soul.
He leadeth me in the paths of destitution for his party's sake.
Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of the depression
X anticipate no recovery, for he is with me;
His policies, his diplomacies, they frighten me;
He prepareth a reduction in my income,
And in the presence of mine enemies
He anointeth my small income with taxes.
My expenses runneth over,—
Surely, unemployment, want, and poverty shall follow me all the days of my life
And I shall dwell in a mortgaged home forever."

It is likely that the reciprocal trade agreements will not prove to be as injurious as they were intended to be. Der Fuehrer has cancelled by conquest the agreements negotiated with France, Belgium, Poland, Czecho Slovakia, Holland, and Luxembourg.

No matter what the outcome may be the ominous fact is that we now have, and will in the future have, a very limited market for our surplus products, for three reasons: (1) We have alienated most of the countries of Europe and Asia by boycotts and threats of war; (2) they have no gold or American dollars with which to pay; (3) they will be forced to adopt and will adopt a different currency system that will render our hoarded gold useless. Dorothy Thompson stated in one of her syndicated articles that Hitler plans to establish the "United States of Europe," to destroy tariff barriers and to create an independent currency system. It is the logical result of our ownership of 80% of the gold of the world.

There are also two kinds of dictatorships: the one of the Gentile called "fascist," such as the dictatorships of Italy and Germany which were brought about to preserve law and order and the rights of property, and as a protection against the usurpation of the commune. The other, the dictatorship of the Jew, called "communism," such as that of Russia, and more recently of England. The latter is a destructive type of dictatorship,—destructive of law, religion, and freedom, and accompanied by all forms of lawlessness and murder; the latter is Semitic, the former is anti-Semitic.

The excuse for Churchill's dictatorship was the Norway disaster, but it was only an excuse, for Churchill himself was responsible for the disaster and not Chamberlain. The Churchill appointment precipitated the attack on Holland and Belgium which may result in the destruction of the British Empire, but Churchill will continue as dictator despite the disaster, so long as the Jews can keep him there. He has faithfully followed the program of Stalin. His first act was to imprison all anti-Semitics, classing them as "Fifth Columnists," and now he has provided for the death penalty for them. The last report we have is that they are secretly trying Sir Oswald Mosely, which means that he will be convicted and condemned to death, otherwise there would be no occasion for secrecy.

Under the pretense of meeting a grave emergency, viz: a threatened invasion by Germany, President Roosevelt sent a message to congress asking that the bond limit be increased and that additional taxes be imposed. Congressman Andrew Anderson of Minnesota naively observed that this is the sixty-third emergency that has confronted this administration.

The President told Congress in substance to enact this legislation and turn the money over to him to spend and then adjourn and go home; that they couldn't do anything but talk and that they might be in his way. A subservient Congress has already increased the income tax a flat 10%, and provided for a large increase of the tax rate of the little taxpayer, and a small increase of the big one, and they have voted to increase the bond limit from 45 to 49 billion dollars. But the republicans have led a revolt against adjournment and it has been postponed for a time at least.

Germany financed the building of the greatest mechanized war machine in the history of the world without gold and without bonds. With 80% of the gold in the world and the greatest resources of any country, Mr. Roosevelt must have $4,000,000,000 of bonds and an approximate 40% increase in income taxes in order to even make a start. What the bonds and taxes will be by the time he is through no man can foresee. He has not yet even made a suggestion to lighten the tax burden by cheapening the dollar. He is not likely to do so for the simple reason that such act would automatically abolish his W. P. A. and other hand-outs, jeopardize his campaign fund and his dictatorship prospects.

The Wilson administration financed the last war, plus the gifts to the Allies of about $15,000,000,000, with bonds. This was wholly unnecessary and a colossal crime against the American people but we can give that Administration credit for a little breathing spell of about eighteen months of cheap money. Mr, Roosevelt does not propose to give us any respite whatever. His evident purpose is to hold our "feet to the fire" until we are ready to concede him all the power he covets.

As desperate as our financial situation is now, this Administration can finance the whole armament program by simply cheapening the dollar. Mr. Roosevelt knows that this is true, and many members of Congress know it is true. We can pay the bonded indebtedness of $45,000,000,000 plus $10,000,000,000 for armaments with gold certificates having a 40 % gold reserve, which according to all of the orthodox authorities is more than sufficient. Such act would afford instant and complete relief to all of the impoverished people of this stricken land, for it would cheapen money to the extent that they could pay their debts and taxes.

All of the pending bills will place the burden on the poor who do not want war but who must do the fighting. The cheapening of money would put it on the rich, many of whom want war and will profit by it, and few of whom will do any fighting. Unfortunately, the richest of them will escape taxes in any event through their ownership of government tax-exempt bonds and their stock-selling devices.

And now the President proposes that the R. F. C. be authorized to lend the South American countries $500,000,000 against the products of their farms and ranches in order to impound them and to keep them from being sold to Germany. This is just a starter; it is only a white chip. It will require many times that amount and then the scheme will be a failure.

The people of the several countries of South America will not sell us their products unless it is to their advantage to do so. That is a cinch. Germany can and will pay more for them than we can afford to pay. That is also a cinch. It is true we have more gold than Germany, but Germany can manufacturer goods cheaper than we can. That is another cinch. In the last analysis international trade is an exchange of goods. Gold is only the medium of effecting such exchange.

Germany has no bonded indebtedness and we are mortgaged up to the limit "and then some." Our national, state and city governments and our railroads, farms and industries are heavily mortgaged and these mortgages must be paid in interest and taxes. About one-half of our cost of production is composed of interest and taxes. We can't compete with the producers of a country that is free of such burden. We must cancel our debts or we perish. We must free the people from the slavery of debt. There is no other way.

XXIX.

America Enters the War

> "In a word, to sum up our system of keeping the government of the goyim in Europe in check, we shall show our strength to one of them by terrorist attempts and to all, if we allow the possibility of a general rising against us, we shall respond with the guns of America or China or Japan." —From Protocol 7.

The President has at last inveigled us into war. Without authority from Congress and with Congress in session, he authorized the War Department to transfer vast quantities of our arms, munitions, and war equipment to private corporations for the express purpose of being re-sold by them to the Allies, and thereby evading the law. This was done in order to avoid the agreements of the Hague convention of 1907 and the United States Neutrality Act of 1918 which made it illegal for a nation not at war "to furnish any belligerent with troops, ships, munitions of war, money, or with commodities of direct or indirect use in war." These laws apply to nations and not to individuals, and hence this miserable subterfuge.

A few days later, to-wit: on June 10, 1940, President Roosevelt said in a speech at Charlottesville, Va., "We will extend to the opponents of force (the Allies) the material resources of this nation." He thus boldly proclaimed that he would do openly what he first sought to do by indirection and subterfuge. In flagrant disregard of international law and of our own solemn treaty and of our own neutrality law, he pledged without limit the resources of this nation to the Allies. This includes arms, munitions, money, ships, food and supplies of every kind and character that may be required. It means that he has on behalf of our nation, assumed the burden of supporting the war of England when we ourselves are on the verge of bankruptcy, if not bankrupt.

In its ultimate consequences it means much more than that. General Hugh S. Johnson said of the first clandestine transfer of our war supplies: "This is no action short of war. It is war. In defiance of Congress and of the constitution the President by a slick trick . . . has committed us to war." And now he has the cold nerve to boastfully proclaim it to the world. The next step will be to send our ships with munitions and supplies and convoys to the Allies; and the next will be our soldiers; and then as surely as night follows the day, the next will be the destruction of our government, the loss of our liberties, and a dictatorship.

A few days later Roosevelt said in response to an appeal from Premier Reynaud for more help, that he was "doing everything he could for them and that he would continue to do so as long as they would hold out; but that Congress alone had authority to declare war." This promise plainly encouraged them to fight to the bitter end, and told them that they can depend on him for everything in his power, except a declaration of war, for the reason that he was without that authority.

Mr. Churchill explained this appeal to the House of Commons in a speech a few days later. He said that when Reynaud informed him that it would be necessary for France to surrender, he avdised Reynaud to appeal to President Roosevelt to now enter the war. What right had either of them to assume that Roosevelt would declare war on their request? Reynaud did appeal and when Roosevelt said he could do no more at this time but advised him to continue the fight,—then it was that France surrendered. Paul Reynaud and his backer, Georges Mandel (Jeroboam Rothschild) then fled the country to escape the wrath of an outraged and deeply injured people.

Now Britain is facing certain defeat with great destruction of life and property. Churchill, Duff-Cooper and Anthony Eden have repeatedly spoken to the English people over the radio in order to allay their fears and resentment. They have promised them that America would soon actively join them and have encouraged them to fight until this help arrives.

Why all of this reliance on America if there has been no promise of help? It all goes back to the peaceful settlement at Munich when Roosevelt led the chorus of "never another Munich." It goes back to the pledges of Bullitt and Kennedy to Poland, France, and England.

The radio commentator, Edwin C. Hill, stated that Roosevelt actually conferred with a few of his friends about himself declaring war, with Congress in session! They no doubt advised against it, and wisely so.

"Upon what meat doth this our Caesar feed,
That he is grown so great?"

Congress is now at last evidently afraid of him, for after having tentatively agreed to adjourn on June 22nd the decision was revoked.

We are now at war with Germany and Italy. This war may be extended later to Japan and Spain. Russia may keep out of it in order to be better prepared to administer upon the wreckage when the warring countries are exhausted. We now have in prospect the universal war for which the "Learned Elders of Zion" have been scheming and working since they failed to establish their Super-Government through the League of Nations. It may result in the kingdom of the "Despot of the blood of Zion" with Roosevelt or Jeroboam Rothschild as such "King-Despot."

The President has already practically assumed the office of dictator, with only an occasional protest from Congress. He has led us into war, with Congress in session, and despite the recent assurances of the majority of the members of Congress that under no circumstances would they permit our country to become involved in the present war except for defense upon our own shores.

It was recently reported in the press that a contract had been made with the Ford Motor Company to manufacture airplane engines for the British Empire and America. Mr. Henry Ford denied the report. He said that his company was willing to make these engines for the defense of America but not for the prosecution of the war by the British. Mr. Knudsen, on behalf of the "Council for National Defense," answered that the contract involved making engines for both governments, and the Committee cancelled the contract because of Mr. Ford's refusal to manufacture engines for the British Empire.

This controversy reveals the following facts: (1) That our alleged "Council for National Defense" is now engaged in buying war equipment for the British Government; (2) that they are more interested in buying for the British Government than for ourselves; (3) that they are making these purchases for the joint account of the United States and the British Governments; (4) it is a fair inference from these facts, that this Committee will make payment for this equipment out of the $5,000,000,000 fund that Congress has provided for that purpose. Thus it appears that we are being taxed to the point of confiscation of property, to support the tottering British Empire and the Rothschild family fortune.

We are in. Make no mistake about that. And we will stay in until our government is destroyed, if Franklin D. Roosevelt is continued in office. And we are not in for the defense of our country; we are in for its destruction.

It is now reasonably clear that England will soon be taken by the Germans,—but that may not end the war. It would end it except for our intervention. It was Churchill himself who said that we did the Allies more harm than good in the last war, because by entering it we delayed the peace for two years. He criticized us for then doing what he now begs us to do. Our entering the war would now do the people of the British Empire more harm than good, for many of them and their possessions will be destroyed if the war is prolonged.

The Senate Naval Affairs Committee, of which Senator David Walsh of Massachusetts is chairman, investigated the rumor that our government had transferred 23 of our war vessels to Great Britain. Mr. Lewis Compton, acting Secretary of the Navy, at first denied that such transfer had been made, but later admitted it; he admitted also that the vessels were not obsolete, and his own responsibility. When the President was advised of this, he contradicted Mr. Compton and informed the committee that he alone was responsible for the transfer. This was probably done in order to prevent further investigation and to save further disclosures.

This transfer is in plain violation of Chap. 30 Title V 3, 40 Stat. 222, U. S. C. A., which prohibits the transfer of a war vessel to a belligerent nation. The President again violated the law by giving Britain 50 of our destroyers with their guns and ammunition and that cost us more than $100,000,000.00,—as proposed by "Sir" John Pershing- This was a pretended exchange for air bases, at first denied but later justified on the ground that it was a good trade. The consideration paid for these 99-year leases of a few thousand acres of cheap land is o grossly exorbitant that it can only be considered a gift and an under-cover entry into the war. This was done by our dictator without the consent of Congress, and with Congress in session. It is either a flagrant violation of our own law, punishable by fine and imprisonment, or it is war. If we are in fact engaged in war with Germany and Italy it is legal and defensible, otherwise it is not. It is evidently intended by the President as an under-cover, back-door entry into the war.

Mr. Churchill recently stated in a speech in the House of Commons that in case Hitler invaded and conquered England that the government would move to Canada and with our help they would continue the fight. In anticipation of such contingency the President made a trip to Canada a few years ago and there made a speech in which he assured the Canadians that the United States would extend the Monroe Doctrine to Canada and would protect them.

This was an unprecedented and unwarranted and unauthorized extension of the Monroe Doctrine. It was never intended to apply to any part of the British Empire, but only to the weak and defenseless countries of South America. It was to prevent future foreign absorption of South America. When this doctrine was first announced Canada was a part of the British Empire and was accepted as such.

It is obvious that this assurance on the part of the President was a premeditated one, in pursuance of a carefully premeditated plan, and in anticipation of the war that the "Elders" then planned and that we now have. They "planned it that way."

They have been preparing the ground for this war for many years. It is evident that Mr. Roosevelt has participated in this conspiracy. That is the explanation of the New Deal with all of its regimentation, the purchase of the gold and silver of the world, the stabilization fund, the extension of the Monroe Doctrine, and of his frantic desire to get us into the war.

If Mr. Hitler is the blood-thirsty, ambitious villain that the Jew press represent him to be, he will declare war on us and he will do it now while we are unprepared and unarmed. He will not wait two or three years until we can gear up our industries and replenish our depleted war equipment. He has more sense than that; he will do it now while he is ready and we are not.

The Mexican government is a vacillating unreliable one that is sometimes friendly to us and sometimes not, according to their interest of the moment; the same is true of Brazil. Offered sufficient inducement, either of them will turn against us. President Vargas recently made a speech in which he in substance welcomed the new order that would accompany German victory and would supplant the decaying civilization of Britain and France, as he described them.

He may be right about it, for they both have the "Jew-rot," which is a combination of graft, bribery, and of great wealth and great poverty. Their inefficiency in war is due primarily to this disease. We suffer from the same cancerous disease gnawing at our vitals, and we will suffer the same fate if we do not eradicate the germs of it.

It is at least a possibility that Brazil will welcome Hitler. In that case, what will become of the steel plant we propose, according to press reports, to build in that country? (Ostensibly, of course, as a defensive measure.) There is now pending in Congress a bill with administration support, to enlarge the powers of the R. F. C. in order to enable it to furnish the required capital. There appears to be no constitutional limitation whatever upon the activities of this vicious administration of our government and of this vicious corporation.

It is at least debatable whether we are justified in going to war to enforce the Monroe Doctrine, and particularly to protect a state that does not ask or want our protection. If it is our fixed policy to enforce this doctrine then we should ourselves respect it.

The Monroe Doctrine demands America for Americans.—but concedes Europe for Europeans, and Asia for Asiatics. That is the present position of Japan and Germany and Italy. Japan proposes to enforce it in Asia; Hitler and Mussolini in Europe. However much we may wish to preserve the status quo in the East Indies and the British Empire, it is none of our affair, and there is nothing we can do about it except to go to war and probably destroy ourselves.

> The people of these countries can solve their own problems in their own way, as they have heretofore done,—without our help. Our position should continue to be—as it has always been into maintain friendly relations with whatever governments they establish.

It must be conceded that both Hitler and Mussolini have ample provocation for war. The President has called them names and made faces at them. He said of Mussolini that he was an assassin who "stabbed his neighbor in the back,"—but if he had declared himself on the side of the Allies he would have had the benedictions of the President. It is not incumbent on them to declare war on us, for we first begun war on them by pledging our unlimited support to the Allies. Mr. Roosevelt declared an economic war on Germany more than a year ago by his boycott; and challenged Hitler to arms by withdrawing our Ambassador.

I do not believe that Hitler wants to make war on us or wants anything on this side of the Atlantic Ocean. He certainly does not want our Jews, and he has managed to get along very well without our gold. If we should make the mistake of re-electing Roosevelt for a third term, he may construe this as a ratification of Roosevelt's war-like demonstrations and he may conclude that war is inevitable sooner or later. In that case he may accept Mr. Roosevelt's challenge and wage it while we are unprepared.

No matter what opinion we may have of Mr. Hitler, we must concede that he has been forced into this war; that he was ready to make peace on the basis of restoring to Germany the territory wrongfully taken from her by the peace treaty; and that he has conducted the war according to the rules of civilized warfare.

Mr. Hitler has stated on many occasions that this war is primarily with the Jews, whom he holds responsible for it. They have now been overthrown in all of the countries of Europe except England, their ancient stronghold.

The are now fleeing to this country from all of Europe and our Jew administration has, in violation of law, opened wide our ports to them. They expect to continue their war from here. They have already responded with "the guns of America" and they are working over-time to get our boys into it. They understood their power over our government better than we Americans, for none of us believed they could involve us.

XXX.

Skulduggery

> "By our intrigues we shall tangle up all the threads which we have stretched into the cabinets of all States by means of the political, by economic treaties, or loan obligations. . . . In this way the peoples and governments of the goyim, whom we have taught to look only at the outside of whatever we present to their notice, will still continue to accept us as the benefactors and saviors of the human race."—From Protocol 7.

Why have we entered this destructive war upon the losing side? War involves great sacrifice and suffering. It is never justified except for self-defense. The warmongers seek to justify it upon that ground. They tell us that the British navy is our first line of defense. It has never been so used, and neither we nor Great Britain have so regarded it heretofore. But even if that were true it would be far cheaper and more dependable for us to provide our own navy. That is precisely what the government is now proposing to do and for which it has authorized immense appropriations. If our own country is in danger of attack the place to defend it is in our own waters and on our own shores and not in foreign waters and on foreign shores.

On June 10, 194,0, there was published in all the leading newspapers of the country a full page advertisement over the signatures of about thirty well known Americans, headed by William Allen White of Emporia, Kansas, with the flaring headline, "Stop Hitler Now." It was followed by an argument advocating our immediate entry into the war. According the press reports, Mr. Roosevelt read the advertisement "and found it to be a great piece of work and extremely educational for the people of the country." Yes, a "great piece of work and extremely educational" for war. This advertisement was paid for by the Rothschild banks of Morgan & Co., Kuhn, Loeb & Co-, and their affiliates.*

There are very obvious reasons why "our bank" would like to get America into war.

Until recently the argument was made that we should enter the war on behalf of France because she helped us in our war for independence against Great Britain. This was also one of the arguments for our entering World War I, which resulted so disastrously for the entire world. This argument, however, no longer obtains, since England is now at war with France.

* Congressional Record, July 11, 1940, p. 14359-14360.

False Albion treacherously turned upon her former ally, France, and destroyed many of her ships and killed more than 1200 of her seamen. The battle, if it may be so dignified, is thus described by the magazine "Time" :

> "In the night of July 2-3 (1940) at various ports of England and Scotland, armed parties of British officers and men quietly boarded all major French ships berthed with the home fleet, mostly at Portsmouth and Plymouth."

They were not able to do this at Oran, which is in French waters, and so they slipped up in the night and mined the waters around the French ships while they were riding peacefully and unsuspectingly at anchor. The British commander then demanded their surrender and upon being refused opened up a murderous fire without warning that destroyed and damaged a number of French ships and killed 1200 men. The British sustained no losses for the reason that the French did not expect an attack by their former ally, their ships were not steamed up and consequently they were in no position to maneuver their guns and to fight.

This was another great British victory (?) and so hailed by the Jew press of England and America. It was another Altmark victory. The only two British victories in this war to date have been against an unarmed foe and in violation of the rules of civilized warfare. No savage would have attacked a prostrate friend without provocation.

French Foreign Minister Baudouin said of it: "Mr. Churchill is guilty of an act of aggression, which is without precedent in the history of the world;" that Britain "must shoulder the blame for the loss of the war for she selfishly thought of the defense of the British Isles and provided only a minimum military aid to France." He later stated that France had furnished three million men and Britain only two hundred thousand.

Baudouin said further that "the British saved four-fifths of their troops from Flanders, embarking them from Dunkerque, while the French lost half of their forces; that the British furnished only 14,000 troops for rear guard operation and the rest of the 200,000 were French." He might have added that the French lost 1,900,000 men in killed, injured and prisoners, which is nine times the number of soldiers furnished by Britain, and more than forty times British casualties.

And now the British have several French ships bottled up in the French Martinique port. Our government has sent four of our destroyers down there. What for? Is it to help our traditional friend and ally, the French? No, no, far from it. Why should we turn against the country that helped us win our independence? A little while ago it was said we owed it to France and to LaFayette to help her. And now she is our enemy? Why? Can it be because the French government refused to allow the city of Paris to be destroyed in order to get us into the war? Can it be because France surrendered after the loss of two-thirds of her army? No, no. These are not the reasons. Whatever the true reason may be we have not entered this war to help France.

We do not yet know the whole truth about all of this war propaganda and the President's activities to involve us in the war, but some of it has come to light. When Germany captured Warsaw, the capital of Poland, she also captured the official archives, and among them a transcript of the negotiations between our government and the Polish government leading up to the war.

It appears therefrom that our ambassador to France, the Jew Bullitt,—just before sailing for Paris "with a whole trunkfull of instruments and conversations and directions from President Roosevelt and the State Department and senators who belonged to the Committee on Foreign Affairs,"—held a conference with the Polish Ambassador (to the U. S.) Count Potoki. This conference was reported by Count Potoki to his government in part as follows:

> "3. It is the decided opinion of the President that France and Britain must put an end to any sort of compromise with the totalitarian countries. They must not let themselves in for any discussions aiming at any kind of territorial changes.
>
> "4. They have the moral assurance that the United States will leave the policy of isolation and be prepared to intervene actively on the side of Britain and France in case of war. America is ready to place its whole wealth of money and raw materials at their disposal."*

It appears further from these official notes that the President was quite urgent that Poland should reject Germany's demand for return of the Danzig Corridor and that Britain and France should support Poland in this position and should declare war on Germany if she (Germany) undertook to take it by force. Beck refused to keep his engagement with Hitler. This was followed by Hitler's invasion of Poland and a declaration of war on the part of Britain and France against Germany, as pointed out in a previous chapter.

*Congressional Eecord, July 11, 1940, p. 14371.

Thus it appears that President Roosevelt is himself primarily responsible for the war. We can now understand why Reynaud on Churchill's advice, issued his distress call to Roosevelt to come in. We can see why the President said in substance in reply: fight on to the end, I am doing everything I can.

This explains also the speeches that are being made from time to time by Churchill, Duff-Cooper and Eden, encouraging the people of England to continue the fight on the ground that the United States will later enter the war. It explains their oft-repeated published statement that this is our war and that they are fighting it for us.

It is not our war. It is the war of our Jews, of French Jews, and British Jews. The French Jews have been overthrown and have fled the country. The British Jews are still in power, and so are ours. It is a war to save the Jew empire and the gold standard and to destroy our government and to enslave us. It is a war to establish the "King despot of the blood of Zion." England can make peace now without the immense destruction of life and property that will soon follow, but she cannot save the Jewish empire. It is doomed.

Nor can we save it. Roosevelt is still working feverishly to that end but the result here will be what it has been in Europe. They have not yet initiated pogroms in Europe but the people of France, Hungary, Roumania and Spain have disfranchised the Jews, barred them from holding office, and from their newspaper activities. That must be done here. If it is not done the activities of the President and his Jewish administration will bring upon us the death and destruction that he has already caused in Europe.

Our imperial President is now organizing us and the western hemisphere for war. Our new Secretary of War Stimson is endeavoring to ramrod a compulsory conscription bill through Congress that will involve an additional estimated annual expense of $1,100,000,000.

Suppose we now had one million trained soldiers fully armed and equipped and a powerful two-ocean navy, does anyone doubt for a moment that we would be up to our ears in this war? There are but two things that will keep us out when we are fully prepared: one is Roosevelt's defeat; the other that the war will be over.

The war would now be over but for the interference of President Roosevelt. He is now telling Churchill the same story he told Reynaud: "fight on, I am doing all I can." They would not continue this losing fight except for the fact that both of our presidential candidates are committed to war and we are making preparations to get into it at the earliest possible moment.

England will likely soon surrender but the Churchill plan is to remove the British government to Canada and to continue the fight from there. The President is now seeking to line up the South American countries in order to mobilize a solid western hemisphere front against Europe and Asia, and to do so is offering them $500,000,000 in some concealed form as a token of good faith. They appear to be suspicious of him,—and with good cause.

The Argentine representative, Mr. Melo, expressed opposition to "sacrificing his country's jurisdictional principles." He said very properly that the question of the disposition of the French and other islands should be left to the people of such islands and that the United States and the South American countries had no right to assume a "collective trusteeship" over them. He said also,—and congress should take note of it—that the "proper time to cross a bridge is when it is reached," and that no action should be taken which is "based on a mere hypothesis."

A face-saving compromise was finally agreed upon which was signed by Mexico, Chile, Bolivia, Colombia, Venezuela, Peru, and Argentina, subject to the approval of their respective legislative bodies. Interpreted, it means that if they hereafter find it to their advantage to work with the United States they will do so, otherwise they will not. It means precisely nothing; the conference was a fizzle. But that small circumstance does not restrain the Administration. Mr. Roosevelt still insists in flagrant violation of our national constitution that congress authorize the Export- Import Bank to lend the South American countries $500,000,000 which they will no doubt accept and which we will likely lose.

The real purpose of the conference was not apparent on the surface. It was not primarily to establish a cartel for the purpose of acquiring and disposing of the products of the Americas; nor to establish a "collective trusteeship" over the foreign-controlled islands of the western hemisphere. These were probably incidental objectives but they were not the moving cause of the Jews who brought about this conference. The true purpose of it was to weld the Americas and Canada together into a compact fighting unit and to preserve the gold standard. It was a Jew scheme concocted by the Jew Adolph Berle, Assistant Secretary of State, in furtherance of their purpose to destroy our government.

The reason is war. The conference was held in anticipation of the British moving their government to Canada, for there can be no long war otherwise. It was a step to incorporate the Americas into the British Empire, for otherwise the British have no means to prolong the war when they get here. Apparently the South American countries understand the true import of it and they don't want it.

XXXI.

Party Government

> "By the ceaseless praise of Democratic Rule we shall divide the Christians into political parties, we shall destroy the unity of their nations, we shall sow discord everywhere. Reduced to impotence, they will bow before the Law of Our Bank, always united, and always devoted to our Cause." —From Funeral Oration of Rabbi Reichhorn. (Addendum to Protocols.)

It is shocking to learn that the Jews are responsible for the creation of political parties and that they have caused them to be organized for the purpose of promoting discord and confusion, and to subject us to the "law of our bank." The rule of political parties has until recent years been universal throughout the world even in those countries where the head of the nation was a king or an emperor. They have within the past few years been abolished in Germany, Italy, Spain, and Hungary, and more recently in Roumania and France, together with the Jewish Continental free masonry and B'nai B'rith. These governments are now called "totalitarian" in contra-distinction to those ruled by the Jews and political parties called "democratic."

We have all prided ourselves more or less on our party loyalty and regularity. We boast that we have never "scratched the ticket" and that our fathers before us were democrats or republicans, as the case may be. We all believe that our party stands for sound economic and political policies and that the opposition party is against them, and we are always ready to defend the party's principles as proclaimed in its platform.

Observe the phrase "law of our bank." It indicates that there is one law and one bank. There is in fact but one Jewish law and one Jewish bank and it is "always united and always devoted to our cause." Observe also the possessive, "our bank." It is a direct recognition of the fact that this bank (the Rothschild bank) belongs to the Jewish race, and that the objective of this bank is the objective of the Jewish race.

At the time of this Funeral Oration in 1869 the Jews generally were desperately poor, without citizenship, and living in squalor in the ghettos of the various cities of Europe. There are now many wealthy Jews but the wealth of many of them has stemmed from the Rothschild root. The Rothschild fortune, magnified as it has been during the years since it was founded, with all of its branches and affiliates, is still "united and devoted to our cause." It was devoted to that purpose by its founder, old Amschel, and it has been so employed ever since.

The "law of our bank" represents the ruthless law that has governed what we call "high finance" or "Wall Street" since the civil war. It represents the law that controls the Bank of England and other Rothschild banks. The record of the money power for the past 100 years demonstrates the truth of the conclusion that it is "always united and always devoted to our cause," and that "cause" is the subjugation and enslavement of the Gentiles and the elevation and enthronement of the Jews. That is the present objective of Jeroboam Rothschild and his secret 300 Elders of Zion.

They have sought to incorporate this international banking power and to give it a legal status by establishing the Bank of International Settlements but to date the undertaking has not proven to be very successful. Under the pretense of providing a clearing house for the settlement of German reparations an international conference was held by government appointed representatives that resulted in the creation of this bank with a capital of $100,000,000.

President Hoover appointed Thos. W. Lamont and Owen D. Young as our representatives to this conference. J. P. Morgan & Co. subscribed $25,000,000 of the capital, the balance of the stock being subscribed by the Bank of England and other central banks. It is strictly a Rothschild super-bank for the purpose of regulating the economy and welfare of the people of the world.

The "law of our bank" is also the law of the Jewish rabbi and the Jewish leaders. The Rothschilds and their Council of the Jewish Agency (the 300 Learned Elders of Zion) are the despotic rulers of the Jewish race. The despot of Zion is already established so far as the Jews are concerned. Some of them are not active Zionists but they are all obedient, and most of them are sympathetic.

This address of Rabbi Reichhorn was a carefully prepared statement of the plans and purposes of the Jewish race, made by a distinguished Jewish leader on a solemn occasion, in honor of a departed leader. It sets them forth with clarity and precision. It is copied in full in Appendix II at the end of this book.

We have been divided into two political parties here in America, viz: the democratic and republican, and the Rothschild banking interest through Baruch, Lamont, et al., and the lavish use of money has acquired control of both of them. There is never any division between the parties where the vital interest of this malign power is concerned.

A striking example of the truth of this statement is afforded by the enactment of the Federal Reserve Act. It was first attempted through the republican party and having failed because of democratic opposition, the republican party was defeated and it was then put over in disguise and by deception through the democratic party.

We have just had two party conventions and the two parties have announced their platforms. There is a shade of difference between them but not enough to enthuse over. In their essentials they are the same. They both pretend isolationism but they both nominate interventionist candidates. They both stand for a continuation of the New Deal, for Secretary Hull's reciprocal trade agreements, and for the regimentation of the people of America.

The nominees of both parties are satisfactory to the Rothschild interest. The British and the Jews and the Jew press hail Willkie's nomination as a great victory for the warmongers,—and so it was. They could afford to spend $100,000,000 to bring about his nomination, and they may have done so. Who knows? We do know that from the date of his announcement he was given great and favorable publicity by the Jew press, the Jew radio, and the Jew cinema. Whenever his name was mentioned in the convention hall the packed Jew galleries responded with great applause. With a good radio one could distinguish the Yiddish accent and the soviet yell.

The republicans could have won the election "hands down" with Dewey or Vandenberg or any other respectable non-interventionist, but republican victory meant nothing to Baruch, Lamont, Lippman and the other Jew politicians. They want war. It is true the republican platform declares against war, but platforms mean nothing to a Jew warmonger or a Jew sponsored candidate. He will do exactly as the Jews want him to do, —as Roosevelt has done. If he values his life he will not dare doublecross the Rothschild power.

The sponsors of the Willkie campaign were Barney Baruch representing the Kuhn, Loeb interest and Thomas W. Lamont representing Morgan & Co. They were powerfully aided by the Jew press, radio, etc., and such columnists as Walter Lippman, Dorothy Thompson and other warmongers. Some of these sponsors were likewise sponsors for Roosevelt's third term. They no doubt prefer Roosevelt but fear their ability to elect him and they have therefore selected an opposition candidate who has pledged himself to carry out his and their program.

> "The Day," calling itself "The National Jewish Daily," printed in Yiddish at 183 East Broadway, New York City, Rabbi Samuel Margoshes, Editor, born in Galicia, published in English on July 7, 1940, the following amazing interview with Republican Presidential Nominee Wendell L. Willkie, in the Editor's column:
>
> "I regard anti-Semitism in America as a criminal movement and every anti-Semite as a traitor to America. I spoke over the radio making clear my attitude toward the Jews, long before I even thought of becoming a candidate for the Presidency. I am glad to have an opportunity of expressing my sentiments again . . . What we require are laws by means of which we shall be enabled to eliminate those who would transplant on American soil the poisonous growth from Germany and other countries."*

Mr. Willkie's secret commitment to the Jews sheds a flood of light upon the Jewish enthusiasm for him as shown in their press and the thousands of telegrams sent to the republican national convention delegates and the boisterous gallery applause.

If the law that Mr. Willkie advocates is enacted then the author of this book is a traitor and is made a criminal, although every word contained in it is the truth. It is not the conclusions here stated that create anti-Semitism but it is the conduct and purposes of the Jewish leaders that create it. The Jews have enough power without such a law. They have the power to persecute and to injure any man who dares criticize them and they exercise it ruthlessly,—and yet the truth must be told if conditions here pointed out are ever to be corrected by peaceful methods.

So far as the Rothschild interest in concerned, it appears to be safe with either Roosevelt or Willkie. They no doubt prefer Roosevelt because he has proven to be their faithful and dependable servant but they will support Willkie if they think he stands the best chance of election. As to the balance of us, it is the difference between tweedledum and tweedledee.

---

*R. E. Edmondson's Bulletin, July 8, 1940.

Senator McNary, republican nominee for Vice President, is decidedly preferable to Wallace. He appears to be an honest, straight-forward, courageous and capable man. He is at least a genuine friend of the farmer, as shown by the McNary-Haugen bill. This proposed bill would guarantee the farmer the American market and profitable prices for his products, and it would relieve him of the petty and endless regimentation to which he is now subjected.

The Chicago democratic convention was a convention of job-holders and was a cut and dried affair; the most of the delegates to it had been selected by job-holders. Mr. Roosevelt and everyone else knew long before the convention was held that he would be the nominee, and yet he chose to remain silent about his acceptance until after he was nominated. He then dramatically accepted it as a call to service, stating that he had "no desire or purpose" to hold the office for a third term. He is in error. It has been his "desire and purpose" from the beginning, otherwise the convention would not have been stacked. It is simply Mr. Roosevelt's way of doing things, to-wit: to say one thing and mean another.

We must abolish political parties. This is not such a radical suggestion as it appears to be, but only a common sense one. There is no reason why any man should not be permitted to run for any office on his own platform, just as he does for a party nomination. There is no reason—absolutely none—for two elections, one for a party nomination and the other to be elected.

The father of our country, George Washington, gave us good advice upon this subject, as well as upon the subject of foreign entanglements. He strongly condemned party government. If we had only listened to his words of wisdom instead of the sly suggestions of the Jews we would not be in our present deplorable situation. We must destroy the shackles that curb our freedom and that we have forged upon ourselves.

Congress should elect the President. This was the French system and is an improvement over our effete electoral college. It may require a constitutional amendment. This system will minimize many of the evils of a presidential election.

For one thing it will not permit the "Elders" to select for us a candidate satisfactory for their schemes,—a man with "a dark stain, a 'Panama' in his past." For another, it will avoid the tremendous expense of a presidential campaign and thereby void the bribery involved in huge campaign contributions. For still another it will minimize the constant and ever increasing encroachment of the Executive upon the powers of Congress, for the President will be accountable to Congress. And for still another, it will tend to neutralize the power of the foreign vote of the large cities in the election of the President, since it will give all of the small states the advantage of two senatorial votes.

This will, as stated, involve a constitutional amendment, but the constitution itself makes provision for its amendment. The process is a laborious and difficult one, but even so it is far better than the plan of the New Deal, viz: to change the constitution through the interpretations of a hand picked court.

Political parties were designed by the Jews to enable them to corrupt and control governments, and they have been useful instruments in their hands. Through them they can indirectly buy the members of a political party when they could not reach them directly.

We now have the sorry spectacle of southern political leaders such as Barkley, Bankhead and Rayburn blindly supporting all of the vagaries and extravagances and unconstitutional reforms of the New Deal in violation of their professed political principles of a life time. It may be that none of these men could be bought directly and individually by Rothschild gold, but the party can be bought, and they can and are delivered by such purchase.

The results are the same. Their country is "sold down the river" just as effectively and as completely as if each and every one of them had been personally corrupted. This is not peculiar to the democratic party. The republican party is for sale and is sold like a sack of potatoes, and the leaders of the party are delivered like a sack of potatoes. We have become so inured and blind to party government that many of our politicians openly proclaim their fealty to party over their convictions and their loyalty to their country.

This is not peculiar to America and to our system of government. The same has until recently been true of every country of the world. It is through the corruption of political parties that the Jews have ruled the world; it is their brand of their boasted "democracy." It was evidently true in England when the Peel amendment was adopted. It was true when the Mc-Donald (labor party) government was in power; there was no substantial difference between it and the preceding and succeeding conservative governments. It is true now in England. The government of the British Empire is today as strongly Jewish as our own; and this control was obtained in the same corrupt manner that they obtained their power here, viz: by the corruption of political parties. The Jews and their propaganda agencies are riding the English and American people hard at this time but they are riding for a fall. We are at last beginning to understand the secret of the power that has misgoverned us so long, and this understanding will make us free, for the truth is mighty.

XXXII.

"King Franklin, 1st"

> "Ever since that time we have been leading the peoples from one disenchantment to another, so that in the end they should turn also from us in favour of that King-Despot of the blood of Zion, whom we are preparing for the world.
>
> "When the hour strikes for our Sovereign Lord of all the World to be crowned, it is these same hands (want and envy and hatred) which will sweep away everything that might be a hindrance thereto."—From Protocol 3.

The Rothschilds and their League of Nations will soon transfer their headquarters to our shores. The most of their gold is already stored in the Kentucky vaults, and the President has sent our ships for Jewish refugees and for the balance of it upon the pretext of moving Americans.

The Associated Press reported that "of the 1914 passengers aboard the incoming liner Manhattan, 862 are aliens, mostly Jewish refugees." It was also reported in the press about the same time that several hundred Americans were stranded in Europe because they did not have enough money to pay their passage home. They are of course just plain Americans,—not Jews. We are justified in suspecting that the ship was sent over to afford American protection for the removal of rich Jews with their gold to America. The press only affords us an occasional glimpse of what is transpiring daily.

The "Despot of the blood of Zion" whose ancestors have ruled the British Empire for the past 100 years, clandestinely but with an iron hand, is now headed for America with his gold. It may be that he has already arrived, for I may be in error in my conclusion that Jeroboam is the present ruler of the Rothschild fortune. It is the view of Count Cherep-Spiridovich that it is Edward Rothschild, and if that be true he is now here. On the following page is a reproduction of his picture as it appeared in the daily press with the comment thereon. It was stated in that connection that the $1,000,000 of jewelry was classed as personal property and that he did not pay any duty on it. In appearance he is not much of an improvement over Jeroboam.

The last report on Jeroboam Rothschild (Georges Mandel) is that he fled to Spanish Morocco and that the government of Spain turned him over to the French government to be tried for treason. The United Press of July 29th, 1940, carried the report that the French government has created a special high court of "seven magistrates who will be designated because of their independence of all political ties," for the trial of these alleged traitors.

"REFUGEE ROTHSCHILD ARRIVES WITH MILLION IN GEMS"

"Seventy-year-old Baron Edward Rothschild, internationally famous banker of Paris, is pictured as he arrived at La Guardia field, New York, Wednesday, from Europe aboard the Yankee clipper. The fabulously rich financier is holding a small handbag containing $1,000,000 in jewelry. The baron and his family left Paris on May 20 for Switzerland, made their way to Bordeaux and Spain and then motored to Lisbon to get the clipper. They will go to some suburban retreat in this country for a rest, it was said."

It is further stated in this report that the death penalty will be sought for Mandel (Jeroboam Rothschild) who will be charged with "plotting against the state's security," but that Leon Blum and the other Jewish members will only face "political charges" which involve the penalty of life imprisonment. Let us hope that this will end the ambitious mighty empire founded by the will of Amschel Mayer Rothschild. It is a pity that the French court is without jurisdiction to try the other conspirators who brought about this terrible war.

In his Charlottesville speech on June 10th, 1940, the President, in his discussion of isolationists, said:

> "Such an island represents to me and to the overwhelming majority of Americans today a helpless nightmare of a people without freedom, a people lodged in prison, handcuffed, hungry, and fed through the bars from day to day by the contemptuous, unpitying masters of other countries."

Mr. Roosevelt is mistaken about it. Isolationism does not present any such picture to "the overwhelming majority of Americans." We have been isolationists all of our lives; it is the traditional policy our government, and we have never before feared the loss of our freedom and "an unpitying master." A dictatorship does offer such a prospect but we have no fear of a foreign dictator. We do fear, and with good reason, that Franklin D. Roosevelt will convert the Jew-deal into a Jew-dictatorship.

This is merely inflammatory propaganda for the purpose of creating war sentiment. It is a gruesome, doleful picture that is calculated to scare us into anything. Suppose he gets us into war and becomes our dictator, what assurance have we that he will be any better than "the contemptuous unpitying masters of other continents"?

Churchill has not proven himself to be a better dictator than Hitler. He has imprisoned as "fifth columnists" the anti-Semitics and the critics of his administration, and he has provided for the death penalty for them and has probably killed many of them. The "unpitying masters of other continents" could do no worse. Hitler has treated the Jews no worse. The Flanders retreat which Mr. Churchill ordered after honorable and reasonable terms of surrender had been proposed, was a massacre, the extent of which is not unknown.

In the face of certain defeat Churchill appears to be willing to fight until the last Christian is killed. And for what? Not for the soldiers who are fighting a losing battle, nor for their families;—but to preserve an empire that is decayed with "Jew-rot" and that is operated "by, of, and for" the Jews.

Another sample of Mr. Churchill's cruelty and ruthlessness has just been revealed by the press report from France of June 15, 1940, as follows:

> "Commenting on the French decision not to defend Paris, authorized spokesmen said: —
>
> " 'For the first time reason prevailed, and for the first time the French acted against the will of the British who wanted a destroyed Paris for propaganda purposes.
>
> " "The French are beginning to see they always are called upon to pay the bill.' "

It appears that the French cabinet split upon this very rock. Reynaud, Handel, Blum, and the other Jews in the government agreed to the British scheme but Marshall Petain and the Gentiles refused. The Jewish members became exiles and the French government, after suffering losses of 1,900,000 men in dead, wounded and prisoners, surrendered. And now the British government through a renegade (DeGaulle) has organized an opposition government and is nightly bombing French cities. Our government has also turned on her former ally (?) and has seized her gold stored in the Kentucky vaults and her ships that are in our ports.

We can now very well believe that the Germans are right in claiming that Churchill sank the "Athenia" for propaganda purposes. If he sought the destruction of the great city of Paris with the thousands of helpless men, women and children who would necessarily be in it, for propaganda purposes, he would not balk at the destruction of a ship with a few hundred people on it.

The Associated Press of July 25th, 1940, reports that former Premier Daladier, Mandel (Rothschild) and sixteen others were arrested on their return from French Morocco, where they fled two days before the armistice "was signed. The report states that they will be tried for treason for plunging the country into war, and that in the "name of justice those responsible" for the calamity of France will be punished, and that "on the day of their trial our dead will be present among the accusers."

The government of France now recognizes that the former Jewish government is responsible for the war, and not Germany. In their published statement they say "we are buried under the ruins of a liberal parliamentary capitalist regime. You have lived on lies. The hour of truth now has sounded." We will soon know the names of the conspirators who brought about this frightful destructive war. I fear that our beloved (?) humane (?) President Roosevelt will be found near the top of the list.

We must stop the warmongers and their war clamor. We must remove the filthy, hairy hands of the Jews from our press, cinema, radio, and the throats of the people, even if it is necessary to confiscate their property and expel them from our country. The remedy, it must be admitted is a radical one, but their conduct and the conditions that prevail make necessary this or some other radical remedy. We have passed the stage when homeopathic remedies will do any good; it takes a major operation.

They will of course set up a great howl that the remedy is unconstitutional and will invoke the protection of a constitution they are now seeking to destroy, Mr. Roosevelt can suspend the constitution in case of war against a foreign foe or an emergency against a domestic foe. It can always be suspended for the preservation of our government. We can and must suspend it, if it is necessary to that end.

Unprepared as we are for war, he still seeks to provoke it. He appears to be still working to destroy this nation in order to rule it and to promote the Rothschild power. Despite the fact that the people of this country want to live in peace, he persists in his insane effort to involve them in war. His appointment of warmongers Henry L. Stimson as Secretary of War, and Frank Knox as Secretary of the Navy, means war. He forced the resignation of Secretary Woodring because Woodring was opposed to war and to giving Great Britain our airplanes, munitions, etc.*

His appointee Col. Frank Knox furnishes us with an apt description of Mr. Roosevelt's character and duplicity. He says that as a "matter of tactics he will not avow his aim." And to reach it he is ready to "bow, smile, agree, assert, evade, deny, distort, distract, delay, retreat, startle, dazzle, juggle, sidestep, and circumvent." This is what Col. Knox said of him in his newspaper before his appointment as Secretary of the Navy. He said of him further that "he is no more bound by precedent than by his own statements , .. It is bad enough to have for president in time of peace a man who is over-confident, incautious, self-willed, uncertain and unreliable. In time of war it would be disastrous."

*See Congressional Record, June 21, 1940, p. 13331 et seq.

This is what the protocols call "cunning and make-believe," the qualities of an ideal Jewish ruler. That is a true pen-portrait of "King Franklin, 1st," our present pseudo dictator and our future "King-Despot" by his present Secretary of the Navy. The dictatorship is almost within his grasp. All that is needed is another emergency (the 65th) which he can and will declare at the first opportunity. Congress is the only bulwark that stands between us and the slavery that he so graphically described in his Charlottesville speech.

In concluding the Charlottesville speech Mr. Roosevelt truly said, (for he sometimes inadvertently tells the truth) :

> "And the love of freedom is still fierce and steady in the nation today."

We have inborn in us the spirit of freedom and we will not "take our medicine lying down." It may mean much suffering to us but it is certain to mean that we will rid ourselves in the end of the undesirable Jew, the Jew-in-law, and the hybrid.

We have many minor problems that should be solved righteously, but this Administration is incapable of acting in that manner. The two major problems that confront us are: (1) Shall we cancel the bonded mortgage debts that we cannot pay? (2) Shall the Jew financial buccaneers and communists continue to rule us?

We have lived in a fool's paradise in ignorance of our real ruler and his designs. We have worshipped our political parties that he fostered. We have had faith in our lying newspapers that he controls. We have swallowed his propaganda about an invasion and we are getting ready for war on a huge scale. We are preparing to exercise our choice between the two presidential candidates he has provided for us. We have accepted with fortitude all of the poverty and suffering that he has brought upon us. The mighty power of truth will free us from our bondage.

Congressional Record, June 21, 1940, p. 13859.

The Jews are now coming to this country in great numbers from all Europe, including the British Empire. We are in fact sending our ships for them. Congress appropriated $50,000,000 for the relief of refugees, the most of whom are Jews; and Roosevelt, without authority, has appropriated another $50,000,000.

We are offering the Jews a home, despite the fact that they have betrayed our hospitality and that of every country in which they have lived. This immigration must be stopped. The pending election (November, 194-0) presents to every voter the opportunity to do his or her part to that end, and to save our government from their rule and thereby save ourselves.

Hitler's paper recently stated that when the war is won some area remote from Europe would be set apart for Jews and the continent would be cleared of them. French Madagascar is said to be an ideal place for them. If this plan is carried out it will mean a new world; it will be a long step in the direction of the millenium to which our Christians look forward.

XXXIII.

Traitors

> "I pass now to the method of confirming the dynastic roots of King David to the last strata of the earth . . . Certain members of the seed of David will prepare the kings and their heirs, selecting not by right of heritage but by eminent capacities, inducting them into the most secret mysteries of the political, into schemes of government, but providing always that none may come to knowledge of the secrets . . .
>
> "Direct heirs will often be set aside from ascending the Throne if in their time of training they exhibit frivolity, softness and other qualities that are the ruin of authority, which render them incapable of governing and in themselves dangerous for kingly office. Only those who are unconditionally capable for firm, even if it be to cruelty, direct rule, will receive the reins of rule from our learned elders." From Protocol 24,

The Associated Press of August 18, 1940 quoted an amazing agreement made on that date between Franklin D. Roosevelt as President of the United States, and W. L. Mackenzie King as Prime Minister of the Dominion of Canada. The following is the text of the agreement as reported:

> "It has been agreed that a permanent joint board of defense shall be set up at once by the two countries . . . It will consider in the broad sense, the defense of the north half of the Western Hemisphere."

This agreement is in very broad terms and is subject to almost any interpretation one chooses to place upon it. The mildest interpretation that can be placed upon it is that it constitutes a military alliance between the United States and the Dominion of Canada at a time when Canada is engaged in war with the totalitarian powers.

There has been some speculation in the press as to whether or not the agreement involves the transfer to Canada of fifty of our American destroyers to be used by Britain in her war with Germany and Italy. This transfer was previously recommended by "Sir" John J. Pershing, and within a few days thereafter (less than a week) we had a Gallup poll upon it showing 62% of the American people favoring the transfer.

It has been stated in the press that the President has advised with Attorney General Jackson and other subordinates who have informed him that it is not necessary to refer this coalition to Congress for confirmation. Up to this hour the President has not done so. It is extremely doubtful if he will. He is not likely to do so unless he receives previous assurance that it will be confirmed.

This agreement, like all other Jew schemes that have been perpetrated upon the American people, is not what it purports to be. It has been represented as affording us air bases in Canada and other British possessions for the defense of the United States, and that it is but an extension of the Monroe Doctrine and does not commit the United States to war except for defense of the western hemisphere. But that is not the interpretation that has been placed upon it by the British Government. Mr. Churchill and his associates understand its true meaning, and they were so rejoiced over it that they could not refrain from giving us a slight glimpse of it. It has a meaning that the President and the Jew press would not dare expose to Congress and to the American people.

The following is a quotation from the Associated Press report from London of August 20, 1940:

> "Utterly confident, Prime Minister Churchill used his disclosure of the plan for air-naval base leases to declare that the British Empire and the United States 'will have to be mixed together in some of their affairs for mutual and general advantage.'
>
> "'No one can stop it!' he cried. 'Like the Mississippi, it just keeps rolling along, let it roll! Let it roll on full flood, irresistible, to broader lands and better days' "
>
> "Tumult from the House of Commons steep and crowded benches almost smothered the Prime Minister's last words."

Does anyone imagine for a moment that the mere leasing of air-bases, or a military pact for the protection of the United States would have occasioned the burst of eloquence of Prime Minister Churchill and the tumult and enthusiasm of the House of Commons?

The former Jew war minister, Mr. Hore-Belisha, let the cat out of the bag in his statement regarding the matter, which the Associated Press of the same date quotes as follows:

> "In the House of Commons tonight Leslie Hore-Belisha, the former War Secretary, raised the possibility of 'an eventual common citizenship' of Britain and the United States, and said this alone would almost compensate for 'the evils of war.' Such a union, Hore-Belisha recalled, was offered, in vain, to France in the hour of the third Republic's collapse."

... Observe that he says that they offered the same thing "to France in the hour of the third Republic's collapse." That offer was to absorb France into the British Empire. Observe also that Hore-Belisha states that this innocent appearing pact "would almost compensate (Britain) for the evils of war." These shrewd Jews always know the "low down," and they are so conceited that they cannot refrain from bragging.

Thus, according to the views of Messrs. Churchill and Hore-Belisha, the true meaning of this agreement is that we have sacrificed our independence as a nation and have been merged into the British Empire as one of its dominions. And thus, without consulting Congress or the American people, we have become not only a part of the British Empire, but we have entered the war against the totalitarian powers.

This program is not a new scheme just invented by President Roosevelt and his "kitchen cabinet." It is the adopted plan of the Elders and the managers of the Rothschild Trust to establish their world empire. They control, and have for many years controlled the British Empire. It has been ruled ostensibly by a king and his cabinet, but in fact by the Jews.

This plan is set out in detail in the Col. E. M. House letter.* The real author of this letter is unknown, and because of that fact the letter itself was discredited. Evidently the author was not Col. House, nor was it Dr. Wm. J. Maloney.

The letter shows upon its face that it was written by a Jew and by a person holding a high official position with the British Government at the time (June 10, 1919). It was written upon the stationery of the British consulate of New York City and addressed to the Hon. David Lloyd-George, then Prime Minister of England. It was probably written either by the Jew, Sir Wm. Wiseman, who was at that time "British Intelligence Representative and now with Kuhn, Loeb & Co.," or by the Jew, Lord Northcliffe, who was at that time head of the British Propaganda Department. While there is doubt as to the identity of the actual author, there can be none as to the authenticity of the letter. The Jew can always be depended upon to hide his identity and to destroy the proof of it, if it is possible to do so.

Because of the length of the letter it is not reproduced in its entirety. I trust that the following excerpts will be sufficient to show its verity and its character. The letter reveals the powerful forces that are now at work to overthrow this government and to bring it back into the British Empire as a dominion, and it reveals the traitors who are cooperating with the British the the Jews to that end. I quote the following paragraphs from it:

*Congressional Record, Oct. 11, 1939, p. 598-603.
Congressional Record Oct. 18, 1939.
Congressional Record, Oct. 18, 1939, p. 981.

> "'Our thanks are due to Messrs. Taft and Polk, who elaborated with us our German-Irish plot programme. To Mr. Baker and the innumerable library committees who banned from the camps the anti-British books on our index expurgatorious. To Mr. Gregory, who lent punitive force to our wishes regarding spoken and written speeches. And Messrs. Pierpont Morgan, Rockefeller, Cleveland Dodge, Wanamaker, Hamlin, Childs, DuPont, Ryan, Insull, Doheny, and others of our friends who financed our 'Americanization' campaign. I would especially call attention to the beneficence of Messrs. Insull, and Doheny, who were the generous supporters of the diversion, devised by Messrs. Taft and O'Connor, entitled, 'Ireland Stabbed England in the Back.' These contributors doubtless will be, or have been, appropriately rewarded by His Majesty's Government."

The Mr. Baker referred to in this paragraph was then our Secretary of War, and the Mr. Gregory was our Attorney General. I do not know whether any of these gentlemen "have been appropriately rewarded by His Majesty's Government."

> "Through the Red Cross, the Scout movement, the Y. M. C. A., the church, and other humane, religious, and quasi-religious organizations, we have created an atmosphere of international effort which strengthens the idea of unity of the English-speaking world. In the coordination of this work, Mr. Raymond Fosdick, formerly of the Rockefeller Foundation, has been especially conspicuous. I would like to mention President Nicholas Murray Butler of Columbia University, who has eloquently advocated this form of internationalism and carefully emphasized its distinction from the false internationalism which is infecting the proletariat."

It is well known that Nicholas Murray Butler is an Anglophile, but Mr. Raymond Fosdick's position has not been so conspicuous. The distinction between the form of true internationalism and false internationalism is imperceptible, but all of it is bad, and none of it fits in with our scheme of government.

> "To all ages and classes, to every phase of human activity, by all channels of human communications, our propaganda permeates. Our command over the cables and press, the schools and the universities, the pulpit and the tribunes, will tend to increase. Soon we should be in a position to control at will the reading, the hearing, and the seeing of the inhabitants so that such ideas as are not truly British may be met with a barrier, 'They shall not pass.' "

That states a truth that has already been commented upon. It states a truth which should be apparent to all of us, every day of our lives; we get nothing from either the press or the radio or the cinema that does not favor the British. They let "nothing pass" that tends to present any other point of view.

"May I also call your attention to the services of Prof. Richard Gotthell, of Columbia University (the one who pinned the medal on F. D. Roosevelt in 1937 for his distinguished service to world Jewry), in our campaign against the Hindus, and of Miss Elisabeth Marbury and Messrs. Charles McCarthy and Karl Watters in that against the Irish . . .

"The cost of converting an American into a colonist of His Majesty is now 63 cents. Our expenses we have met by a levy on the population."

The statement made in parenthesis about the Roosevelt medal evidently is comment and not a part of the so-called House letter.

While we appear to be cheap, particularly in the eyes of the Jews, I do not believe that the American people can be bought at the rate of 53 cents a head. If that were true we would have been a part of the British Empire long ago. It is a part of the Jew character to over-estimate himself and his money, and to under-estimate the "goi."

"In the financial world the Anglo-American alliance is a well-established fact. And as the consortium for China, and the security company for Mexico show, our brokers and their aids have become the unchallenged financiers of the world. We have been particularly fortunate in our fiscal agents here, Messrs. Pierpont Morgan & Co. . . .

"Their services in putting this country into the war may not have been altruistic, but they were nonetheless effective. They contributed liberally to our Americanization campaign. They ousted Miss Boardman, and through Messrs. Taft and H. P. Davidson they nationalized and directed the American Red Cross, and then internationalized it under the direction of Mr. H. P. Davidson. Through Mr. Thomas Lamont they purchased Harpers Magazine and the New York Evening Post. Through advertisers they control, they have exerted widespread influence on newspaper policy.

"Messrs. Lamont and Davidson gave you valuable aid at the peace conference. They loaned $200,000,000 to Japan that our ally might build a fleet to compete with America on the Pacific carrying routes. Their attempts to retain for us control of the international mercantile marine are well known to you."

The Anglo-American finance alliance has been heretofore pointed out. It is the ownership of our principal financial institutions through the Rothschild money trust. We know about the services of Morgan & Co., in getting us into the war; about Mr. Davidson's direction of the Red Cross, and about Mr. Lamont's valuable aid at the peace conference; but we did not know that "they loaned $200,000,000 that Britain's ally (Japan) might build a fleet to compete with America on the Pacific carrying routes."

That is rank treason to our country on the part of the firm of Morgan & Co. It is rank treason to America on the part of its ally, the British Government. And it is this same British Government that is now pleading with us to rescue them from their own machinations and infamy.

Please note the statement that "our brokers and their aids have become the unchallenged financiers of the world." These "brokers" are N. M. Rothschild & Sons and they have been the "unchallenged" financiers of the world for more than a hundred years. The firm of Morgan & Co. is not an "aid" but a branch. Observe also their purchase of Harpers Magazine and the New York Evening Post, and particularly note that the British regards the firm as its agency,—"our broker." It is, however, the "other way round"; the British Government is the agency of "our brokers."

> "With moneys lent to us by the American Government for war purposes, we have, acting through quasi-American companies, by the aid of Mr. Connor Guthrie, obtained control of the large oil fields in California and in Costa Rica. And through the nationalization by His Majesty's Government of the Cowdray, Person, and Royal Dutch Shell interests in Mexico, we, having become masters of the Mexican, Canadian, Roumanian, Armenian, Persian, and lesser oil fields, now largely control the oil fuel of the world and thereby the world's transportation and industry. We have not yet succeeded in controlling the pipe lines owned by the Standard Oil Co. and its subsidiaries, for those companies have long been established."

This is also a revealing statement. We knew in a general way that "His Majesty's Government had acquired large oil interests in Mexico and other countries," but we did not know that the $4,000,000,000.00 we loaned Britain was used to acquire these oil interests and to obtain a monopoly of the oil resources of the world.

> "This control (of world's oil supply) would enable us to exert such pressure as would make American industrial interests amenable to His Majesty's pleasure. But it would be unwise to make disciplinary use of our fuel power before we secure remission of our $4,000,000,000.00 debt. Otherwise, the American industrial interests might retaliate by forcing the United States Government to exact from us the agreed interest, to maintain tariff barriers against our merchandise, and to withdraw support from the rate of exchange, which would make our labor and resources for years pay tribute to this country (United States), an unnatural, unfilial, and unthinkable proceeding.
>
> "We are conducting a vigorous campaign for the cancellation of this war debt, on the grounds (a) that we fought America's fight for her for 2 years, while she was prospering in cowardice; and (b) that at least the material burdens should be distributed justly, if the world is to be made safe for democracy. Synchronously with this agitation for the remission of our debt, we are agitating for further loans of American money to rebuild our markets in Europe ... In these agitations we are receiving valuable, if not wholly disinterested, aid from our financial auxiliaries and fiscal agents."

If this is not treachery of the basest sort, what do you call it? They've got our money, used it to buy up the oil properties of the world, and are seeking to escape payment of it. When they have accomplished that, they propose to make "disciplinary use of our fuel power in order to make American industrial interests amenable to His Majesty's pleasure." They add insult to injury by the statement that

> "We fought America's fight for her for 2 years while she was prospering in cowardice."

And the grounds here stated are the grounds upon which they are seeking to cancel their debt to us,—leaving out of course the word "cowardice."

> However, we are quietly continuing our work in Mexico until the United States Government shall be put in a position to take it over. An American war with Mexico would cost us nothing; it would satisfy certain American industrial interests; it would guarantee our title to the Mexican oil fields; it would humble, by impoverishing, this purse-proud people; it would give us an opportunity to show the American that he —isolated in the world—needs our protection against our ally, Japan; and while America was busy warring we would enjoy a clear field in the European, African, and Asiatic trade, together with the monopoly of the markets of a South America hostile to the Monroe Doctrinaries of democracy. For these reasons our press is fully reporting Mexican outrages, but a > strange apathy seems to have fallen on the people, an apathy from which only border raids or special atrocities will arouse them."

Thus it appears that Britain has been seeking to promote war between us and Mexico because it would "cost us nothing .. . it would guarantee our title to the Mexican oil fields ... it would humble, by impoverishing, this purse-proud (American) people; it would give us an opportunity to show the American that he—isolated in the world—needs our protection against our ally, Japan."

> "Below that level, imperial unity cannot be securely established upon the debris of the Constitution here (in America). We will not passively permit this unity to be now menaced when it is all but perfect. Has not America, while still maintaining an outward show of independence, yielded to our wishes in the Panama Canal tolls and Canadian fisheries' disputes, as was fitting and filial? Was not America happy to fight our war in Europe? Was not America, like Canada, willing not only to pay her own war expenses but also to loan us money for ours? Was not America, like Canada, content to seek nothing in return for her war duty, so long as the mother-land was completely indemnified in Egypt and the rest of Africa, in Persia, Mesopotamia, Syria, and elsewhere? Was not America as proud to be honored by knighthood and lesser titulary distinctions, as Canada was, or, rather, more proud? Has not President Wilson canceled the big Navy program and dutifully conceded to us the command of the seas, confident that we shall defend America against all future foes that may threaten our supremacy, just as we defended America and Canada, against Germany?"

Alas, all of these achievements have been accomplished. They have been sugar-coated in such way that our people did not know they were serving the purposes of the British, but thought that they were doing the right thing.

> "But I regret to inform you that our Committee on American Elections has reported (Appendix 38) that no matter how lavishly we finance the next election, the Wilson administration will pass, and with it, perchance, that absolute administrative control over the Legislature, which has meant so much to us. Willful, wanton, and wicked men will unite in the next election with labor and those industrialists whose profit-patriotism ratio has been allowed to fall below the threshold of loyalty to imperial unity. These combined forces of disorder will seek to elect a Legislature which will attempt to make the administration responsible to it, instead of to us and our auxiliaries, and will strive to rend the bonds which bind this colony to the mother-land, for the sole, selfish, and seditious purpose of erecting a separate, national, economic unit independent of us—and even, perhaps, competing with us. We must, therefore, hasten to remove from this Legislature, with the aid of our supporters here, such of its powers as could be used against imperial unity.

"In other words, we must quickly act to transfer its dangerous sovereignty from this colony to the custody of the Crown. We must, in short, now bring America within the Empire. God helping us, we can do no other. The first visible step in this direction has been taken; President Wilson has accepted and sponsored the plan for a League of Nations which we prepared for him. We have wrapped this plan in the peace treaty so that the world must accept from us the League or a continuance of the war. The League is in substance the Empire with America admitted on the same basis as our other colonies."

And so the British Government has a "Committee on American Elections" and they finance these elections even "lavishly" where there is a chance to win; otherwise they refuse to put up the money. They can afford to spend money "lavishly" for they are playing for high stakes, viz: to cancel a $4,000,000,-000.00 debt and to save the tottering Jewish-British Empire. This financing is obviously done through "our broker" (N. M. Rothschild & Sons). We do not know with certainty who compose the "Committee on American Elections," but I think I can name three of its members, viz: "Sir" Thomas W. Lamont, Sir William Wisemann, and Sir (?) B. M. Baruch. Unfortunately for the schemes of these conspirators, the democratic party was thrown out of power, and unfortunately for them also, Congress refused to ratify the League of Nations.

Their intimate knowledge of President Wilson and his weaknesses, and of the best method of approach, is uncanny:

"Our best policy, therefore, would be to appoint President Wilson first president of the League . . .

"He is easily slighted and remarkably vindictive. It is the highest degree desirable that any traces of resentment his mind may be harboring against us should be radically removed before he returns. I would, therefore, suggest that the work of adulation planned in appendix 32 should be intensively continued. The adulators, however, should be instructed to consult the inventories I have prepared (appendices 45-83), which show that he is now surfeited with diamond stomachers, brooches, and bracelets, Gobelin tapestries, mosaics, and vases, gold caskets, and plates . . .

"The pressing need of our embassy at Washington is not so much an ambassador as a gentleman in waiting to the President.

"I would suggest that his powers as President of the League of Nations be left undefined for the present. He may be trusted to assume what power he can and to use it in the interest of the Crown.

"A grant of a privy purse of $100,000,000 would prove most acceptable to him, and would be useful for private espionage, private wars, Siberian railroads, etc. His appointment should be for life, and you might definitely promise him that any instruction he may care to convey concerning his successor will receive the most careful attention of His Majesty's Government . . .

"No one understands this peculiarity (hero worship) of the native behavior better than Mr. Wilson, which accounts largely for his exceptional usefulness to us. He knows that Americans will not scrutinize any performance closely, provided their faith in the performer has been adequately established. Mr. Wilson has since made the transfer amid American acclamation. In the same way he will now be able to satisfy them that far from surrendering their independence to the League they are actually extending their sovereignty by it."

They made the naive suggestion:

"I would suggest that as soon as the President is settled once more in the White House, the visit should be returned by His Royal Highness, the Prince of Wales, who would be an admirable representative of His Royal Sire, and would satisfy President Wilson's sense of fitness. It is parhaps unfortunate that there is not a Presidential daughter of the Prince's age, for such a union would have greatly advanced our purpose not only with the American people, but also with a President who feels that lese majeste should be punishable with 20 years' imprisonment, and who acts as if he considered his son-in-law, Mr. McAdoo, as his heir apparent."

The Prince of Wales referred to is the present Duke of Windsor.

"Would you, however, kindly give instructions to the publishers of Whittaker Almanac, and of the Official Register to delete, in their next issue, from their list of British knights, the names of Sir John Biddle, Sir Tasker Bliss, Sir P. D. Lechridge, Sir Peyton March, Sir John Pershing, Sir Hugh Rodman, Sir William Sims, Sir Joseph Strauss, and the other American knights, as their inclusion in the 1919 issue has tended to shake the American faith in our Mr. Low's ingenuity."

I do not understand the reference to "Mr. Low's ingenuity." All of the "Sirs" listed here, including "Sir John Pershing," were knighted by the King of England and their names appear in the semi-official register which is Whittaker Almanac.

> "Nevertheless, it would be well quickly to reinforce him (President Wilson) in the presidency of the League of Nations by staging the first session of the League in Washington. This will convince these simple people that they are the League and its power resides in them. Their pride in this power should be exalted. Perhaps you, yourself, might condescend to visit this country. Or, if that be impracticable, you might send such noble statesmen, and stately noblemen, as will suffice to make of the first League session a spectacle of unsurpassed brilliance,"

This is Jewish ingenuity with a vengeance. They themselves are great advertisers and great hands to put on a show, and they think that "these simple people" (meaning Americans) will be over-awed by such a spectacle!

They give us a glimpse of the character of government we are to have when we become a dominion of the British Empire, or a member of the League of Nations, which they consider the same thing:

> "By these means we hope smoothly to overcome all effective opposition on the part of our colony, America, to entering the League—that is, the Empire. As soon as the League is. functioning properly, His Majesty, in response to loyal and repeated solicitation, might graciously be pleased to consent to restore to this people their ancient right to petition at the foot of the throne; to confer the ancient rank and style of governor general upon our Ambassador, that this colony may enjoy a status inferior to no other colony's; to establish the primacy of the metropolitan see, with the Right Reverend Dr. Manning as first primate; to appoint Mr. Elihu Root lord chief justice of the colony, and to nominate Messrs. W. H. Taft, Nicholas Murray Butler, J. P. Morgan, Elisabeth Marbury, Adolph Ochs, and Thomas Lamont to the colonial privy council; as a special mark of royal and imperial condescension, to rename the Federal Capital of the colony Georgetown, and lest section jealousy be thereby excited, to grant royal charters to the cities of Boston and Chicago entitling them thereafter to style themselves, respectively, Kingston and Guelf—concisely to bestow in time and in measure such tokens of the bounty of the Crown as the fealty of the colonists merit."

Mr. Roosevelt had his hand in bringing about this war, if he is not in fact the prime mover. It was his purpose to bring about a League of Nations. He has frequently stated that he would assist in writing the peace treaty. The "United States of Europe" is none of our affair, but a League of Nations in which we are a member is a matter of importance to us. The League of Nations would probably begin as a British Empire and it would inevitably end as a Jewish Empire.

> "The object of Cecil Rhodes is almost attained. The day prophesied by Mr. Carnegie is near at hand, the day when the American Colonies will be in all thinge one with the mother-land, one and indivisible. Only the last great battle remains to be fought—the battle to compel her acceptance of the terms of the League of Nations. I have frankly stated the difficulties which confront us, and the vital necessity of the League to the British Nation."

These two huge foundations, viz: the Carnegie and the Rhodes, were established for the avowed purpose of destroying our government and re-establishing our status as a dominion of the British Empire. But far more menacing than that fact is the fact that it is also the secret purpose of the managers of the Rothschild money trust.

The prime objective on the part of the conspirators who brought about the present war, was to establish the League of Nations. The prime object of President Roosevelt was to be president of this League. If it had been established he would undoubtedly have gotten the job. He met the requirements of the protocols far better than President Wilson who was slated for it, for Wilson was an idealist with a sense of right and wrong. These characteristics are utterly foreign to Roosevelt's nature; he is a "diplomat" who rules by "cunning and make-believe." A life tenture at $100,000,000.00 a year is an attractive prospect for him and his thrifty family.

So far as the facts stated in the alleged House letter are known to me, they are true. I do not know whether the Morgan firm financed the building of the Japanese Navy, nor do I know whether the British used the $4,000,000,000.00 we loaned it, in acquiring an oil monopoly. These are facts, however, that can be easily proven if true, or disproven if untrue.

The letter quoted contains too much truth and the truth is too important to us to reject it on the mere ground that the author is unknown. It is, I submit, an authentic letter and it contains the authentic, well defined plan of the conspirators for the destruction of our government. If its statements are true, every man engaged in this conspiracy should be prosecuted and punished for high treason, the penalty for which is death and confiscation of property. Such prosecution may save the lives and fortunes of millions of innocent men and women.

There is a Rothschild Money Trust. It has grown in magnitude and power ever sinec it was established in 1812. It threatens the destruction of our government and of our civilization. The Jewish author of the alleged House letter was the representative of this Trust and thoroughly understood its plans and objectives and the best method of accomplishing them. It now controls the British Empire and the American Government. It must be destroyed or we lose our freedom.

> We are indebted to Congressman J. Thorkelson of Montana (whom they defeated), for the publication in the Congressional Record of the so-called "House letter." He stoutly-insisted upon its publication in the face of strong democratic opposition.
>
> Congressman Thorkelson states that this letter was first published in the "Geneva Hearings" and later by the Washington Pub. Co., but he does not understake to name the real author of it. No Jew would subscribe his real name to such a revealing letter; they are all too slick to commit such an indiscretion.

XXXIV.

Slavery

> "The flooding of the United States with cheap coolie labor will reduce wages, thus gradually making it more difficult for the man in ordinary circumstances to spare enough money to support his children during the time they should be in school, and thereby making it necessary for children's education to be reduced to the level of the children of the poor in England, which would tend in a very short time to make for a sharp class distinction or 'illiterate rabble.' This latter class is regarded as very desirable in England, as the more ignorant the lower classes, the more easily they are controlled." From Congressional Record, Aug. 21, 1940, p. 16378.

The text quoted above could very well have been taken from the protocols or the Talmud, for it contains the philosophy of both, viz: the enslavement of the people. It is, however, a quotation from an article by Lillian Scott Troy, published in The San Francisco Leader in February 1912, and re-published by Congressman J. Thorkelson in the Congressional Record.

The author states that it is in substance a quotation from a "book written by Lieutenant Colonel Lowther, military secretary and official mouthpiece of the Duke of Connaught." It is a frank explanation of the sordid poverty that now prevails in England and that has existed since the enactment of the Peel amendment and the repeal of the Corn laws (tariff) in 1844. This was the date the Rothschilds obtained control of the economic welfare of the people of England through the Peel amendment.

The reader should note the fact that "sharp class distinction or illiterate rabble" have been produced in England designedly. They are in fact the direct result of banker controlled prices and wages, free labor and free trade. The fact should also be noted that this poverty is regarded as "very desirable" by the Jewish plutocrats in England for the reason that "the more ignorant the lower classes, the more easily they are controlled."

We have the same powerful forces at work in this country, viz: banker control of our economy and free labor and free trade, called internationalism. These forces are producing precisely the same results that they have produced in England, and for precisely the same purposes. These results represent the philosophy of Morgan & Co., Kuhn, Loeb & Co., Franklin D.

Roosevelt, and Wendell Willkie. They represent the philosophy of the Jew Deal and the objectives of the Jew Deal Administration. It is the common purpose of all of them to elevate themselves and to enslave the people through poverty.

We have burdened ourselves with a debt of $15,000,000,000 and have entered the war through the back door to save this brand of "democracy," viz: a democracy that exalts the rich and oppresses the poor. Our plutocrats are seeking to restore our country to the British Empire in order that they may become lords, barons, counts, and sirs, and that the mass of the people may be the "illiterate rabble" and consequently "the more easily controlled."

Unfortunately, the election of Mr. Willkie promises no relief. The Jew press applauded his statement to the effect that he could not promise much hope, that we must all make sacrifices, and that we must recover the ground we have lost "the hard way." It can't be done. His acceptance speech was a ratification of the New Deal, including deflation, its reciprocal trade treaties, its conscription of an army in peacetime, and its gift of fifty of our destroyers to the British. He appears to be only a dummy candidate in order to insure the election of Roosevelt.

Messrs. Willkie and Roosevelt, however, do not themselves propose to travel "the hard way." The greatest achievement of Wendell Willkie is that he sold his power plants to the Jew Deal Administration at an exorbitant price, to-wit: $76,000,000, and that he resigned an annual salary of $75,000 to become a presidential candidate.

The Roosevelt Administration has been distinguished by the fact that it has been an exceedingly profitable one to the Roosevelt family. The Chicago Tribune estimates that the President and his family have made $2,750,000 during his seven years in office. (It would be interesting to know how much of that has been paid out in income taxes.)

Both President Roosevelt and Wendell Willkie are second-rate New York lawyers. They both appear, however, to have been first-rate promoters. They are both presidential candidates hand-picked for us by the Rothschild interest. It is not of much consequence to the Rothschilds or to the British plutocracy which one is elected, for their interests will be safe with either.

The chances are that they prefer Roosevelt because he is the smarter of the two.

The leading feature of Willkie's acceptance speech was his challenge to Roosevelt to debate. What issue? Not the tariff issue; they stand together on that. Not the destruction of the Rothschild control of our economy (which is the most important issue) ; they stand together on that. Not "taxing, lending, and spending"; they stand together on that. Not internationalism; they stand together on that. Not conscription; they stand together on that. Not the gift of our destroyers to Great Britain; they stand together on that. Not the issue of intervention in the present war; they stand together on that.

Apparently the only issue between them is which one can best administer the New Deal, which, interpreted, means which one can best serve the Rothschild interest, Roosevelt has made a pretty good job of it and there appears to be no valid reason for the Rothschilds to want a change. Indeed, it is doubtful if there will be, because if Mr. Roosevelt finds that he will likely be defeated he will declare the election off, and will be supported by his Attorney General, our democratic representatives in congress, and Willkie will accept the situation with good grace.

Mr. Willkie is reported to have said that he did not desire the support of Father Coughlin or of any other anti-Semitic. This Willkie is not worthy to touch the hem of Father Coughlin's garment. Father Coughlin is everything that Willkie is not, and Willkie is everything that Father Coughlin is not. The difference between them is the difference between daylight and darkness, between a bold patriot and a time-serving politician, between a man who seeks to elevate the masses and one who is willing to serve the selfish interests of the classes.

I appeal to the members of Congress: Many of the facts stated in these pages are probably unknown to you, but as far as you know them you must know that they are true. The facts you do not know are also true. You may wish to ignore the "House letter," but it contains too much truth to permit you to do so. You should resolve any doubt you may have regarding it, in favor of your country. You have been mis-led by the Jew press and by lies and subterfuges, but it is not too late to correct your errors.

The people have elected you to represent them and they look to you for guidance. If you fail them, if you permit the destruction of our government, you are traitors to your duty and to your country. You will be hated by your constituents and despised by the men who have used you. I appeal to the red-blooded Americans among you, of both parties, to get together and organize a party that stands for America and the American people, and against war and internationalism; and to nominate true American candidates for president, senators, and congressmen. Such a ticket will sweep the country.

I appeal to the American people to support your ticket. In the last analysis it all gets back to us, the people. Do we intend to surrender our liberty without a protest and without a fight? It is within our power to redeem our government by the ballot, and without bloodshed and revolution. We know that the election of either Roosevelt or Willkie means war and a dictatorship, and probably the submerging of our government into the British Empire. Shall we permit Roosevelt and Willkie and Morgan & Co., Kuhn, Loeb & Co., and the Rothschild trust to take over our government?

We must throw off the shackles that bind us. We must defeat our subservient congressmen. We must support any man, no matter upon what ticket, who stands for America. We must put country above party. We have the chance to save ourselves and our country in the election in November,—and this may be our last chance.

How long, oh how long, will we stand for the corrupt rule of the Rothchild trust through the two political parties? WAKE UP, AMERICANS, before it is too late!

APPENDIX I.

Protocol No. 7

"The intensification of armaments, the increase of police forces—all essential for the completion of the aforementioned plans. What we have to get at is that there should be in all the States of the world, besides ourselves, only the masses of the proletariat, a few millionaires devoted to our interests, police and soldiers.

"Throughout all Europe, and by means of relations with Europe, in other continents also, we must create ferments, discords and hostility. Therein we gain a double advantage. In the first place we keep in check all countries, for they well know that we have the power whenever we like to create disorders or to restore order. All these countries are accustomed to see in us an indispensable force of coercion. In the second place, by our intrigues we shall tangle up all the threads which we have stretched into the cabinets of all States by means of the political, by economic treaties, or loan obligations. In order to succeed in this we must use great cunning and penetration during negotiations and agreements, but, as regards what is called the "official language," we shall keep to the opposite tactics and assume the mask of honesty and compliancy. In this way the peoples and governments of the goyim, whom we have taught to look only at the outside whatever we present to their notice, will still continue to accept us as the benefactors and saviours of the human race.

"We must be in a position to respond to every act of opposition by war with the neighbors of that country which dares to oppose us; but if these neighbors should also venture to stand collectively together against us, then we must suffer resistance by a universal war.

"The principal factor of success in the political is the secrecy of its undertakings; the word should not agree with the deeds of the diplomat.

"We must compel the governments of the goyim to take action in the direction favoured by our widely-conceived plan, already approaching the desired consummation, by what we shall represent as public opinion, secretly prompted by us through the means of that so-called "Great Power"—the Press, which, with a few exceptions that may be disregarded, is already entirely in our hands.

"In a word, to sum up our system of keeping the governments of the goyim in Europe in check, we shall show our strength to one of them by terrorist attempts and to all, if we allow the possibility of a general rising against us, we shall respond with the guns of America or China or Japan.

APPENDIX II.

"Funeral Oration"
The Fatal Discourse of Rabbi Reichhorn

["(In its issue of 21 October, 1920 (No. 195) La Vieille France published an extremely important Russian document in which the following passage occurs:

" 'There is a striking analogy between the Protocols of the Elders of Zion and the discourse of the Rabbi Reichhorn, pronounced in Prague in 1869 over the tomb of the Grand Rabbi Simeon-ben-Ihuda, and published by Readcliffe, who paid with his life for the divulgation. Sonol, who had taken Readcliffe to hear Reichhorn, was killed in a duel some time afterwards. The general ideas formulated by the Rabbi are found fully developed in the Protocols,' (which were published about 35 years later).

"In its issue of 10 March, 1921, (No. 214) La Vieille France gives the version of this funeral oration which was published in La Russie Juive. It is perfectly clear that the funeral oration and the Protocols of the Elders of Zion come from one and the same mint. Both are prophetic; and the power which made the prophecies has been able to bring about their fulfillment. There can no longer be any doubt as to whose is the power which is disturbing the world, creating World Unrest, and at the same time reaping all of the profits. Jewry is enslaving all Christian peoples of the earth. There IS a Jew World Plot and it now stands finally and completely unmasked).]

"1. Every hundred years, We, the Sages of Israel, have been accustomed to meet in Sanhedrin in order to examine our progress towards the domination of the world which Jehovah has promised us, and our conquests over the enemy, Christianity.

"2. This year, united over the tomb of our reverend Simeon-ben-Ihuda, we can state with pride that the past century has brought us very near to our goal, and that this goal will be very soon attained.

"3. Gold always has been and always will be the irresistible power. Handled by expert hands it will always be the most useful lever for those who possess it, and the object of envy for those who do not. With gold we can buy the most rebellious consciences, can fix the rate of all values, the current prices of all products, can subsidize all State loans, and thereafter hold the states at our mercy.

"4. Already the principal banks, the exchanges of the entire world, the credits of all governments, are in our hands.

"5. The other great power is THE PRESS. By repeating without cessation certain ideas, the Press succeeds in the end in having them accepted as actualities. The Theatre renders us analogous services. Everywhere the Press and the Theatre obey our orders.

"6. By the ceaseless praise of DEMOCRATIC RULE we shall divide the Christians into political parties, we shall destroy the unity of their nations, we shall sow discord everywhere. Reduced to impotence, they will bow before the LAW of OUR BANK, always united, and always devoted to our Cause.

"7. We shall force the Christians into wars by exploiting their pride and their stupidity. They will massacre each other, and clear the ground for us to put our people into.

"8. The possession of the land has always brought influence and power. In the name of social Justice and Equality we shall parcel out the great estates; we shall give the fragments to the peasants who covet them with all their powers, and who will soon be in debt to us by the expense of cultivating them. Our capital will make us their masters. We in our turn shall become the great proprietors, and the possession of the land will assure the power to us.

"9. Let us try to replace the circulation of gold with paper money; our chests will absorb the gold, and we shall regulate the value of the paper which will make us masters of all the positions.

"10. We count among us plenty of orators capable of feigning enthusiasm and of persuading mobs. We shall spread them among the people to announce changes which should secure the happiness of the human race. By gold and by flattery we shall gain the proletariat which will charge itself with annihilating Christian capitalism. We shall promise workmen salaries of which they have never dared to dream, but we shall also raise the price of necessities so that our profits will be greater still.

"11. In this manner we shall prepare Revolutions which the Christians will make themselves, and of which we shall reap the fruit.

"12. By our mockeries and our attacks upon them we shall make their priests ridiculous then odious, and their religion as ridiculous and as odious as their clergy. Then we shall be masters of their souls. For our pious attachment to our own religion, to our own worship, will prove the superiority of our religion and the superiority of our souls.

"13. We have established our own men in all important positions. We must endeavor to provide the Goyim with lawyers and doctors; the lawyers are au courant with all interests; doctors, once in the house, become confessors and directors of consciences.

"14. But above all let us monopolize Education. By this means we spread ideas that are useful to us, and shape the children's brains as suits us.

"15. If one of our people should unhappily fall into the hands of justice amongst the Christians, we must rush to help him; find as many witnesses as he needs to save him from his judges, until we become judges ourselves.

"16. The monarchs of the Christian world, swollen with ambition and vanity, surround themselves with luxury and with numerous armies. We shall furnish them with all the money their folly demands, and so shall keep them in leash.

"17. Let us take care not to hinder the marriage of our men with Christian girls, for through them we shall get our foot into the most closely locked circles. If our daughters marry Goyim they will be no less useful, for the children of a Jewish mother are ours. Let us foster the idea of free love, that we may destroy among Christian women attachment to the principles and practices of their religion.

"18. For ages past the sons of Israel, despised and persecuted, have been working to open up a path to power. They are hitting the mark. They control the economic life of the accursed Christians; their influence preponderates over politics and over manners.

"19. At the wished for hour, fixed in advance, we shall let loose the Revolution, which by ruining all classes of Christianity, will definitely enslave the Christian to US. Thus will be accomplished the promise of God made to His people."

Friday, August 8, 2014

Meet Julian Assange, Limited Hangout Artist

Julian Assange created waves when he appeared a few ago threatening to expose secrets of the oppressive statist governments which rule the world. It turns out that he is nothing more than a limited hangout artist sponsored by the Rothschilds.

We admitted that we were quietly optimistic that Assange would reveal enough information to awaken Americans from their endless, hopeless, stupor, but we were disappointed. We were also disappointed that more revelations were not forthcoming from the self styled renegade intelligence connoisseur. However, we finally discovered his links to the Rothschilds, dispelling the mists of optimism for truth telling.

An interesting video published by TheGetjiggy on YouTube reveals the connections of Assange to Jewry and the Satanic Rothschilds. In a remarkable moment of candor and truth telling, the video refers to Evelyn Rothschild as "This piece of shit" earning our confidence about his story.

The producers document the elite and powerful Rothschild owned law firm Fox Rothschild, LLP as the firm which owns the United State Senate which in fact obeyed Rothschild's demands to deliver TARP funds to bail out Rothschild financial interests in the wake of the planned Lehman Brothers attack in 2008.

So after a lot of rambling, the producers show that Jemima Kahn, who through lineage is a Goldsmith, which family is tightly intertwined through marriage to the Rothschilds, used the Fox Rothschild law firm to over turn a ruling from a British judge to shutdown Assange's website leaking information.

At the same time, the Rothschild owned The Economist gave its New Media Award to Assange in 2008. Also, Mark Stephens of Finers Stephens Innocents, an advisor to the Rothschild firm Waddesdon Trust, was lawyer for Assange.

And to tie it all up, we have learned from Veterans Today that Julian Assange is a great admirer of genocide artist, murderer, and butcher Benjamin Netanyahu. So we have Rothschild family and agents defending Assange, and Assange who is a great admirer of an Israeli mass murderer who is head of state of the Rothschild colony of Israel. It seems that the circle is unbroken.

One of the interesting points of the Assange affair is the degree to which the Rothschilds have access to American - indeed worldwide - government secrets and cables. Assange was sent forth to put all governments on notice, particularly the American, who was boss, and one of those oligarchs is Evelyn Rothschild.

The other point of the Assange affair was to create a fake hero of the people, to throw them a bone to satisfy their outrage at the criminal enterprise which is the Rothschild Empire. This wicked web of satrapies is served by a skein of constituents including the Rockefeller Nazis and Bush Crime Syndicate, to name just a very few.

At the end of the day, Assange was a messenger to world leaders to instruct them to fall into line, especially the Americans. And so they did when they passed TARP, and have ever since.

http://theamericanchronicle.blogspot.com/2014/08/meet-julian-assange-limited-hangout.html

The Rothschild Dynasty

By the author of
The Committee of 300

Dr. John Coleman

Dr. John Coleman, author of The Committee of 300, tells how Mayer Amschel, the founder of the"Red Shield"dynasty acquired his first fortune. It is a far cry from the myths and legends that still surround the man who began as a rag and bone merchant and pawnbroker, working out of a small house on Judenstrasse, Frankfurt on the Main, Germany, where he lived with his wife and family.

The events attributed to history are often caused by a "hidden hand" pulling the strings of kings, princes and potentates from behind the scenes. The phenomena is explained and the legends that have grown up around the Rothschilds are demolished by this book that also reveals the Rothschild's intriguing that brought down men like Napoleon and Tsar Alexander II of Russia. Legends has it that Mayer Amschel Rothschild's "genius and financial skills" were inherited by his sons, but the truth is quite a different story, as Dr. Coleman makes very clear in this well documented account that goes far beyond the best known legends cloaking the true character of the family.

Exactly how Mayer Amschel Rothschild "stuck it lucky" and the steps he took that brought the family from obscurity to "virtual rulers of all Europe," makes fascinating reading.

This outstanding book is not only about the past, it is also about the present and the future. It will help to explain many of the events that perplex the ordinary people like the war in Iraq and the war threats against Iran.

Table of Contents

FOREWORD VII

THE ROTHSCHILD DYNASTY NOTE OF EXPLANATION XII

1. HOW A RAG AND BONE MERCHANT BECAME ONE OF THE RICHEST MEN IN THE WORLD 1

2. MAYER AMSCHEL AND FIVE SONS 7

3. THE ROTHSCHILDS GAIN ENTRY INTO EUROPE'S HIGH SOCIETY 13

4. THE WALLS OF JERICO 17

5. THE ROTHSCHILDS PLUNDER THE FIVE GREAT POWERS 21

6. BENJAMIN DISRAELI: MASTERSPY FOR THE ROTHSCHILDS 29

7. INSIDE ACCOUNTS OF THE HORRORS OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION 37

8. BISMARCK DISCLOSES "THE HIGH FINANCIAL POWERS OF EUROPE". 45

9. A MUCH OVERLOOKED ASPECT OF NEGRO SLAVERY IN AMERICA 53

10. NATHAN ROTHSCHILD SETTLES FRENCH DEBTS..63

11. FRANCE SURVIVES COMMUNIST ONSLAUGHT 73

12. SALOMON ROTHSCHILD SHOWS HIS FINANCIAL CLOUT 87

13. THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS 105

14. BRITISH GOVERNMENT TREACHERY BETRAYS ARABS AND LAWRENCE OF ARABIA 111

15. UNDERHAND DOUBLE DEALING.....117

16. "PERFIDIOUS ALBION" LIVES UP TO ITS REPUTATION 131

17. "TRIPLE CROSS" DECIDES FATE OF PALESTINE 137

18. ZIONISTS SEIZE PALESTINE..... 145

19. THE ROTHSCHILDS ESTABLISH A CENTRAL BANK IN AMERICA 149

20. THE U.S. CONSTITUTION TRAMPLED BY CORRUPT U.S LEGISLATORS.....157

21. THE ROTHSCHILDS THWART U.S. CONSTUTUTION..165

22. THE ROTHSCHILDS BREAK OPEN THE HOUSE OF LORDS 173

23. ROTHSCHILDS SURROGATE FINANCED ATTACK ON RUSSIA 183

24. SOME OPINIONS ON THE ROTHSCHILDS 191

INDEX 195

FOREWORD

The Rothschild family generally taken to mean the father and his five sons is truly a story of opportunity seized; a determined will to carry out its gains and its entry into a world of the aristocracy that did not want them. Some might consider it effrontery to talk about the huge fortune that fell into the hands and the control of Mayer Amschel Rothschild as an "opportunity," while others regard it as nothing less than misappropriation of funds entrusted to his care, hardly an "opportunity" in the generally accepted meaning of the word.

Nevertheless, for Mayer Amschel it was a godsend that lifted him out of a life of pawn-broking and selling second-hand goods, to the highest echelons of power, a remarkable achievement when one considers the history of the period, in which Jews were constrained by many civil laws designed to act as a permanent barrier between them and the people of the principalities and nations in which they lived. Class distinction was another huge barrier, which would have been daunting for even a non-Jew who was not a part of the ruling aristocracy.

Mobility of classes was unheard of and separation was harsh and strictly enforced, especially in Frankfurt on the Main, Germany, where the Rothschild dynasty began its remarkable history. Mayer Amschel Rothschild had little if any formal education; his family did not have a motto, but what he did have was tenacity of purpose and a strong belief in his religion. His was a bourgeois home, an "alien" home in the alien ghetto of Frankfurt.

Through guile, and what some unkind critics called "innate cunning," Mayer Amschel Rothschild reached right into the heady world of aristocratic families who shunned him, and who indeed, despised him. But for the "good fortune" (or "misfortune" — depending on which side one is on) of meeting the Landgrave of Hesse, Mayer Amschel Rothschild would have remained an obscure pawnbroker and peddler of rags and bones for the rest of his life. It was not necessary for him to identify himself as a Jew, of which descent he was proud, nor did Mayer Amschel ever attempt to hide his origin. On the contrary, he was proud of it, even in the face of relentless opposition to the Jews of Frankfurt, which extended to all the nations of Europe.

England, the most "civilized" of European nations as history will have us believe, was particularly fierce in its opposition to Jews. Even its leading figures, educated men, were not averse to referring to Jews in the most unflattering of terms. For instance, Lord Gladstone often referred to Disraeli, the "valet" of the Rothschilds, as "that loathsome Jew" according to Gladstone's biographer, Edward Freeman. Bishop Wilberforce called Disraeli "an Eastern Jew" in an unflattering manner. Bismarck called him "the Hebrew conjurer" and Carlyle labeled him as "the absurd Jew boy."

I mention these things as examples to show what tremendous odds were faced by Jews, even the educated among them who aspired to power in the business and financial world of the 18th and 19th centuries. Some historians and writers charge that the Rothschilds fabricated their history and their achievements to ascend to power. Their compelling presence has made a vast difference to history and it can be rightly proclaimed that no major event in the political and economic life of the nations of Europe did not somehow or somewhere involve the Rothschilds, even though deeply hidden and however indirect it may have been.

In the minds of many, the Rothschilds will always be associated with immense wealth, but it is the power, brought by that wealth, which is not as well recognized as it ought to be. For the Rothschilds did not seek a vast fortune just to be able to live a life of ease. They sought wealth for what it would bring in the way of control of the leading power brokers of all nations, through whom they exercised control of nations, which extends even to this day. The Rothschilds did not live in a vacuum; rather they affected millions of lives. Lionel Rothschild liked to think of himself as unique, and perhaps this is true. It is true that like his brothers, he was uniquely rich, but how rich was never made public. One thing is not true; the Rothschilds did not make a fortune out of inflation of the currency of the nations among whom they lived. There are no real benchmarks to guide us into the true character of the members of the Rothschild family and what drove them to an obsession with money and insatiable appetites for power.

For the most part we are left to guess at what went on in the minds of this powerful family who were determined to become the hidden rulers of Europe and Great Britain, and indeed, the world. It was not that they were aided by good looks or a pleasing manner of speech like the natural attributes of the Irish race. On the contrary, they were by all accounts distinctly ugly in appearance and coarse in manner. Meyer Amschel spoke in guttural Frankfurt Yiddish, a mixture of Polish and German with expressions drawn from the Hebrew language.

The education he gave his children did not extend beyond the rudimentary synagogue school they attended. Intellectualism was in any case prohibited to the Jews of Frankfurt who were not allowed to share in the Age of Enlightenment that swept Europe.

Mayer Amschel remained true to the instructions of the Talmud and honored all of its traditions, instructing his children to do likewise. He in no way altered his life style once fame and fortune was his. The clothes he and his sons wore were often worn until threadbare.

There are very unkind references to this fact in many of the papers and documents in the British Museum, some of them highly derogatory. It is alleged in one account by Cherep-Spiridovich that Mayer Amschel never changed his underwear and wore the same garments "until they fell off him." Writers like John Reeves, Demachy and Spiridovich conclude, in the words of the latter, that to the "political phases of this sinister and fatal family could be attributed at least one half of the all the bloodshed and calamities that have befallen the nations since 1770."

Others, like the Editor of the Chicago Tribune who knew something was going on, but could not put names to it, wrote on July 22, 1922:

> Our statesmen are children compared with theirs. A foremost place in world affairs is offered us time and again. It is thrown into our laps, and through plain stupidity, we reject it.

The question is: "Did we reject it, or did some hidden force prevent us from seizing the initiative?" Nietzsche, the German philosopher in his work The Dawn of Day wrote:

> One of the spectacles which the next century will invite us to witness is the decision regarding the fate of the Jews. It is quite obvious now that they have cast their die and crossed the Rubicon; the only thing that remains for them is to either become the masters of Europe or to lose Europe, as they once lost Egypt, where they were confronted by similar alternatives. . . Europe may some day fall into their hands like ripe fruit, if they do not clutch it too eagerly.

Those who have researched Nietzsche say he was referring to the Rothschilds, but I could find no evidence to back up this claim, although it would seem to fit the pattern of that famous family.

Many of their secrets remained totally hidden and may never be revealed. The frustration with such secrecy is revealed in the words of the French statesman, Lamartine:

> We wish to break every kind of yoke, yet there is one that is unseen, yet weighs on us. Whence comes it? Where is it? No one knows, or at least, no one tells. The association is secret even for us, the veterans of secret societies.

The French Minister for Foreign Affairs, G. Hanotoux wrote in 1878 of this hidden hand as a "mysterious force ruling politics and muddling the cards of diplomacy."

Many of these mysteries were fully cleared up by Disraeli in his novel Coningsby, which was but a thinly veiled account of the doings of the Rothschilds. Disraeli had to disguise many of the facts as fiction, lest the wrath of men should explode upon the revelations it contained. "Sidonia" was undoubtedly Lionel Rothschild and Coningsby, but a fictionalized account of his deeds:

> When he was nineteen, Sidonia who had then resided with his uncle at Naples, made a long visit to another of his father's relatives at Frankfurt. Between Paris and Naples, Sidonia passed two years. It was impossible to penetrate him. His frankness was strictly limited to the surface. He observed everything, though over-cautious, but avoided serious discussion. He was a man without affection.

Karl Rothschild lived in Naples, and Mayer Amschel lived in Frankfurt, so it does not take much to conclude, that "Sidonia" was Lionel Rothschild, and thus concluding, we obtain from Coningsby, one of the best and most accurate detailed accounts of the Rothschilds and their rise to power possibly ever written.

The Rothschild Dynasty Note of Explanation

Please note that sources and references are mentioned in the text. I felt that this would make reference easy and obviate having to search through a separate list of notes, with a loss of continuity.

In this I have followed the method and style of several authors of the Victorian era who found it the best way to continue with the narrative without the necessity of having to stop and consult and find the particular source. I hope that you too, will find this method easy to follow rather, than the traditional method.

One other important point: I want it to be understood that this work should not and cannot be construed as "anti-Jewish" or "anti-Semitic." It is neither. Rather it is a factual account of a family that happened to be Jews, and who themselves, made no secret of it. To write otherwise, would be like attempting to write an account of the Zulu King Chaka, with out saying that Chaka was a black African king.

CHAPTER 1

HOW A RAG AND BONE MERCHANT BECAME ONE OF THE RICHEST MEN IN THE WORLD

There is probably no name in international banking as well known as the Rothschild name, and yet so little of the true history of this family is known. There are many legends, myths and fanciful tales, but not much of the true character of this family, that changed the course of history who bought and sold statesman, kings, dukes and bishops, as if they were mere commodities, to be cast aside like worn out shoes and old clothes when they had served their purposes. The family is said to have caused revolutions, wars and upheavals that altered the face of Europe, the Far East and the United States, forever. The purpose of this book is to explore the Rothschild history and to come to grips with what their plan was for the world. The Rothschilds are Jews, a fact they never sought to conceal or downplay.

Throughout history, from India to Babylon to Palestine in ancient times, money matters have always been principally the trade of the Jews. In the money markets of Frankfurt, London, New York and Hong Kong, the Jewish financier predominated. By 1917 they were strung out across the world. On the stock exchanges of London, Paris and New York, Jewish brokers are the back bone of the business. The movement of precious metals, diamonds and currency throughout the world has always been under Jewish control. We recite these facts as facts in themselves and not to in any way infer anything derogatory. The Jews themselves admit to this. When preparations were being made by Britain to wage war against Germany in 1910, the international Jewish financiers were stationed in key locations, -- and at the head of international financing around the world stood the Rothschilds and their associated banking houses. In France it was Rothschild, Fould, Camondo, Pereira and Bischoffheim; in Germany, Rothschild, Warschauer, Mendelssohn, Bleichroder; in England, Sassoon, Stern, Rothschild and Montague; ~ in the Far East it was Sassoon; in Russia it was Gunzburg; in the United States it was J.P. Morgan, Kuhn Loeb and Co., Seligman and Co., Speyer and Co., Warburg and Lazard Freres.

Above all, dwarfing and overshadowing them was the House of Rothschild. Critics of the Rothschilds say that Morgan and Kuhn Loeb were merely fronts for the Rothschilds, and that all of the famous banking houses were affiliated with the Rothschild banks.

These banking houses weathered many storms due to their cautious approach to speculation and their close brotherhood and kinship to the Rothschilds and each other. The founder of the House of Rothschild was Mayer Anselm Bauer (Rothschild), the son of Anselm Moses Bauer, a merchant of Frankfurt. The father sold new and used goods and old coins, and did pawn broking under the sign of a red shield, from which the name Rothschild, German language for red shield, evolved. Rothschild became their adopted and official family name. The business was located on Judenstrasse, quite literally "Jew Street" in a ghetto in Frankfurt, numbering about 550 families.

Mayer Amschel (Rothschild) was born in 1743. The family had been in Frankfurt for generations, indeed there is a record in the British Museum that they dated back to the beginning of the 16th century. By the 18th century they were quite a large group.

I identified twenty antecedents of Mayer Amschel, the eldest of three sons whose parents were in the business of dealing in money, both buying and selling, in which he assisted from the age of ten. The small business was really a type of foreign money-exchange since at that time Germany consisted of 350 principalities, each with its own currency. Apparently they were forbidden to follow the professions open to all non-Jews in Frankfurt. There is no doubt that Jews were subject to all sorts of restrictions, some of which were rather unjust. The family home was a mock-Gothic wooden hut where Mayer Amschel lived with his mother and father and three brothers until 1775, when a massive epidemic of smallpox swept Europe, taking the lives of both of Mayer's parents. Mayer's relatives enrolled him in rabbinical school at Furth. But he did not have the patience or the liking for the long years of study needed to qualify, and after three years at Furth, at the age of thirteen, Mayer Amschel struck out on his own.

One can only admire the courage it must have taken for one so young to take such a step. Proceeding to Hanover, the young man was given a small, insignificant "charity" job at the House of Oppenheimer's bank, where within six months of his arrival he was made an apprentice. It did not take him long to conclude that to succeed at banking, one needed the protection of one of the leading princes. After six years he left Hanover and went back to Frankfurt where he married Gudule Schnapper in 1770.

Mayer and Gudule (Gutta) occupied the first floor above a shop from where Mayer bought and sold new and used goods, as his father had done before him. Many items, such as pictures and furniture, were displayed on the sidewalk. This was the home, the starting place of the "barons of banking," who were to control the world's finances and great leaders, statesmen and kings. Gudule bore Mayer five sons. Discussions with his five sons were always around a "dirty wooden table," a description given by Spiridovich in Unrevealed in History, where the family gathered for meals and talks.

The distribution of the financial world among the sons was one of the favorite topics of discussion. Their father talked about the four grandsons of Charlemagne, how the Emperors of the Romans had ruled the world and his vision for his sons. His five daughters were never included in such talks. Charles the Great (Charlemagne) (771-814) was a typical German, over six feet tall and a superb athlete who spoke Greek and Latin. He was King of the Franks and became the Emperor of Rome from 800-814 BC. Yet in spite of his veneration of Charlemagne, Mayer Amschel swore a violent hatred for all things of "Roma," which in later years he described as "the great foe of Bolshevism," according to Sir Alfred Mond in World Battle of the Jews. Samuel Gompers, writing in The Chicago Tribune of May 1, 1922 said of Bolshevism, in reference to Mayer Amschel:

> Nothing would constitute a more needless and base betrayal of civilization than the recognition of the Bolshevik tyranny. The policy of the German and Anglo-American bankers is the most dangerous element in the whole chain of Bolshevik efforts. The Bolsheviks funds amounted to millions of dollars.

The hatred displayed by Mayer might have sprung from the fact, that since 1762, Frankfurt on the Main had been the city of the election and coronations of the Holy Roman Emperors, something Mayer Amschel detested because he knew that the Catholic Church was an implacable enemy of the Bolsheviks. Some historians say that his hatred was directed to Russia, because it was the largest Christian nation in Europe and that under several of its rulers, Jews had endured many hardships and persecution.

Around the table, Mayer would warn his sons to keep their wealth in the family and never marry outside of it. He explained the Hebrew law of "neshek" meaning literally, "a bite," the word for interest and "how it was to be applied outside of, and not to, the Hebrews." Secrecy was to be paramount; no one outside of the family was ever to know how much money they had. According to author John Reeves who in his book, The Rothschilds: Financial Rulers of Nations, quotes MacGregor, author of The Kahbalaha Unmasked:

> The five sons started in business in five European capitals, but were acting in concert with each other. The business of the Rothschilds since 1812 has been so immense, and the bonds linking the different members of the family together interwoven, that to unravel them appears to be well nigh hopeless. The success achieved by the founder was due to the disturbed state of the world. Mayer Amschel was a child of fortune equally with Napoleon.

Mayer Amschel had five sons and five daughters:

Anselem Mayer, born 1773 married Eva Hannau

Salomon Mayer, born 1774 married Caroline Stern

Nathan Mayer, born 1777 married Hannah Levi Barnet Cohen 1806

Karl, born 1788 married Adelaide Herz

Jacob (James), born 1792 married niece Betty, daughter of his brother Salomon, Anselem his oldest son, received the signal honor of becoming a member of the Royal Prussian Privy Council of Commerce, Bavarian Consul and Court banker.

It may not seem like anything of great moment today, where there is no class distinction, but the rigid cast system in operation at the time made it impossible for a "commoner" to hold such positions, always reserved for the titled classes, and Jews were expressly excluded from such high office. Salomon Mayer was somehow able to force his way into the inner and most intimate circle of Prince Mettemich, the virtual ruler of Austria.

The five daughters got no shares in the business nor did they have any say in the running of it, in fact, being totally excluded. Mostly, they married under "arranged marriages." According to author John Reeves:

> The movements of the Rothschilds are carefully watched and are as important to the public as those of any Ministers. One enthusiastic enquirer was informed that it was impossible to name all the members of the family as a pedigree did not exist. (The Rothschild Financial Rulers)

At his deathbed, Mayer Amschel read from the Talmud and then compelled his children to swear a solemn oath that they would always stick together and never undertake to do anything separately, this according to Major General Count Cherep-Spiridovich, The Unrevealed in History and papers in the British Museum in London.

CHAPTER 2

MAYER AMSCHEL AND FIVE SONS MEET SINGULAR GOOD FORTUNE

While at the Oppenheimer Bank, Amschel had the singular good fortune to meet Lieutenant General Baron von Estorff, an aristocrat closest to the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassell, an extremely important family with an ancestry dating back hundreds of years.

In The Rothschild Money Trust by Armstrong, it is stated that the Landgrave was William IX: "He became a money lender and agent for William IX, Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel." The much decorated historian, soldier and writer, Count Cherep-Spiridovich describes it merely as "Amschel became the manager for the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel."

It is said that Mayer did some service for von Estorff at the expense of Oppenheim bank, the exact details of which are not known to this day.

According to my research in the British Museum, the approach was first made through the financial adviser to Wilhelm, one Karl Budurus: "Rothschild, similar in their ambitions, formidably tenacious, patient and secret, had a meeting of the minds and decided to enter into an arrangement of mutual assistances."

The details of the scheme they worked out have never been revealed. However, the Jewish Encyclopedia of 1905 and 1909 Vo. X, page 499 throws some light on it:

> In a latter connection he (Amschel) became an agent for William IX, Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, who, on his father's death inherited the largest private fortune in Europe (estimated at $40,000,000) derived mainly from the hire of troops to the British Government for putting down the revolution in the United States.. .

After the battle in June 1806 the Landgrave fled to Denmark, leaving 600,000 pounds (about $3,000,000) with Mayer Rothschild for safekeeping. According to legend, this money was hidden away in wine casks, and escaped the search of Napoleon's soldiers when they entered Frankfurt, was restored intact to the electorate. The facts are less romantic and more business-like.

The papers I examined show that the "Elector," as he became known was none too scrupulous himself as to the origin of money that flowed into his coffers. Hessian mercenaries were his stock-in-trade, hired to those who had the most money to pay for them.

The Hessians had developed their contract with the ruler, which made it clear that the Prince would receive a large down payment at the start of military operations for which they had been hired. Then, there was to be a supplementary payment to the soldiers, some extras for wounded and three times the amount if killed in battle. This was to go to the mercenaries or their dependants and not to the Prince. Moreover, the agreement-for-hire did not expire when peace was declared, but only one full year after the peace and only when the mercenaries had returned home.

The British Government was the biggest customer, "renting" about 15,000-17,000 Hessians each year. Although there is no direct proof that Amschel and Budurus were the authors of the following scheme, it seems very likely that they were. Instead of the lump sum and payments being sent to Kassel, the home of the Prince, the money was retained in England where it was invested. The interest thereon (negotiated by Amschel) was paid to the Landgrave in drafts. That portion of the money actually transferred to Kassel was then used to provide high interest loans to other needy princes. This resulted in a tremendous movement of funds in and out of Kassel with substantial income for the Landgrave, who had taken up with the Von Turn and Taxis family who held the postal monopoly for all of Europe. The mercenaries, who had done the most to earn the money, got nothing, but the bare promised amounts, as they were not privy to the "private" side-agreement done behind their backs.

The Princes of Von Thurn and Taxis (members of the Committee of 300) were happy to have a share in the booty in exchange for acting as intelligence agents for the Landgrave, and later for the Rothschilds. They did this by opening important mail as directed, reading the contents and advising the Landgrave what they had seen, and on his orders, either expediting or delaying delivery of the letters to the benefit of the Landgrave and Mayer Amschel — and to the detriment of their debtors.

(For further details of the Von Thurn and Taxis family, please refer to The Conspirators' Hierarchy, The Committee of 300, 4th Edition)

These facts are indeed far from the romantic notions of how Amschel got his start, and more fully disclosed than anything that has appeared in print before. Critics say that the facts are far from those suggested in the Encyclopedia. Cherep-Spiridovich says bluntly, that the money was not returned to the Landgrave and was in fact stolen by Amschel. In The Rothschild Money Trust, author Armstrong states:

> The facts are entirely 'less romantic.' Mayer Amschel Rothschild embezzled the money. This money was tainted from its origin. It was paid by the British Government to the Landgrave for the service of his > soldiers; used to suppress the American Revolution, and the soldiers were morally entitled to it. It was first embezzled by William of Hesse and then by Mayer Amschel. This twice-stolen money is the foundation of the huge Rothschild fortune. It has ever since been true to its origin. There is not an honestly acquired dollar in the hundreds of billions now possessed by the Rothschild family. Instead of putting the money in wine casks, Mayer Amschel Rothschild sent the entire sum to his son Nathan in London, and where he established the London branch of the family.

This was most probably the money used by Nathan to open N.M. Rothschild and Sons, the family banking house. Armstrong continued:

> For his extra-curricular services, Amschel was appointed as Imperial Agent of the Crown, a title that allowed him to travel freely without hindrances. His 'partnership' with the Princes of Von Thurn and Taxis brought valuable 'intelligence' information giving an edge on all moneylenders in competition with him. Nathan Rothschild invested it in 800,000,000 of gold (meaning worth that much and not by weight) from the East India Company, knowing that it would be needed for Wellington's peninsula campaign.

He made no less than four profits:

> 1. On the sale of Wellington's paper which he bought for 50 cents on the dollar and collected at par.
>
> 2. On the sale of gold to Wellington.

3. On its re-purchase.

4. On forwarding it to Portugal.

This was the beginning of the great fortune. How a still relatively obscure bank clerk was able to cross the gulf of social barriers that separated their classes is a classic in its own right. According to documents in the British Museum:

> . . . The prince was very greedy and stingy, and did not care much concerning the means through which his fortune, left to him by his father, Wilhelm VIII (the brother of the King of Sweden) was increased. Frederic, hearing from von Estorff about the ability and unscrupulousness of Amschel, became interested in procuring a 'man of straw' (a front man) for his doubtful procurements.

Amschel concealed his relationship with Frederic II behind a modest facade, but there is no doubt that he used his influence with the old Landgrave to gain millions as well as political advancement. He became the agent for the Landgrave of Hesse and the first government loan he arranged was in 1802, when the Danish government borrowed ten million thalers. Although it was not known at the time, the money came from the vast fortune of the Landgrave family.

To curry favor, Amschel said he would give his share of the profits to Frederic II, but never did so. From this deal, the destiny of the Rothschilds was set to become one of the most astonishing success stories in the history of financing and loans.

Frederick II was succeeded by this son, Wilhelm IX, who became Elector Wilhelm I in 1785. At this time Amschel had been something of a "Minister of Finance" to the deceased Frederick II and knew every one of the family secrets.

The two hit it of at once. Both were born in 1743. Amschel kept his true wealth from Elector Wilhelm I, always wearing the same clothes and pretending to be poor. From the time he became the manager of the fortune of Elector Wilhelm I, Amschel's fortune increased as his employer's decreased. In 1794 there occurred an event that caused Elector Wilhelm I to flee. It happened when the French General Hoche captured Coblenz. Fearing that his corrupt practices would be revealed (actually the schemes of Amschel the "front man") by the occupation, Elector Wilhelm I fled, having signed over control to Amschel.

This is the true account of how the Rothschilds got their money. It was not by pawn brokering, smart speculation or any other of the widely accepted fairy tales that sound so romantic. The genius of the sons can be traced to the fortune of the Landgrave of Hesse and not to the fanciful "genius" of the five brothers! It was a case of "theft by conversion," plain and simple. Mayer died at Frankfurt on December 12, 1812, leaving his legacy to five sons and a lesser amount for his five daughters.

CHAPTER 3

THE ROTHSCHILDS GAIN ENTRY INTO EUROPE'S HIGH SOCIETY

The manner in which Mayer left the bulk of his money to his five sons and much less to his daughters, was the hallmark of how he and his forbears regarded women as the weak link in the chain. Females were to be used for arranged marriages inside the family, for business. In other words, marriages were to be arranged with an eye to business advantages.

There was no thought of "equality" of male and female in Mayer's mind. The modern-day, Socialist-led drive for equal rights for women was something that arrived more than one hundred years later, and was largely confined to equal rights for non-Jewish women. Amschel parceled out the nations of Europe like loaves of bread, allocating his sons Germany, Austria, Britain, Italy and France as "their territories."

Later he sent one of his family relatives, a man by the name of Schoeneberg to the United States under the assumed name August Belmont. He became the hidden hand that secretly pushed through legislation to enable the Federal Reserve to become law.

The interests of the Rothschild sons became international finance and banking and they established branch offices in the major capitals of Europe, Paris, Naples, Vienna and London, each under close supervision of one of the five sons, while "Belmont" became heavily engaged in banking and Democrat Party politics in America. In a relatively short period of time the Rothschilds were able to bring all of Europe into their orbit and under their influence. They bought officials and made friends with the monarchs and princes of Europe, all the while ensuring that no outsiders came into the family. When one of the daughters began a "love relationship," it was ruthlessly crushed. She was told that the brothers regarded marriage as a business affair and that they would arrange marriages for partnerships.

It took only a generation of planning, intriguing and manipulation of public opinion to make the Rothschilds the greatest force and influence, not in only the affairs of Europe, but also in the Far East and later the United States. Intermarriages welded the family into a cohesive, solid front. By 1815, Austria led the way by granting the five brothers hereditary titles, "baron" with land ownership to go with it. Their meteoric rise to fame, fortune and power was astonishing to behold. They never made any decision or moves without close consultation with their "communication agent" and "inside information source," the Von Thurn and Taxis.

If positions of political power could not be realized, they were bought. Mayer Amschel in charge of Frankfurt, for instance, bought a seat on the Prussian Privy Council of Commerce. This was a position that in the past was open only to royalty, and his success shook the Prussian aristocracy, causing much alarm and consternation.

Following the restoration of the Bourbons (in which the Rothschilds played no small part), the youngest of the brothers, James (Jacob) was given a charter to establish a branch of the Rothschild bank in Paris.

Quick to realize the importance of railroads, James financed many of the new lines and made a huge fortune. He lent the Bourbons, always profligate spenders, millions of francs. Nathan was the genius of the five brothers. Third in line he was the one the others turned to for guidance. When the brothers decided to establish themselves in England, they sent Nathan to settle in Manchester, a grimy northern industrial town, rather than in London. The reason was that the Rothschilds had important commercial plans for the cloth trade there, which they intended to exploit to the full before moving their operation to London. Most of the fabric needed to make uniforms for the British Army and Navy originally came from Germany. Thanks to the "postal intelligence" provided by the Von Thurn and Taxis mail monopoly, the Rothschilds learned that war with Napoleon was imminent. Nathan was quickly dispatched to Germany to buy up all stocks of such cloth.

When the Manchester manufactures were given contracts by the British Government to make uniforms for the army and navy, they sent their agents to Germany to secure the necessary fabric stocks, as they had always done, only to learn that all production had already been sold to Nathan Rothschild, from whom they were now obliged to buy.

When the news reached Manchester, there followed violent uproar. At one stage Nathan feared for his safety. After five years in Manchester, in 1805 Nathan moved to London. Actually, "fled" would be a better description as indeed he was forced to do when public wrath against his dealings began to mount.

One of the principle reasons for Nathan's great success was that he realized that fast communication was the key to beating out competitors. He employed the fastest riders, ships and even carrier pigeons to communicate. He avidly sought "inside information," which he kept from his competitors and from governments. He had his secret agents in all of the capital cities of Europe.

This loyal group never hesitated to ride through the night, winter and summer. They kept the best breed of carrier pigeons and sailed on the fastest packet boats, sometimes buying all passages between France and England to block competitors.

Nathan's greatest principle of expertise was of buying government bonds that were defaulted, or about to be defaulted, at huge discounts. After a suitable time, great pressure was exerted on the governments concerned to redeem the bonds at face value, netting Nathan incredible profits. In this way he became the financial agent for more than half the governments of Europe. Some very notable people in the past declared that "civilization came to an end in 1790," among them H.G. Wells, the famous British establishment writer who said in the New York American, (July 27, 1924) that the mental and moral progress of the human race ended with the 18th century.

Wells was well thought of by the Rothschilds, who liked his idea of the League of Nations, what Wells called "a world state," which he said was inevitable. The Erlangers donated $3,000 to this purpose, as did N.M. Rothschild.

George Bernard Shaw, the Irish playwright, told Hillaire Belloc: "Something enormous happened in 1790." This was reported in the New York Times:

> There is reason to believe that they were referring to the great revolutionary movements that began between the middle and the end of the 18th century when in 1779 Amschel Rothschild became the master of the richest man on Earth, the Landgrave of Hesse Cassel.

CHAPTER 4

THE WALLS OFJERICO [FRANKFURT] COME TUMBLING DOWN

Earlier I referred to the fact that only five hundred Jewish families were allowed to live in Frankfurt Germany. The manner in which Mayer Amschel handled the problem was to become his trademark. On the birth of Napoleon's son, Grand Duke Dalberg of Frankfurt wanted to go to Paris and pay his respects, but none of the banks would lend him the money to make the trip.

Old Amschel however, saw the possibilities of putting Dalberg in his debt, and lent him eighty thousand gulden at five percent. No pressure was put on the Grand Duke to repay the loan as long as the interest was paid, but at the same time, there was no favor asked by the Rothschilds that the Grand Duke could or did refuse.

Amschel and his family were engaged in extensive smuggling operations in defiance of the French boycott of England out of which the Rothschilds made a great deal of money. Suspicion fell on Amschel, and a raid was set for May 1809.

Dalberg, who never missed a chance to borrow money from Amschel at lenient rates, tipped him off about the pending raid through his executive Commissioner of Police, von Eitzlein. Frantic activity placed contraband and incriminating documents with reliable friends, so that when Inspector Savagner and his men arrived they found old Mayer Amschel in bed, and a search failed to turn up anything incriminating. Although Napoleon's Trade Boycott inspectors had come up empty-handed, Amschel was nevertheless still fined 20,000 francs, a mere pittance, but he escaped going to prison, which would have happened had the contraband been discovered by the inspectors.

When the fuss had died down, Amschel tackled the problem of restrictions on the number of Jewish families allowed to reside in Frankfurt. He approached Dalberg, who still owed him the principle sum of the loan.

By law, each Jewish family had to pay an annual fee of 22,000 gulden to remain in the city. Amschel and one of his partners, a certain Gumprecht, persuaded the Grand Duke to accept one lump sum that would give the Jews citizenship rights in Frankfurt, the very thing so strongly opposed by the Christian majority. More than that, Amschel demanded not only equal citizenship, but in addition, the Jews would be allowed to establish their own ruling bodies and councils.

The greedy Dalberg demanded that the lump sum proposed by Amschel be twenty times the total annual fee. Amschel and his friends met the demand with 294,000 gulden in cash and the balance in bearer debentures.

In a letter to the Grand Duke confirming the arrangement and terms, Amschel showed that when humble obsequious behavior was necessary he was a master of the art:

> If I could be the messenger of the good news, as soon as it has been signed by His Royal Highness our most excellent Lord and Great Duke, in favor, and that I can inform my nation of their great joy, you will graciously inform me of it through the post, confess I abuse your goodness and grace, but I do not doubt that your Highness and your honored family have to await great heavenly rewards and will receive much happiness and blessing because in truth our whole > Jewry, if they have the happiness to obtain equal rights will gladly pay with great pleasures all dues the citizens have to pay.

Note how Amschel boldly asserted that the Jews of Frankfurt were a separate nation. The agreement was some time in getting passed, but when it did, Amschel immediately announced the establishment of the Governing Body of the Israelite Religions Community with von Eitzlein (a Jew) the first president, perhaps rewarded for tipping Amschel to the planned raid for contraband in May 1809. The Senate and the Christians were furious and immediately attacked the agreement as giving special privileges to the Jews.

Rumors flew thick and fast that Dalberg had received a substantial payment, which he had not made public. Feeling against Dalberg and the Jews reached fever pitch. Accusations of bribery for exchange for equal rights filled the air. With the fall of Napoleon, Dalberg was deposed and replaced by Baron von Hugel of the Hessians.

Amschel was not afraid of Austria or Prussia, he had their governments in the palm of his hand, but he feared that when the Congress of Vienna decided the status of Frankfurt in 1814, the Dalberg agreement would not be honored. He sent Jacob Baruch and a certain Gompers as his representatives, but the Vienna police had them under surveillance as revolutionaries and ordered them to be expelled.

However, Prince Metternich, who had been created by Nathan Rothschild, just as Adam Weishaupt, Napoleon, Disraeli and Bismarck were all mere puppet-creations (or "valets") of the Rothschilds, cancelled the order. Bribery and corruption were quite openly practiced.

Humbold was offered three beautiful emerald rings worth a fortune, plus four thousand ducats, which he refused. Metternich's secretary, Frederick von Gentz however accepted the bribes offered, and was forever thereafter a most valuable conduit to the powerful Austrian nobility and political leaders for the Rothschilds.

When news of Napoleon having landed on French soil from his exile in St. Helena reached the Congress, the "Jewish question," had to be shelved. The Congress of Vienna was the first world conference to be dominated by the international bankers, and the Rothschilds contributed very heavily to the control the banker's exercised over the decisions that were taken.

CHAPTER 5

THE ROTHSCHILDS PLUNDER THE FIVE GREAT POWERS

Count Buol-Schauenstein, Austria's representative, was outraged by the Dalberg-Rothschild deal with Frankfurt's Jews:

> Trade is still the only means of livelihood the Jews adopt. This nation, which never amalgamates with any other, but always hangs together to pursue its own ends will soon overshadow Christian firms; and with their terribly rapid increase in population they will soon spread over the whole city, so that a Jewish trading city will gradually arise beside our venerable cathedral.

I spent considerable time researching documents in the British Museum, which in any way referred to the family in order to qualify to write about the rise of the Rothschild dynasty, much of what came from that source. Baron James became a great personality. Kings and ministers were obliged to reckon with him and he justified this by financing a loan of 520 million francs to the Government of the Restoration, which needed the money after the great wars of the Revolution and of the Empire. In his Juifs de l'Epoque Toussenei wrote:

> One can take the fatal year 1815 as the era of new power; though prior to this date the coalition of > bankers who bought great upset the campaign of Moscow and Waterloo — these are to remembered for the interference of Jews in our (French) national affairs. . . In 1815 France was condemned to pay 1,500 million francs in war indemnity became the prey of international financiers of Frankfurt, London and Vienna who became as one to exploit her calamity. James Rothschild paid for each government bond of 100 francs only 50 francs and received five francs as interest, which made ten percent on the money, loaned and the following year the principle began to return twofold. James became the lender of Kings. This added to his speculation on the Exchange where he was able to influence the rise and fall of stocks swelled the baron's earnings into millions.

>
> Between 1815 and 1830, the Rothschilds were simply plundering the five great powers; England, Russia, France, Austria and Prussia. Thus Prussia contracted a 5% loan of 5,000,000 pounds sterling, but received for its government bonds only 3,500,000 or 70%, making the actual interest rate over 7%. But the chief point of it was that the bonds had to be redeemed in a few years at 100%. The Rothschilds made a profit of 1,500,000 pounds sterling, plus the interest. In 1823 James took up the whole of the French loan.

According to Professor Werner Sombart in his work The Jews and Modern Capitalism: The period of 1820 onwards became the age of the Rothschilds, so that by the middle of the century it was common dictum, there is only one power in Europe, and that is the Rothschilds. As previously explained, the work of fiction, Coningsby, by Disraeli was a thinly disguised account of the life of Nathan Rothschild II, and extremely revealing:

> His father [Nathan Rothschild] had established a brother in most of the principal capitals. Here he was lord and master of the money markets of the world, and, of course, virtually lord and master of everything else. He literally held the revenues of Southern Italy in pawn [through Karl Rothschild in Naples] and monarchs and ministers of all countries courted his advice and were guided by his suggestions. Between Paris and Naples, Sidonia [Lionel] passed two years. Sidonia has no heart; he is a man without affections.

This was the work dictated to Disraeli by Nathan Rothschild and put out as fiction, but there is no history of the Rothschilds more accurate than this. Who was Disraeli?

In La Vielle France N-216, Bismarck said that Disraeli was a mere tool of the Rothschilds and that it was Disraeli and the Rothschilds who formulated the plan to dismember the United States through a massive Civil War. Disraeli was only one of their creations whom they brought from obscurity to fame. His grandfather, Benjamin D'Israeli, arrived in England in 1748. His son, Isaac D'Israeli was born in 1766 and soon became a Bolshevik. One of his works was called Against Commerce.

Of his father Disraeli said: He lived with learned men. The learned men were Nathan Rothschild and his circle. Incidentally, "El-Israeli" (D'israeli?) is an Arabic name of Turkish origin used in the Middle East to denote people of Jewish descent. It is likely that his father's family came from Turkey to Italy and most likely, settled in Ancona or Cento. Isaac's field was writing and like many a researcher before him, he frequented the British Museum. He was also an importer of straw hats, marble and alum, but Isaac longed to write.

In 1788 his father sent him to study in France, Italy and Germany. He returned to England in 1789 and wrote The Curiosities of Literature, which was published by the Socialist, John Murray. A literary success, it ran to thirteen editions. Benjamin probably inherited his writing skills from his father. Born in 1804 into a family of moderate means, Benjamin was circumcised on the eighth day according to the Jewish custom, and grew up in the Jewish faith. Although proud of it, we are led to believe that he knew at an early age that as far as public office, his "Jewishness" would be a drawback because in England at that time, Jews were barred by religion from becoming members of any political party.

But on the orders of Nathan Rothschild, at the age of thirteen Benjamin was baptized on July 31, 1817 as a Christian so that he might penetrate English society and the political establishment, which at the time was closed to Jews by the Test Acts. His orders from Nathan Rothschild were to break down every barrier against the Jews.

At one time he told Lord Melbourne, the Home Secretary: "I am going to be the Prime Minister of England," which Melbourne thought fanciful and impossible. Of course Melbourne did not know at that time about Disraeli's "Rothschild" connection. But first, the necessary financing had to come from somewhere. At twenty-two he began "speculating" on the Stock Market, a highly unlikely occupation for a man who was always without any money.

A certain Thomas Jones — more than likely an assumed name - came up with two thousand pounds to start with, increasing to nine thousand pounds — a huge sum of money at the time to invest in a penniless writer of no experience! It does not take much imagination to come to the conclusion that "Thomas Jones" was Nathan Rothschild.

As was the case with the biographers of Napoleon I, Bismarck, Mettemich, Marshal Soult (who betrayed Napoleon at Waterloo), Karl Marx, Bombelles, Lassalle, Hertz, Kerensky and Trotsky praise for Disraeli, a former non-entity, was lavish. J.G. Lockhart, Sir Walter Scott's son-in-law, was beside himself when in 1825 he wrote:

> I may frankly say that I never met a young man with greater promise. He is a scholar, a hard student, a deep thinker, a great energy, equal perseverance, an indefatigable application, and a complete man of business. His knowledge of human nature and the practical tendency of all of his ideas, have often surprised me in a young man who has hardly passed his twentieth year.

Another bedazzled friend wrote:

> He had no rank, no important friends, no wealth, but he was an able scholar who dazzled the establishment with his audacity of conception, brilliant triumphs. He had that supreme confidence in himself, which amounts to virtual genius. He never showed discouragement. Of course! Backed by Nathan Rothschild he had the world at his feet. If only history could be rewritten!

> The English aristocracy was not destroyed by the "French" Revolution and they remained implacably opposed to the Jews until Disraeli on behalf of the Rothschilds, defeated them. Disraeli was the Trojan Horse, slipped into the very heart of English society and its political establishment.
> (Count Cherep-Spiridovich and British Museum papers)

In December 1922, the British Guardian published an article by Dr. John Clarke, which is worth quoting:

> And how this potent firm [the Rothschilds] governs the Government of France and England alike may be gathered from two recent incidents. The French Secretary of the Legation, M. Thierry at the Embassy > of London some months ago married a Jewess of the Rothschild clan. And now the hidden mentors of Bonar Law's [the British Prime Minister who promised to follow the policies of Disraeli] new 'Conservative' Government induced him to send as Ambassador to Paris a non-diplomatic 'Liberal,' the Marquise of Crewe, whose wife is the daughter of Hannah Rothschild, Countess of Roseberry. Here we have the actual basis of the Franco-British Entente — 'R.F.' meaning Rothschild Freres, the Rothschild brothers, covers the British Empire, the French Republic and most of the other republics and kingdoms between Moscow, Angora and Washington.

Who opened the way for such astonishing changes in the English political scene? It was Disraeli, who "controlled" Prime Minister Bonar Law. In the Life of Disraeli by Buckle, the author gives no hint of who made Disraeli: "No career in English history is more marvelous than that of Disraeli, and none has hitherto been enshrouded in greater mystery."

Actually, there was no "mystery" at all. But for Nathan and his son Lionel Rothschild, Disraeli would have never existed outside of his small, narrow family circle. From 1832 to 1837 Disraeli was in deep trouble over unpaid debts. In April of 1835, he was forced to spend a great deal of his time indoors to "prevent being nabbed by the creditors," as he wrote in a letter to Lady Henrietta Sykes, his mistress.

In August 1835, Disraeli went to Bradenham, there to escape his creditors. One of them was a certain Austen who was threatening to have him arrested and sent to a debtor's prison. At Bradenham, he tried to write his novel Henrietta Temple. At this period, his debts were overshadowing his writing. In July, another of his creditors, a Thomas Mash who had been pressing for payment, now grew strident and Disraeli walked in fear (when he did venture outside) of imminent arrest.

Perpetually in deep financial trouble, deeply in debt at the age of twenty and unsuccessful in getting a seat in the House of Commons, which he had tried from 1832 to 1837 to accomplish, the Rothschilds, who had been watching him since the age of ten, made him their "valet."

In writing to his sister Sarah in 1849, Benjamin admitted as much. The year was the worst financial period in his life. He was being harried by his creditors and had to appear before an Assize Court when as he said in his letter to Sarah "Mayer Rothschild unintentionally let the cat out of the bag."

Disraeli did not "raise England to the highest position" as claimed by Buckle. Instead, what he did was to prepare England for a series of disastrous wars. He frightened generations of Englishmen with his lies about a "great Russia" being a danger and a threat for Great Britain. Prime Minister Gladstone accused Disraeli of lying. Was he sincere about the alleged Russian "danger?"

Lord Gladstone said there were only two things he was "in earnest about, his wife and his race." Gladstone evidently didn't know that Benjamin was "in earnest" about the Rothschilds of whom he seldom talked, perhaps because of the fact that nobody, no matter what their rank, could cross the Rothschilds with impunity. Benjamin Disraeli was the man of the hour for the Rothschilds; Lionel, Mayer, Anthony and their families, including the Montefiores. In a letter to his sister Sarah, he wrote, that after his honeymoon, there had been a party at the home of Mrs. Montefiore and there was "not a Christian name there."

No doubt Benjamin performed yeoman service for his mentors, providing them with "intelligence" from his high office. It is known that it was one such "spy job" that allowed the Rothschilds to float the lucrative Suez Canal loan.

Described as a "coup" engineered by Disraeli, the facts are not quite that simple. Through his secret "intelligence" service, Disraeli learned that the Khedive of Egypt, Ishmail Pasha wanted to sell his shares in Compagnie Universelle de Suez.

Thanks to the "intelligence" provided by the Von Thurn and Taxis control of mail, on November 15, 1875, Disraeli was advised that the Khedive was negotiating with two French banks for the sale of the stock. Disraeli immediately rushed to Baron Lionel de Rothschild who agreed to float a loan for the British Government for this purpose. The secret plan was hatched by Lionel and Disraeli and was presented to the British Cabinet for acceptance on November 24th. The skill of Lionel in moving so fast was not mentioned, and so, in the eyes of the public, it remained a "Disraeli coup."

This account taken from the collected works of Major-General Count Cherep-Spiridovich goes a long way to dispelling the myths and legends that sprang up around the life and times of Nathan Rothschild, his extended blood relatives and their families, who lived in London, and the legendary DTsraeli.

CHAPTER 6

BENJAMIN DISRAELI:

MASTERSPY FOR THE ROTHSCHILDS

It was a two-way street; with the Rothschilds always ready to bail Benjamin out of financial trouble, particularly in 1835, 1849, 1857 and 1862 when his debts amounted to what today would have been about $300,000 without means of payment. With his enemy, the Duke of Portland hounding him, he was "loaned the money" by a front man for Baron de Rothschild, one Philip Rose, who just happened to be staying at the same resort and spa hotel in Torquay at the same time as the Baron Rothschild. We are led to believe, that Rose persuaded Rothschild to loan the money Disraeli needed. Situated on the East Coast of England, Torquay was a fashionable resort town, boasting fine hotels and spas, often patronized by royalty and its hangers on. In a letter to his sister in December of that year, Benjamin wrote: He likes to give to his friends, not to lend, as he never takes interest from me. ..

I propose to look at the history of some of the world's best-known figures and to attempt to discover what role the Rothschilds played in their lives. I shall also examine revolutions and wars for the same reason. This is a daunting task, but it is one that is long overdue.

There have been so many lies in establishment history that our senses reel and I wonder how the truth can ever be made known to the ordinary people of this world, who have had to bear the brunt of those upheavals and have never known why they had to make such terrible sacrifices. Of course they have the propaganda explanations which satisfy most, but to the thinker, it has never been enough just talk about "patriotism," "love of country," "making the world safe for democracy" and fighting a "war to end all wars." I cannot go too far back in history, so let us begin with some of the most explosive upheavals to hit the world beginning with the 18th century and the personalities involved and then continue through to the 20th century. Limitations of space restrict to the more salient features of these events.

Although there is no hard evidence that the Rothschilds were involved in the cataclysmic "French" Revolution, historians tend to believe that they were behind it, acting through some of their agents. Their well-known hatred of Christianity and their desire to rid France of the Christian monarchy that it represented was the driving force behind the revolution. Opposition to Christianity was the factor believed to have motivated the Rothschilds to take indirect action to confront it at every opportunity.

One thing has emerged clearly from the past; every war fought since then has been for the advancement of International Socialism, of which the Rothschilds were avid supporters.

It is stated in papers in the British Museum that the Rothschilds were deeply involved in all revolts and wars since 1770. Indirectly, there is evidence that a branch of the Rothschilds was involved in financing the French Revolution through the bank of Moses Mocatta, uncle of Sir Moses Montefiore, whose brother, Abraham Montefiore, was married to Jeanette, the daughter of Mayer Amschel.

Mayer Amschel's son, Nathan, married the sister-in-law of Sir Moses Montefiore in 1806. Another daughter of Abraham Montefiore, Louisa, married Sir Anthony Rothschild in 1840.

History records the Jewish banking houses of Daniel Itzig, David Friedlander, Herz Geribeer and Benjamin and Abraham Goldsmidt, were the principal financiers of the "French" Revolution. It is interesting to note of the fifty-eight marriages contracted by the descendants of Mayer Amschel; twenty-nine and a half were between first cousins.

From 1848 onward, the pace quickened. Marx established that all wars must be for the advancement of International Socialism and Lenin and Trotsky enshrined it in the Communist doctrine. The First World War was fought to establish Bolshevism in Russia; to establish a "home for the Jews in Palestine," to destroy the Catholic Church and dismember Europe.

The first attempt at One World Government was launched in the disguise of the League of Nations. The Second World War was fought to destroy Japan and Germany, to establish the USSR as a Communist world power and extend the reach of Bolshevism over three quarters of the world. In the aftermath the United States was gulled into joining the next attempt at One World Government, the United Nations.

The Second World War changed the make-up of the United States, which was forced by its large contingent of International Socialists in positions of power to wean itself from its Constitution and its Republican form of government, and take on the role of the world's new Roman Empire. In short, the United States was turned from its Christian Republican form of government into an imperial power to conquer the world for and on behalf of International Socialism.

Behind these powerful changes stood the power, the money and the guiding hand of the Rothschilds. I shall attempt to make way through the major events that triggered these and other wars.

At the time the revolution burst upon France, the nobility and clergy were liberal toward French citizens. They had freedom to work and freedom of the press according to the book by Louis Diste, Freemasonry and Terror, which he says is proved in the archives prior to August 10, 1789 -- everything that the French people wanted in the way of liberty, freedom from excess taxes and freedom of religion had all been granted. If there is one thing I learned from history it is that there is an evil power that hates and fights to the death all forms of liberty, freedom and justice for the ordinary men of the world.

Each time such a system of government was established — these evil, secret rulers came along and overturned those benevolent governments by means of extreme violence and extreme cruelty. An example is Russia, where Tsar Alexander II had agreed to a new constitution.

His minister, Stolypin, had set the machinery in motion to grant lands to peasants and to nationalize banks; Nicholas had forbidden wars by his threat to "fire on the first who fires" and the Tsars were known as the most cultured, learned and gracious people in the world. Stolypin was cruelly murdered by Bolshevik revolutionaries to prevent the freedoms and reforms promised by the Tsar from being put into practice.

On August 4, 1789, eighty three unknown men, shouting "we are the 300," (thereby inadvertently exposing the hidden hand of their controllers) seized the City Hall in Paris.

The City Hall in France is typically the center of the civil administration. Robespierre and Danton did not immediately join the blood lust that followed. Stephane Lausanne, editor of La Matin of Paris said in an article on January 6, 1923:

> We French believe, that we know all about the forces of our planet. But we know nothing of the men whose names the masses could not even rightly spell. These men, more powerful than Caesar or even Napoleon, rule the fate of the Globe. These men rule the Chiefs of States, control and subdue the governing > personages, manipulate the exchanges, and initiate or suppress revolutions.

Of course he was writing about the 7 Rothschilds and the Committee of 300. What he did not know was that the Rothschilds created and controlled Napoleon as their instrument, and that they disposed of him once the Corsican genius woke up to this fact and went into a state of rebellion, the first manifestation of which came when he divorced his wife, the Creole, Josephina. Philip Francis, writing in the New York American under the title The Poison in America's Cup stated:

> Nominally we govern ourselves; actually we are governed by an oligarchy of the American branch of The International Banker's Federation, Plunderbund. The British Government is the camouflage behind which the money kings of the world have hitherto hid their economic warfare upon the masses of the people.

There is no direct proof that the Rothschilds were implicated in bringing on the French Revolution to happen, but there is ample evidence that Mirabeau was a member of the Les Amis Reunis as was his partner, Talleyrand. Mirabeau and Talleyrand discovered Napoleon, an obscure army officer. It is believed that many of the details of the French Revolution were discussed at the palace of the Landgrave of Hesse at Wilhelmsbad where it is known the leading Freemasons often gathered, which is the connection with Mayer Amschel, who headed "the deadly secret conclave beyond the masons and unknown to them" where the "French" Revolution was plotted.

There was also the connection with Adam Weishaupt, founder of the Illuminati through Wilhelmsbad. The Rothschild Money Trust, page 17 states:

> It is also admitted, as they allege, that the Illuminati played a major role in bringing on the bloody days of 1789, that it was founded and reputedly financed by Jews and that the great House of Rothschild was then just rising to financial heights. There is evidence that it was in fact financed by the 'great House of Rothschild' and that the French Revolution was in fact brought about by Jews. It was the final act that freed the Jews from their political and civil disabilities in France.

Unfortunately for history, The Rothschild Money Trust does not provide sources that could support the claim that the French Revolution was financed by the Rothschilds.

In 1782 after "acquiring" the huge fortune of the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, Amschel sent for Weishaupt who at the time was living the life of a beggar. Weishaupt was a man of low degree then struggling to find money to pay for an illegal abortion that had been performed on his sister-in-law. After his interview with Amschel, Weishaupt appeared in Paris with millions of francs at his disposal. He "imported" at least 30,000 criminals of the worst type and set them up in dens in Paris. He did the same thing in Germany. When all preparations were completed and the stage was set in 1789, all hell broke loose in Paris. According to author Pouget St. Andre, a chronicler of the revolution that burst upon France, Danton was a Jew as was Robespierre whose real name was Ruban. Pouget St. Andre, author of Les Auteurs de la Revolution Francaise, posed the question which to this day has never been answered:

> Why did the Convention shed so much blood? They say that the bloodshed was caused by the hatred of the people against the privileged class. How could the small percentage of executed aristocrats be explained by only 5% of all condemned? Why were the reforms bought for 4 billion francs and 50,000 heads when Louis XVI was already offering them free?"

Ernest Renan in his work, La Monarchic Constitutionally en France, wrote: The murder of King Louis XVI was an act of the most hideous materialism, the most shameful profession of ingratitude and baseness, of most roturiere villainy and forgetfulness of the past. Nothing, but bloodlust was served by those who put the king to death.

CHAPTER 7

INSIDE ACCOUNTS OF THE HORRORS OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION

All those who had done the work of the secret societies and their henchmen trying to seize France were later executed, some horribly, and with the utmost cruelty, including Danton and Robespierre, one imagines, to silence them lest they were ever tempted to reveal whom the persons behind the revolution were. Murder, then as now, was the favorite weapon employed against those who sought to thwart the will of the "300."

Lord Acton, writing in his Essay on the French Revolution made this observation:

> The appalling thing is not the tumult but the design. Through all the fire and smoke we perceive the evidence of a calculating organization. The managers remain studiously concealed and masked, but there is no doubt about their presence from the first.

We shall come to the Russian-Japanese conflict in 1904, and who set it up, financed it and what their reasons were, but for now, in passing, we shall quote what the Editor of the New York Evening Post said on December 9, 1924:

> Somewhere behind the fog-bank of propaganda, sinister unseen hands are seeking to destroy the > peaceful relations between Russia and Japan. Japan does not want war. Certainly America does not want war. Why then, this perennial clamor that Japan is an enemy to be watched, distrusted, armed against, and finally fought?

Of all of the historical figures in the past three centuries, none is better known than Napoleon. Yet not much is ever said about how he rose from obscurity to fame.

Like most of those "adopted" by the Rothschilds, Napoleon was dirt poor when Talleyrand introduced him to the Rothschilds. He did not have the money to pay the laundry shop bill, and had only one shirt. His uniform had been supplied by Josephine Beauharnais, whom he later married after Count Paul de Barras had cast her off as his mistress.

In 1786 Napoleon was a sub-lieutenant, a poor very junior officer without any money, going from door-to-door seeking employment to supplement his pay. It was a time when the people of Europe had grown tired of "Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity." Amschel was disappointed that Weishaupt had made little progress against the Church, particularly, the Catholic Church, and was seeking "new talent." The fire and ardor of the Corsican impressed Amschel enough to set him up with sufficient money to live decently. H. Fischer, in an article seen in the British Museum wrote: "In 1790 Napoleon succeeded by means, even then judged to be unscrupulous in securing his election as second in command of a whole battalion. "

How did he do it? Charles MacFarlane, in his work The Life of Napoleon (it used to be in the British Museum where I read it) threw some light on this "astonishing climb to power:"

> Augustine Robespierre, the younger brother of the terrible Dictator, had become acquainted with > Bonaparte at the taking of Toulon in 1798. The fact is indisputable that he contracted an intimacy, having all the appearances of warm friendship with Augustine, who was to be fully as pitiless as his elder brother.

According to the autobiography of Wolf Tone (Barry 1893) Robespierre was an Illuminist.

A nominal Christian, Napoleon soon sensed the hatred for Christianity that burned in the breast of Amschel, and so he resorted to simulation to please his new money supplier. He turned against the Catholic Church. The humiliation of the Pope was a very pleasing prospect to Amschel, and money began to flow into Napoleon's pockets in ever-increasing amounts.

Thus is his "stunning rise to power," his "astonishing successes" explained! As we say in modern parlance, the writers and biographers of Napoleon failed to follow the money trail.

The failure of Weishaupt to destroy the Catholic Church, the purpose for which he was "constructed" by Amschel was galling, but when Napoleon was brought to his attention, the whole work was shifted to him. The way it was to be accomplished was planned in the Mason lodges in Paris frequented by Talleyrand and in Frankfurt by Amschel.

It was Talleyrand who told Napoleon: War is the only way you can destroy the Church. This was acknowledged by H.G. Wells who called the Corsican genius "a wrecker, (of the revolution) hard, competent, capable, possessing initiative," but he failed to mention his financial backer, without whose masses of money, these traits of character would not have availed him much.

Like Kerensky, Trotsky, Disraeli, Lloyd George and Bismarck, Amschel took over Napoleon when he was of no importance, and made of him, the most important man in Europe. Although H.G. Wells complained that he did not continue the revolution, this was not the point. When Amschel had Napoleon appointed the First Consul for life by a large margin of votes, the stage was set to ring up the curtain on Europe.

As long as he carried out the mission set for him by Amschel, the destruction of the Christian Monarchies and of the Catholic Church, Napoleon bore a charmed life, going from one success to another. A good book I found in the British Museum was by Sidney Dark in which he wrote, How Great Was Napoleon:

> Napoleon, born without any advantage of wealth or high descent, made himself master of the world before he was 35 and finished his career of unparalleled romantic impossibility when he was 46.

This completely overlooks the powers behind Napoleon, Amschel and his millions and the planners inside the Mason lodges of Paris and Frankfurt. On March 9, 1796, Napoleon married Josephina de Beauharnais, a Creole woman with insatiable sexual appetites who had once paid for his uniform. The marriage was arranged by the Rothschilds through Count Paul de Barras who also appointed Napoleon Commander in Chief of the Army in Italy.

Josephina was the mistress of de Barras, but tiring of her, he sought to end the relationship, and to avoid her oath to take revenge on him, Count de Barras arranged for her to marry Napoleon, hardly the "romantic" spin put on the occasion by practically every writer on the life and times of Napoleon.

Josephine helped de Barras by giving him confidential details imparted to her by her husband, which of course went straight to the Rothschilds. Napoleon's coronation in 1804 was treated with indifference by Amschel, but he became alarmed when the Pope was invited. The Rothschilds were dismayed and angry when Napoleon divorced Josephine and married the Arch-Duchess Maria Louisa in 1810. The Rothschild's recognized that henceforth there would be less and less chance to destroy kingdoms and smash the Catholic Church.

From 1810 the die was cast against Napoleon and James Rothschild was seconded to the task of ruining their former hero. The full story of the gradual disillusionment of Napoleon, his awakening to the knowledge that he was not fighting for France, but rather for an alien power to further its grip on the nation as a necessary follow-on to the revolution, the role of the Illuminati and the Masons in his career, made him more and more angry. The awakening was slow to come, and painful, but once his mind was opened to the truth, Napoleon began to rebel against his controllers. In his work, History of Napoleon, G. Bussey says that Napoleon changed, lost his fierce desire for war and declared; Thank God I am at peace with the world.

The Rothschilds now had no further use for their former tool. They financed and set up a front called A League Against Napoleon. The mentors whom Napoleon had begun to neglect were now turned against him. Karl Rothschild hastened to despoil relations between the Pope and Napoleon, and without the knowledge of Napoleon, ordered the arrest of the Holy Father carried out by General Radet. The Pope reacted with an Excommunication Bill against the Emperor.

Napoleon had been trying to win over the Pope. He felt the ground quaking beneath his feet as events, one after another, went against him. An attempt to assassinate him by Illuminati agent Stapps was foiled by the vigilance of General Rapp.

The Russian campaign was plagued by supply problems and lack of food. Napoleon did not understand that it was deliberate sabotage of his army. He was forced to order a retreat from Moscow, during which thousands of soldiers dying from wounds and the cold were mercilessly shot to death by Rothschild's agents coming up in the rear.

The loss of Christian lives was horrendous. With the failure to win over the Pope, Napoleon became seriously concerned as his confidence ebbed away. He noted this:

> The Pope could have been won over as additional means of binding together the federated parts of the Empire. I should have had my religious as well as my legislative sessions. My councils would have constituted the representatives of Christianity, and the successor of St. Peter would have been the President.

Too late, as Karl Rothschild had already seen to it that such a plan would not succeed. No historian can tell why Napoleon attacked Russia in 1812. Theories abound but none of substance. Alexander I said of the attack: "Napoleon waged war on me in the most odious fashion and has deceived me in the most treacherous manner." For his part, Napoleon told General Gourgaud:

> / did not want to make war on Russia. Bassano and Champagny [Ministers of Foreign Affairs] persuaded me that the note of Russia was meant as a declaration of war. I really thought that Russia wanted war. What were the real motives of the campaign in Russia? I do not know, possibly the Emperor himself did not know more than I did.

The Rothschilds ruined Napoleon at the Battle of Waterloo. He was betrayed by Marshal Soult, a man he had befriended, but who was in the pay of the Rothschilds. Napoleon made Soult the Duke of Dalmatia with a salary of millions of francs and appointed him Marshal of the Army. At Waterloo, Soult failed to take and hold Gemappe, an important village to anchor the flank of Napoleon's army.

Worse yet, Marshal Grouchy who was supposed to provide reinforcements arrived 24 hours too late, even though he heard the guns and knew that the battle had been joined. Of Soult, Napoleon complained bitterly:

> Soult, my second in command at Waterloo, did not aid me as much as he might have done. . . His staff, in spite of my orders, was not organized. Soult was very easily discouraged. . . Soult was worth nothing. Why during the battle did he not keep order at Gemappe?

Worse yet, on the morning of the battle, an enemy inside the Corsican's personal staff put a substance in his breakfast that caused him to suffer a terrible migraine. Such is the power of the Rothschilds and the falsification of history; but for the treachery and treason committed against him, Napoleon would have soundly defeated Blucher and Wellington. Soult served his masters well; they gave him some of the highest offices in France. That he was the father of Bismarck has often been suggested, but never proved. At one time Bismarck's mother was Soult's mistress, as confirmed by Bismarck: Not my talents or capacities made me great, but the fact that my mother was the mistress of Soult, [one of the 300] who all helped me.

Bismarck was "made" by the Rothschilds through the Menkens. His father, William, had married a Louise Menken, whom Count Cherep-Spiridovich said was a Jewess. Marshall Soult, who betrayed Napoleon at Waterloo, was a member of the Committee of 300, who occupied the top posts in France until his death.

Soult was often in attendance of William Bismarck country residence and was widely believed to be the father of younger Bismarck. It was this "hold" over Bismarck mother that kept young Bismarck under the control of James Rothschild. In 1833, Bismarck was up against tough times and in danger of losing his property. Through Disraeli, James Rothschild befriended the young Bismarck and sought to create his as a "conservative" future leader of Europe. Oscar Arnim, a member of the Reichstag married Bismarck's sister, Malian.

Following the marriage Bismarck was totally under the direction of Lionel Rothschild. That Bismarck knew it was clear from a statement made by Walter Rathenau in 1871:

> To those who insisted upon treating Bismarck as a great political genius, a man of fate, marked, like Napoleon with the seal of a tragic predestination, Bismarck would repeat, that he did not believe in great providential men; that according to his belief, political celebrities owed their reputations, if not to chance, at least to circumstances which they themselves could not have foreseen.

CHAPTER 8

BISMARCK DISCLOSES "THE HIGH FINANCIAL POWERS OF EUROPE"

Bismarck certainly knew that the American Civil War was fomented by what he called "the High Financial Powers of Europe." This is confirmed in the remarkable account published by Conrad Siem in La Vielle France, N 216, in March 1921. According to Siem, Bismarck talked with him in 1876 about the Civil War:

> The division of the United States into two federations was decided long before the Civil War by the High Financial Powers of Europe. Those bankers were afraid of the United States, if they remained in one block and as one nation would attain economical and financial independence, which would upset their domination over the World. The voice of the Rothschilds predominated. They saw tremendous booty if they substituted two feeble democracies indebted to them, to the vigorous Republic, confident and self-providing.
>
> Lincoln never suspected these underground machinations. He was Anti-Slaverist, and he was elected as such. But his character prevented him from being the man of one party. When he had affairs in his hands, he perceived that these sinister financiers of Europe, the Rothschilds, wanted him to be the executor of their designs. They made the rupture between the North and the South imminent! The Masters of Finance in Europe made this rupture definitive in order to exploit it to the utmost...

Lincoln's personality surprised them. They thought to easily dupe the candidate woodcutter. His candidature did not trouble them. But Lincoln read their plots and soon understood that the South was not the worst foe, but the financiers. He did not confide his apprehensions; he watched the gestures of the Hidden Hand. He did not wish to expose publicly which would disconcert the ignorant masses.

He decided to eliminate the International Bankers by establishing a system of loans, allowing the states to borrow directly from the people without intermediary.

He did not study finance, but his robust good sense revealed to him, that the source of any wealth, resides in the work and the economy of the nation. He opposed emissions through the International Financiers. He obtained from Congress the right to borrow from the people by selling to it the bonds of States.

The local banks were only too glad to help such a system and the government and the People escaped the plots of the foreign financiers. They understood at once that the United States would escape their grip. The death of Lincoln was resolved. Nothing is easier than to find a fanatic to strike. The death of Lincoln was a disaster for Christendom.

> There was no man in the United States big enough to wear his boots. The international financiers went anew to grab the riches of the world. Fear that with their banks, their craftiness and their torturous tricks — they will entirely control the exuberant riches of America and use it to systematically corrupt modern civilization. I fear that they will not hesitate to plunge the whole of Christendom into wars and chaos, in order that the earth shall become their inheritance.

(I wish to reiterate that the preparation for this work I encompassed ten months of intensive research on this particular subject work at the British Museum. The books from which sources are quoted, such as Talks With Napoleon at St. Helena and Propaganda in the Next War and the works of John Reeves -- and many others mentioned may no longer be available).

Russia provoked a peculiar hatred in the Rothschilds who set their face against the Romanov family. The daughter of Tiesenhaus, a prominent German historian wrote that she shared her father's distrust of the Tsar:

> . . . But after meeting him, in common with many others, she was impressed with Alexander's frankness, energy and nobility of character. This impression deepened into a loyal and devoted friendship. {Emperor Alexander -- Mrs. de Choiseul-Guffress)

According to Count Cherep-Spiridovich, Nathan Rothschild tried to instigate a revolution in Russia, but was unsuccessful, and Lionel confessed to Disraeli that it was prepared in Germany:

> The chief agents of the James Rothschild III were mobilized against Tsar Nicholas I to provoke a war in > the Crimea, but they were unable to win, so they poisoned Nicholas I in 1855."

> (British Museum Papers, Hidden Hand, page 119)

In these momentous events, Disraeli played a big role, either as a "confessor" or advisor to the Rothschilds. How the Rothschilds gained control of Marie Louise is told by Mrs. Edith E. Cuthell in her book, An Imperial Victim:

> In December 1827 Marie Louise, the widow of Napoleon 1 raised a loan often ten million francs from Rothschild. On February 22, 1829, she lost her husband Count Neipperg, which remained a mystery to all historians. Prince Metternich who had been a mere "clerk " of Salomon Rothschild of Vienna, told Bombelles, another Rothschild protege that he wished a man who could guide the weak character of Marie Louise. Bombelles became the confidant of Marie Louise and then married her.

The Rothschilds now had complete control of Napoleon's widow through Bombelles who had captured her heart while she was still Countess Niepperg.

According to the author Edmond Rostand, Bombelles was extremely handsome. Writing of Bombelles, Mrs. E.E. Cuthwell describes him thus:

> He has even more ambition. With his soft voice he whispered into the ears of women. Bombelles wished to marry a Mlle Cavanaugh, who had money. He gained his object. His wife died, bequeathing him her heart in a leaden case. He buried it. A year later he had a desperate passion for another rich heiress, who declined it. (An Imperial Victim, page 321)

> After the death of Marie, Louise Bombelles was appointed Comptroller to the Emperor of Austria. Rumors that she died of poison floated about Parma and spread further. " (Page 373)

Count Cherep-Spiridovich narrates what followed:

> Bombelles, supported by Salomon and his clerk, Metternich, was appointed the 'educator' of the future Emperor of Austria, Franz Joseph. Bombelles was the responsible author of the most awful disloyalty, baseness and cruelty of Austria, which began to amaze the whole world since 1848, when Franz Joseph was only eighteen years old became the Emperor de jure, and Bombelles was the 'power behind the throne' receiving and executing the orders of Rothschild. Their first act was to betray their word to Nicholas I who put as a condition 'sine qua non' mercy for Hungarian General Sheezeny and others. Franz Joseph strangled them, as soon as the Russian troops left Austria. (Hidden Hand, page 123)

The Rothschilds were not only moneylenders, but also speculators. The greatest area of interest to them was the construction of the railroads of Europe and Russia, which they latched onto and held onto. In one account of this endeavor contained in British Museum papers, James Rothschild compelled France to accept financing for its North Railroad:

> The Government took upon itself the obligation to spend 100 million francs in order to build the roadbed. James consented to spend 60 millions in providing rail cars etc. He received during 40 years 17 millions yearly by way of income, i.e. 620 millions in interest plus the principal of 60 millions. In this undertaking the Rothschilds used 60 millions of their depositors' money for which they paid them 4% interest, or 2,400,000 yearly, thus getting 14,600,000 francs per annum for their signature. The Journal des Debats in order to deceive the nation stated in July 1843, that Rothschild is begging for the privilege to ruin himself The French press acted the role of agent provocateur as early as fifty years before the scandal of Panama. The Rothschilds coveted this rich prey, the railroads, at any cost. At one time the Government passed through a period of honesty and had the temerity to stem their aggression.

In 1838, M. Martin, from the North [railroad company] suggested to Parliament a net of railroads to be built by the State. If M. Martin's plan, based on two pillars of monopoly banking and transportation had been approved by Parliament, the financial fealty would have been killed at its inception. But the Rothschilds, through the press controlled by them, found the way to acquire the railroads. In 1840, the West and South lines were conceded to the Rothschilds and the Foulds.

(The Foulds were international bankers strategically placed in France to act out Rothschild orders). By 1845, all the great lines belonged to these two companies. One of the most incisive reporters on the Rothschilds was John Reeves who wrote the book The Rothschilds - The Financial Rulers of Nations. The following comments taken from the book show just how incisive and penetrating of the curtain of mystery surrounding the Rothschilds was Reeves, whose observations of Nathan Rothschild are perhaps without equal:

The amount of fortune he left always remained a secret. The Business was to be conducted by the four > sons in cooperation with their uncles abroad. To each of his daughters he left $500,000, which was to be forfeited if they married without the consent of their mother and brothers.

>
> There were no legacies to his employees and no charitable bequests. . . the first occasion on which Nathan assisted the English Government was in 1819, when he undertook the loan of $60 million. From 1818 to 1832, Nathan issued eight loans for the sum of $105,400,000. With Spain, or the South American states that had formerly acknowledged the Spanish flag, he would never have anything to do. The explanation of some historians is that it was because of the Spanish Inquisition. One cause of his success was the torturous policy with which he misled those who watched him.
>
> In 1831 Nathan Mayer took control of the quicksilver mines of Idria in Austria, and simultaneously similar mines in Almadena, in Spain. Thus all the mercury, indispensable as medicine, was in his hands, and he doubled and trebled its price. It had terrific consequences upon the sick and the suffering of all nations price.. .
>
> Another accurate reporter of the Rothschilds was M. Martin whose book, Stories of Banks and Bankers gave some interesting facts. Nathan never paid his employees a cent more than was necessary for their subsistence or at least not a farthing more than they would compel him to pay.

Writing about Lionel Rothschild, Reeves made the following comments in his book, pages 205-207:

> Lionel concentrated his thoughts exclusively on the consolidation of his immense fortune. Great prudence marked his enterprises. In the negotiations of foreign loans Lionel was particularly active, as this business at once lucrative and comparatively free from risk, was one, which he preferred before all others. During his lifetime his firm was interested in the issue of no less than eighteen Government loans, amounting in aggregate to seven hundred million dollars. To enter into the details of these transactions would be to give the financial history of Europe.

To understand how the Rothschilds prospered, especially in their special area of expertise in lending money to governments of Europe and indeed, the world, I examined the work of John Reeves, whose book we have referred to frequently, and will continue to refer to throughout the remainder of this work as well as the sources in the papers in the British Museum.

CHAPTER 9

A MUCH OVERLOOKED ASPECT OF NEGRO SLAVERY IN AMERICA

Before turning to the aspect of successful money- lending, in America as engaged in by the Rothschilds, I shall touch upon the question of slavery that has arisen in recent years. Some say that the descendants of the Negroes should be compensated for the hardship afflicted upon their forbears.

It is an important issue given the fact, that the Rothschilds used slavery as an excuse to foment the American Civil War. The idea was said to have come from Benjamin Disraeli, Lionel and James, who sat down to dinner after the wedding of Lionel's daughter for which all the Rothschilds had assembled in London. According to Count Cherep-Spiridovich:

> . . . The Rothschilds started the American Civil War. Though disputes has existed since 1812 between the South and the North, the war might never had happened, but for the hidden hand of the Rothschilds.

By manipulating and inflaming passions the dispute became a cause for war even though the South was beginning to realize, that slavery was not an economic plus.

Slavery should never have been allowed in the United States, but alas, it was. There are different kinds of slavery. In Europe, the poor lived in the slavery of abject poverty and degradation. In England and Ireland it was much the same story. The poor lived in terrible conditions. Their sons were conscripted to serve in the armed forces and millions of them lost their lives.

The British generals, especially Lord Douglas Haig were notorious for the lack of concern for the heavy casualties they suffered. In Ireland, millions died of starvation. While slavery should be universally condemned, nevertheless, it was tolerated in America, but comparatively, the poor classes of Europe, Ireland and England suffered as great hardship as the slaves in America.

On an occasion it was doubted whether the slaves in America would want to change their condition with the slaves of Ireland and England. But the hidden hand of the Quakers and "abolitionists" kept up a drumbeat of slander against the South until the demons, who had contrived the whole issue of slavery to boil over, got their way.

Negro slaves in America were not generally subjected to such appalling conditions of horror. Thus when we examine the sometimes exaggerated descriptions of slavery in America as written, preached and expounded by the abolitionists and the Quakers, we have to admit, if we are unbiased, that comparatively speaking American Negro slaves were far better treated than the poor in Europe and Great Britain:

> At the beginning of the 19th century, Great Britain, owing to false principles of government to the ignorant and blind cultivation of trade and industries, had the appearance of a State driven to the utmost opposite and contradictory extremes.
>
> Priding itself on the possession of the freest constitution in Europe, England yet concealed the greatest tyranny; possessing unbounded riches, it yet allowed the poor peasantry of Ireland to die of hunger, whilst the privation and distress prevalent > among the laboring classes was as great and indescribable as to threaten to end in riot and rebellion. The hardships endured by the poorer classes were aggravated by the disgraceful condition of our political system. Morality was at a discount; bribery and intrigue were the order of the day. The thoughts of all were turned to complete forgetfulness of the sufferings of others. Corruption was so widespread, that the independence of the Crown and that of the constituencies was threatened. (Sir William Molesworth)

> In 1797 the English banks found themselves deeply embarrassed, mainly in consequence of the demands of the Government, which borrowed millions every year for the war and for support by subsidies of half of the Continental Powers. (John Reeves, The Rothschilds, page 162)

It would seem that even the Rothschilds could not believe their good fortune. The character, "Sidonia," created by Disraeli in his novel Coningsby and which was in fact based on Nathan Rothschild said: Can anything be more absurd than that a nation should apply to an individual to maintain its credit, and with its credit, its existence as an empire? (Page 248)

This very accurately described the Rothschild bankers and their hold over the British Government through extensive loans. No wonder that President Garfield once said: Whoever controls the money controls that nation. The Rothschild's progeny carried on that tradition. For instance, Lionel Rothschild financed the British Government's Suez Canal undertaking. It is more than likely that without Lionel's financial backing the Suez Canal may not have been dug.

It was Lionel Rothschild who put up the $20 million that the British Government paid for the land purchased from the Khedive. But as with all their ventures, Lionel demanded and got a high return, 500,000 pounds for a couple of endorsements that took no more than a few hours of his time.

At a much earlier time, Mayer Amschel felt it would benefit the Rothschilds if he sent his son Nathan to England, where he took up residence in Manchester. According to Sir Thomas Buxton, the reason why Amschel chose to send Nathan to live in Manchester has already been partly explained herein.

> Many English manufacturers sent in 1789 a man to Frankfurt to offer their goods. The Rothschild trick consisted of keeping him a long time, and later giving him the hugest order for Germany.
>
> In the meantime, Nathan was sent to Manchester, where he bought all of the available cotton and dyestuffs. When the representative returned to Manchester with orders, the manufacturers had to apply to Nathan for these materials and he made them pay treble the price and even refused to sell the stuff, thus making them pay his father enormous 'damages.' Then he took the cotton and the dyes to some manufacturers and they manufactured the stuff for him at the lowest price. This base trick ruined many people in Manchester.
>
> This plundering made Manchester very indignant. Nathan was frightened and fled to London, where the London Stock Exchange was a larger field for his exploitation. In later years none of the members of the Exchange could boast like Nathan of having multiplied his capital 2,500 times during the course of five years. (John Reeves, The Rothschilds, page 167)

Another reason why Nathan suddenly went to London is given in the documents referred to in the British Museum:

> The reason also was that Wilhelm IX of Hesse-Cassel (1785-1821) was persuaded by Amschel to transfer his affairs in London, from the bank of van Notten into the hands of Nathan. Of course, 'accidentally' a whole gang of those Frankfurt Illuminati went with Nathan to London to try and do the same thing there, but the British were too clever to be deceived.
>
> When France invaded Germany, Wilhelm IX [since called the Elector] gave $3,000,000 to Amschel, which he sent to Nathan in London to prevent it from falling into the hands of Napoleon. Just at that moment the Company of India had $4,000,000 in gold. Nathan bought it and increased its price. He cornered gold in London. This arrangement has endured and even today, N.M. Rothschild fixes the price of gold on a daily basis every morning, and the Rothschild "fixing " is accepted as the "official" gold price throughout the world.
>
> He [Nathan] knew the Duke of Wellington needed it. Nathan also bought the Duke's bills at a large discount. The Government asked Nathan for a loan of his gold and he transferred it to Portugal. Nathan loaned his gold and it was returned, but he compelled the repayment of the Duke's bills at their full value. Thus he made 50%. Then he again loaned his gold at 15% and received it back and transported it to Portugal with a huge commission.
>
> The Duke needed this gold to pay the outfitters of his Army who were all Portuguese, Spanish and Dutch

> Jews. Thus not a single pound of gold was received by Wellington, only orders to Nathan's agents in Portugal, who were paid by Rothschild in Frankfurt. This operation netted Nathan 100%. Thus the Rothschilds made colossal profits with the money of the Landgrave, but took all the profits for themselves. (Maria O'Grady and John Reeves)

As I said earlier, the descendants of Mayer Amschel became the most powerful men in the world. The one example, perhaps more than any that marks the truth of this observation is the account of how James Rothschild defeated Nicolas I of Russia. It turned on the Russian revolutionary, Hertzen:

> The notorious author, Alexander Hertzen, one of the pioneers (fomenters) of the Russian Revolutionary movement was compelled to leave the country. (Actually he was forced to flee Russia just hours ahead of the police). He arrived in London, where he started a Russian paper called The Bell. Hertzen, however, was a rich man, who before going into exile had converted his property into Government bonds. The Russian Government knew the numbers of Hertzen's bonds, and when they were presented for payment upon the exile's arrival in London, Nicholas I, hoping thereby to crush his enemy, ordered the Government bank of St. Petersburg to refuse payment.
>
> The Bank naturally obeyed. But fortunately for Hertzen he found a champion in the elder Rothschild. The latter informed the Czar that as Hertzen's bonds were as good as any other Russian bonds, he was reluctantly compelled to conclude the insolvency of the Russian Government. Should the bonds not be > paid immediately, he would declare the Czar bankrupt in all the European money markets. Nicholas was beaten. He put his pride in his pocket and paid the bonds. Hertzen himself relates the story in The Bell under the title, King Rothschild and Emperor Nicholas I."

> (The Fortnightly Review, by Dr. A.S. Rappaport, page 655)

From these accounts it can be seen just how much the legend of Amschel Rothschild having made his money as a pawnbroker wears thin in the face of reality, and yet the myth endures that pawn broking was in the beginning the source of Rothschild's wealth. It can now be stated as a fact that there is very little substance, if any, to that claim.

In discussing Lionel under the fictitious name of "Sidonia," Disraeli gave many clues to his master's true character: "It was impossible to penetrate him. His frankness was strictly limited to the surface. He observed everything, though overcautious, but avoided serious discussion. He was a man without affection." According to John Reeves:

> . . . The Rothschild brothers, fully cognizant of his superior intellectual capacity, willingly acknowledged Nathan Mayer as the most fit to direct all of their important transactions. (The Rothschilds, page 64)

One of the most interesting of the many interesting facts I discovered in the British Museum in London is the history of the founders of what was to become one of the greatest propaganda machines the world has ever known. I refer to the Tavistock Institute for Human Relations, which became the premiere brainwashing think tank of the ruling elite of Britain. The Tavistock Institute grew into a huge organization, which today dominates the United States and Great Britain. This vast organization had its beginning in 1914 at Wellington House, London at the outbreak of the First World War.

In charge of organizing a propaganda machine that would persuade a reluctant British people to look upon that war with Germany as necessary for the survival of the British way of life, was no easy task since at the time, the majority of the people had any desire for war with Germany, and there was staunch opposition to it. Placed in charge of the propaganda enterprise were Lord Northcliffe and Lord Rothmere. Actually, both men were directly related to the Rothschilds through marriage.

One of the three daughters of Nathan Rothschild II was Charlotte, born in 1807 who married her cousin Anselm Salomon, son of Salomon, the second child of Amschel and Caroline Stern of the Frankfurt Sterns. The Sterns were directly related to the Harmsworths of England, one of who became "Lord Northcliffe" and the other who became "Lord Rothmere."

For full details about the Tavistock Institute read: The Tavistock Institute of Human Relations: Shaping the Moral, Spiritual, Cultural, Political and Economic Recline of the United States of America. (2006)

Jacob (James) Rothschild was undoubtedly the most important man in France, having virtually created many French politicians and leaders who owed their position to him. He had come a long way from the thirteen-year old boy that had hardly attended school, accompanying instead, his father Mayer Amschel in the many trips he took across Germany.

There he was exposed to the restrictions imposed upon Jews who traveled across the borders of the principalities, being forced to pay a Liebzoll, head tax, each time. James always desired to leave Frankfurt and follow his brother Nathan to London, but instead, Amschel sent him to Paris. He left Frankfurt for that city in March of 1811. His arrival in Paris did not go unnoticed by Finance Minister Mollien who reported it to Napoleon: A Frankfurt man who is now in Paris and who calls himself Rotschild (sic) is occupied mainly in smuggling guineas from the English coast to Dunkirk.

Francois-Nicholas Comte Mollien was Napoleon's top advisor holding the post of Minister of Finance from 1806-1814.

The arrival of James must have been an event of importance for Napoleon, who could not have known what great a part James Rothschild was to play in his downfall, and of course the Rothschilds were engaged in more than smuggling, although that activity was a widespread and very lucrative business for them. When the British blockaded France, Mayer Amschel saw it as a golden chance to make a fortune, and he did, in gold.

> At twenty-two years old, James was a rather unattractive young man who was almost servile in mannerisms. Some of his contemporaries were not so kind. Castellane, who along with Mirabeau and Clement-Tonnerrre were the high nobility of Paris, found James frightfully ugly, even though he is the Adonis of the Rothschilds'. (Baron James, Anka Muhlstein, page 61)

Others were even harsher:

> A monstrous visage, the flattest, squattest, most frightful kind of batrachian's face with bloodshot eyes, swollen lids, and a slobbery mouth slit like a piggy bank, a sort of a satrap of gold, that's Rothschild.
> (Goncourts, Journal Paris 1854 Vol. Ill, 7)

James set his course in Paris in 1814 when he asked the Commercial Court to accept registration of his banking house. Before that, he acted merely as the representative of the Frankfurt "head office." This did not alter the solid connection between himself, London and Frankfurt; rather it formalized it and gave him greater status in Paris. He now branched out into tax collecting for the French Treasury and engaged in widespread money lending.

When the fortunes of the king changed, and through the Restoration, (the 100 Days of Napoleon) it did not matter who was at the head of affairs, all were beholden to James Rothschild. He seemed able to change sides without losing one scrap of face or influence.

The end of Napoleon at Waterloo, engineered by his brother Nathan from London, brought in its aftermath a very profitable relation with King Louis whose return to power the Rothschilds made possible by loaning the necessary capital. The undermining of Napoleon and his government was the work of the Rothschilds who now enjoyed the bounty brought with the Restoration.

Napoleon's barely concealed dislike for the Jews contributed to his downfall. The Rothschilds had lived in fear of Napoleon after he refused to attack Christian kings and Christian nations. With peace once more in the air, banker's loans became the biggest and best opportunity to make money, and the Rothschilds exploited it to the full.

CHAPTER 10

NATHAN ROTHSCHILD SETTLES FRENCH DEBTS

The French Government had to settle its wartime indemnities and for this, they needed to borrow money. By lending Louis XVIII the money it took to make a triumphant, but dignified return, Nathan Rothschild ensured a "place in the sun" for James. The sum of money was reputed to be 5 million francs.

True to the teachings of old Mayer Amschel, Nathan did nothing for nothing. His game plan for the loan was to oblige the king to open the doors for James to get into the high circles of society, at the head of which stood the Duc de Richelieu, Premiere of Paris.

At first, Richelieu resisted but he had not an inkling of how persistent Nathan could be. Much pressure was exerted upon him by the Marquis d'Osmond, the French Ambassador at London, and by the Austrian Ambassador Count Esterhazy, both of whom were heavily indebted to Nathan. Finally, although extremely irritated by such unseemly pressure, de Richelieu consented to receive James. It did not stop there.

Next, James got the chief of police Decazes in his pocket through providing him with "special information," which came to him from the von Thurn and Taxis family of Germany who held the mail contract. They simply opened mail of interest to the Rothschilds and then relayed the contents to James in Paris, Nathan in London or Mayer in Frankfurt. It is worth noting, that the von Turn and Taxis family is part of the Committee of 300. There was a double benefit in giving the information thus gained to Decazes instead of de Richelieu to whom it ought to have gone. In return, Decazes kept James informed of any pending anti-Jewish moves or political intrigues directed against his bank.

With his circle of important people growing wider, James decided that he needed a home more suited to his status, one where he might entertain in the lavish style that was expected of him. He found such a home in a mansion formerly possessed by Queen Hortense on the Rue La Fitte, which had previously belonged to a Paris banker named Laborde, who fell victim to the guillotine in 1794. Hortense, the daughter of Empress Josephine had become Queen of Holland after being married to Napoleon's brother, Louis.

It cost James a fortune to have the house remodeled and refurbished; some said the bills came to more than three million francs. When completed in 1834, it became the talk of the town. Heinrich Heine, the German-Jewish Communist philosopher, the Duc d'Orleans and Prince Leopold of Coburg were frequent guests at the glittering soirees given by James.

When Prince Metternich and his entourage, including the brilliant Prussian Friedrich von Gentz, who had the confidence of the great man, came to Paris, James gave a party that rivaled anything seen in Paris since the return of the king. Even the mighty Duke of Wellington dared not refuse an invitation from James when he visited Paris.

James patronized von Gentz and played on his weakness for women, lots of women, providing von Gentz with the money it took through "easy terms" as we say today. Von Gentz got all the women he could handle, plus many other luxuries he had not hitherto been able to afford. Thus did James come to "own" von Gentz.

> James' palace became a magnet for all types of politicians, and particularly, those who were open

> Communists and Socialists. One such person was Ludwig Borne, a strong supporter of the notion that all the kings of Europe should be dethroned and replaced by James, with the exception of Louis Philippe who would be crowned in Paris, so that coronation ceremony would be conducted, not by the Pope, but by James Rothschild. (Notre Dame de la Bourse, January 22, 1832)

> As previously mentioned, an individual who was patronized by James Rothschild was Heinrich Heine, the German poet who had deserted his homeland and settled in Paris, whether to be near Rothschild, or for political reasons, is not certain. Heine was an avowed Communist and was more than likely on the German police list of subversives and this may have been one reason why he took up residence in Paris. Rothschild helped Heine in innumerable ways, not the least being financial. Heine perceived James a revolutionary and praised him for being 'one of the first to perceive the worth of the Crimieux . . .' Herr von Rothschild alone discovered Emile Pereire, the Pontifex Maximus of railways. (Olivia Maria O'Grady)

Not exactly true as I found when I looked at the profit angle that brought James to invest in the new fad. Pereira was a young Sephardim Jew employed by James to do the day-today supervision of the construction work. Through it all, James and Nathan did not stray far from the tricks of the trade taught them by Mayer Amschel, that being never to lose sight of the goal that money was everything.

A particular deal, one of many that James and Nathan were offered, was that of official agents for making payments to Austrian troops stationed at Colmar in Alsace. The Rothschilds were awarded the contract by undercutting all competitors. The business was risky because it involved transport of coinage through bandit-infested areas, necessitating expensive insurance. Instead of transporting physical coinage, James arranged for Rothschild credits to be placed with local banks against which the soldiers were paid. Having eliminated the risk, James and Nathan were able to pocket substantial commissions. This became the basis of new business, the transfer of funds all around the Continent and to London now being done in this way, and the Rothschilds had the monopoly.

In order to give readers just a glimpse of the immense power wielded by James I relate the following affair, which became one of his causes celebre and showed how far his powerful arm could reach. A certain priest, a Father Thomas and his servant disappeared in Damascus in April 1840. Murder was suspected and the suspects, who just happened to be Jewish, were arrested, whereupon they confessed to the murder.

> World Jewry immediately protested vehemently that the arrested Jews were innocent, and that their confessions had been made under torture. James and Salomon immediately brought their combined pressures to bear upon the monarch and Salomon induced Prince Mettemich of Austria to take action.
>
> The Austrian Consul von Laurin protested to Mohammed Ali, reporting directly to James and Salomon actions taken. The French Consul at Damascus, however, being on the scene, took an altogether different view of the murder and the defendants the political scene being acute; Louis Philippe dared not risk unwarranted support of the Jews against the Christians. James' letter to Salomon is of considerable importance. It clearly reveals the behind-the-scenes methods employed by the Rothschilds in pressuring governments and molding public opinion: My efforts have unfortunately, not yet produced the desired results. The government is acting very slowly in this matter; in spite of the praiseworthy action of the Austrian Consul, because the matter is too remote so that the public interest has not been sufficiently aroused about it. All that I have so far succeeded in doing is, as stated in the Monitor today, to arrange that the Vice Consul at Alexandria should be instructed to investigate the conduct of the Consul at Damascus.

This is only a temporizing measure since the vice consul is under the Consul, so that he has no authority to call the latter to account for his actions. In such circumstances the only means left is the all-powerful method here of calling in the newspapers to our assistance and we have accordingly today had a detailed account based upon the reports of the Austrian Consul sent in to the Debates and other papers, and have also arranged that this account shall appear in similar detail in the Algemene Zeifung of Augsburg.

We would certainly have published Herr von Laurin 's letters to me on this matter, had we not felt that this could only have been done after previously obtaining the permission of his Highness Prince von Metternich.

For this reason, my dear brother, convinced as I am that you will gladly do your utmost in this just cause, I would beg you to request of the Prince in his kindness to authorize the publication of these letters. The gracious sentiments of human feeling, which the Prince has expressed with regard to this sad episode, > cause us to confidently entertain the hope that this request will not be refused.

>
> When you have received the desired permission, I beg you, my dear Salomon, not to immediately publish the letter in the Osterreicher Beobachter alone, but to also be so good as to send them immediately with a short covering letter to the Augsburger Zeitung, so that they may reach the public through that medium also. (The Untold History, Count Cherep-Spiridovich)

Some of the important statesmen the Rothschild had under their control began to worry about their power and influence.

One of these was Prince Metternich who was under the firm control of Salomon Rothschild and regarded by him as no more than a "valet" for the Rothschild family. After bartering away a good deal of Austria's sovereignty, Metternich began to have serious doubts:

> By reason of natural causes which I cannot regard as good or moral, the House of Rothschild is a much more important influence in French affairs than the foreign office of any country, except perhaps, England. The great motive force is their money. People who hope for philanthropy and who have to suppress all criticisms under the weight of gold, need a great deal of it. The fact of corruption is dealt with quite openly, that practical element, in the fullest sense of the word, in the modem representative system.

Too late did Metternich realize that by selling Austria he was playing right into the hands of the international revolutionaries, and when the revolutionary fires began to burn, despite his exalted rank, Prince Metternich had to flee Vienna on money borrowed from Salomon Rothschild.

It is doubted by historians, that Metternich ever had any conception of the revolutionary forces he had inadvertently helped to unleash. According to documents in the British Museum, world revolution began to go into high gear in 1848, beginning in Sicily in January of that year.

> The great cities of Europe seemed to be stirred by waves of excitement. Disorder spread to Naples. In Paris the red flag was unfurled over the barricades. Socialist revolutionaries led the workmen and students into bloody revolt in February 22, 1848, and Guizot resigned. (Olivia Maria O'Grady)

It is stated that James Rothschild overrated King Louis Phillip, thinking him to be sympathetic to revolutionary ideas. According to Professor William Langer, Coolidge Professor of History at Harvard University . . . Republicans and other radicals had accepted Louis Philippe as a revolutionary monarch only to discover their mistake too late.

This is surprising, as James Rothschild was known to be a very astute judge of character and one who could read political scenes like a road map. It cannot be said with certainty, but Marshal Soult, a close friend of Nathan Rothschild, who formed a ministry with the Duke of Brioglie, Thiers and Guizot, the latter two men being of a notably conservative side of politics, may have had something to do with it.

In 1830 demands by workers stirred up by Marx and his Socialist International began in Italy and Poland, which were not met by their governments. Radical agitation and violence continued in France during 1831:

In November 1831, a large scale insurrection of workers at Lyons was put down with difficulty. There followed a rapid spread of secret societies. Under the regime of press freedom the king was unsparingly attacked and in the radical newspapers mercilessly caricatured, notably by Honorare Daumire. In 1834 there were great revolts in Paris and Lyons, which were suppressed with great severity. In 1845, the radical Fieschi attempted to assassinate Louis Philippe, but the attempt did not succeed. Thereafter, in 1836, the king established a government run by his personal friend Colonel Louis Mole with the Right Center leadership Guizot; but he joined forces with the Left Center Party and overthrew Mole. (The Untold History, John Reeves)

To continue with The Untold History:

Revolutionary activities prior to 1848 had sent men like Karl Marx and Frederick Engels, Louis Napoleon Bonaparte into exile from the Continent. England had been their haven. In 1848 they had returned to the Continent to participate in the Revolutions. On February 24, 1848, the Charter and constitution and parliamentary rule seemed to come to an abrupt halt.

In all of Paris I did not see one member of the militia, one soldier, one gendarme, or one member of the police. Meanwhile sheer terror gripped all upper classes. I don't believe that any time during the Revolution (1789-94) it was quite so great. (Victor Hugo, Choses vues, page 268)

James stayed on for a few days and was observed by Feydeau, one of the members of the National Guard:

> Around noon, I saw two gentlemen, arm in arm, calmly appear out of the Rue de la Paix and move toward the Tuileries. I recognized one of them a Baron de Rothschild. I quickly went up to him. 'Messeur le Baron,' I said 'you would seem not to have chosen a very good day for a walk. I think it would be better if you returned home rather than expose yourself to bullets whizzing in all directions.'
>
> But the Baron assured him that he was safe and was needed at the Ministry of Finance. Louis Napoleon was to become, first, the President of France and then Emperor; Marx and Engels joined in founding the Communist League, and then, with the failure of the revolutions, they returned to England, while others, among them Joseph Wedermeyer emigrated to the United States... (Olivia Maria O'Grady)

After the Battle of Sedan and the capture of Napoleon III by the Prussians (September 1870), Paris, mistaking itself for being the heart, brains and other organs of the French nation, and the rest of France as backward, primitive, one might say almost barbaric appendage, underwent a series of revolutions (in the name of France) culminating in the Paris Commune of 1871, which served only to leave the nation prostrate before the enemy and expose it to his contempt. Quoting from Professor Langer:

> Between 1840-1847 Guizot became the commanding figure. Guizot became premiere in 1847 and remained in power until 1848 when he resigned. Street disorders led to the revolution of February.

Continuing the account of events in 1848, from papers and documents in the British Museum and from L'Alliance France-Allemande et Les Forces Titanique, The

Rothschilds by John Reeves and the accounts of Olivia Maria O'Grady:

> In Paris the red flag was unfurled over the barricades. Marxist revolutionaries led the workmen and students into a bloody revolt on February 22, 1848 and Guizot resigned. The troops attacked the revolutionaries on the barricades; stirring the population into a frenzy of excitement. On the 24, the National Guard and line regiments went over to the rebels. The seventy four year old Louis Philippe fled the country.
>
> Marx and Engels made ready to take personal charge of the revolution . . . Marx was entrusted with full revolutionary powers . . . Lamartine and Arago asked the Jewish banker, Michael Goudchaux to accept the revolutionary portfolio for finance. The banker accepted. Caussidere, the barricade prefect, asked James Rothschild for a loan for the purposes of paying his revolutionary aides. James happily complied. (Pages 218-219)

After describing how Marx and Engels took charge of the various revolutionary factions and organizing revolt in Germany, O'Grady wrote:

> In the beginning of April, Marx and Engels left Paris for Germany where the flames of revolution had preceded them. The Holy Alliance had collapsed in the smoke and flame of Vienna and Prince Mettemich had fled the city on money borrowed from Solomon Rothschild. (Page 219)

> James Rothschild gave Leder-Rollin seven hundred and fifty thousand francs in support of the 1848 revolution. It was said that he was compelled to do so under Rollin 's threat to burn the Palais Rothschild in the Rue Lafitte. In the three days of street fighting in June of 1848, Louis Eugene Cavalgnac emerged victorious; He immediately assumed dictatorial powers and was nominated president of the council of ministers by the National Assembly. By free use of large sums of money Rothschild ingratiated himself with the new power in France, and was as much at home with Cavalgnac as he had been with Louis Philippe. It was soon said that he was as good a Republican as he had been monarchist.

The French Workers Party claimed him as one of their own. The Editor of the radical Tocsin des Travailleurs wrote:

> You are a wonder sir! In spite of his legal majority Louis Philippe has fallen, Guizot has disappeared, the constitutional monarchy and parliamentary methods have gone by the board; you, however, are unmoved. Where are Aragon and Lamaratine? They are finished but you have survived. The banking princes are going into liquidation and their offices are closed.
>
> The great captains of industry and the railway companies' totter . . . you alone among those ruins remain unaffected. Although your House felt the first shock of violence in Paris, although the effects of the Revolution pursue you from Naples to Vienna to Berlin, you remain unmoved in the face of a movement that has affected the whole of Europe. Wealth fades away, glory is humbled, and dominion is broken, but the Jew, the Monarch of our time held his throne.

The Paris Commune was the first Communist government in Europe. Of the Rothschilds, O'Grady writes:

> Their fabulous command of unlimited supplies of money broke down all barriers for the Rothschilds. The dazzle of great wealth increased their social prestige everywhere. The powerful, the great kings, princes and premieres sought their favor.
>
> They built palaces and entertained the 'right people' with a royal magnificence that shamed the state affairs of monarchs. The world was their feet, and the cause of Jewry in Europe was in the ascendancy. Just how fabulous was their fortune is going be demonstrated as we proceed.

CHAPTER 11

FRANCE SURVIVES COMMUNIST ONSLAUGHTS

Leaving that momentous event behind, I researched papers about France in later years to see if the thread continued and found that it very much did. Following the success of the Paris Commune, the Communists tried again in 1871 after the Provisional Peace of Versailles was signed with Bismarck. In September 1870, the collapse of Napoleon III at Sedan was a blow that the French Empire did not survive.

On September 4, the mob again tried to take over Paris as they had done previously when James Rothschild had partly financed the revolution, but on September 19, the German armies that had defeated the French at Sedan rushed through to Paris and invested the city.

The Communists were not able to sustain their offensive and Paris was left with food enough for only eight days. On January 28, 1871, Paris capitulated to the German army. French troops disarmed, forts taken over. Bismarck allowed for elections and demanded an indemnity of five billion francs be paid to Germany. In March through May of 1871, the Marxist Communists National Guard, whom Bismarck had failed to disarm, seized 417 cannons and murdered Generals Lecomte and Thomas.

The International played a leading role in the National Guard through Loeb, Cohen, Lazare, Levi and of course, Karl Marx. The regular troops were forced to retreat and leave Paris in the hands of the Marxist Socialist International. Backed by the German army, French troops attacked the barricades in Paris and broke the hold of the Communists. But in the meantime, before the assault of the French and German regular troops broke the power of the mob led by the rebellious National Guard, the Communists exacted fearful reprisals. Sixty-seven innocent hostages were butchered at Fort Vincennes.

The Archbishop of Darboy was shot down like a dog, as were a number of his priests. Prominent citizens were also summarily shot. This happened even as the troops of the Third Republic were entering the city.

On May 20, 1871, the Communists drenched all those sections of Paris under their siege with gasoline, setting fire to all public buildings and most private property, including homes. The Tuileries, the Ministry of Finance, the Palais Royal, the Ministry of Justice, the City Hall and the police headquarters were all set on fire and burned to the ground.

> By a miracle, the sumptuous House of Rothschild and its priceless possessions remained untouched. As always before, the House of Rothschild emerged from the hazards of the war of 1870-1871 and the Paris Commune, financially unshaken and still the undisputed masters of Europe. Again the Rothschilds showed they were capable of switching their allegiance from the monarchy and bestowing it with equal devotion to the Third Republic. Alfonse Rothschild, of course, withdrew to Versailles, and took a room in the Hotel des Reservoirs where he lived throughout the fighting, looting and the terrors of the revolution.

The quoted portions are from the work of Olivia Maria O'Grady, the works of Professor Langer and from The Untold Mystery by John Reeves.

What is worthy of note is that while the most radical of the mob remained to murder their unfortunate victims, their leaders slipped out of the city and made their way to England, Switzerland and Latin America. The Paris Commune having run its course, collapsed in a frenzy of blood lust. There appears to be little doubt that the vast sum of money it took to run the Commune (it only lasted for two months) must have come from the Rothschilds.

> The leaders of the Commune spent 42 million francs, an enormous sum of money for that day. Even with the most prolific squandering it is hard to see how it could have spent as much as one third of that amount. This means that some 25 million francs disappeared in some direction, probably Switzerland, and possibly in the baggage of the head of the Bank of France, or rather its Assistant Governor, the Marquis de Poleis, who accompanied Beslay to Switzerland, when the latter was given a safe conduct pass to leave the country after the suppression of the Commune. (The Untold History, John Reeves)

The general feeling at the time was that Beslay, who had been appointed to the Bank of France by the Paris Commune (in other words, indirectly by the Rothschilds) had rescued the money for them and that the Rothschilds arranged the safe-conduct passes.

In any event, the Paris Commune brought shame and disgrace to the people of France and sent the Socialist movement into a state of decline. It is interesting to note that the Preliminary Peace Treaty of Versailles had been negotiated in part by Alfonso Rothschild, the son of James Rothschild. Alfonso concluded the financial negotiations with Bismarck and agreed to payment of the five billion francs demanded for reparations.

Eduard Rothschild was the son of Alfonso Rothschild, the eldest son of James Rothschild, who died on May 26, 1905, but the line of succession's hold on French affairs continued. Later, we shall see the part played by Eduard Rothschild and Lord Rothschild in the so-called "Balfour Declaration" that led to the establishment of a Zionist State in Palestine, in which, incidentally, Disraeli played a leading role for his masters, the Rothschilds. There are always people behind the scenes, as any thinking student of world history will know. What role did Disraeli play in the "homeland" for the Jews? In his work Tancred, Disraeli talked about "those days of political justice when Jerusalem belonged to the Jews." Of Jerusalem, he wrote:

> I saw before me apparently a gorgeous city" and all through his novels, Alroy, Contari and Fleming, he wrote about his love of Jerusalem stressing that it was a Jewish possession. At Hughendon, his country residence, Disraeli told the visiting Stanley of his "plans for restoring Palestine to the Jews and for the re-colonization by Jews.

What role did Karl Marx play in the 1871 Paris uprising of the Communists? According to records in the British Museum confirmed by two other sources:

> Marx was exultant, and though his fame spread everywhere as the monster who let loose the murderous cut-throats of Paris, he strutted like a peacock before members of the International in London. He launched into a eulogy of the 'immortal heroes of the barricades.'
>
> When the Paris Commune took the management of the revolution into its own hands, when plain workingmen for the first time dared to infringe upon the government of privilege of their cultural superiors, the old world writhed in convulsions of rage at the sight of the red flag, the symbol of the > republic of labor, floating over the Hotel De Ville. (The Paris City Hall)

One of the things we learned from the Paris Commune is that it disenchanted the majority of the French people, but the leaders who slipped away to England and Switzerland with the help of the Freemasons and Illuminati, regarded it as a landmark in the rise of International Socialism in Germany, Spain, Russia and Italy. Karl Marx in London became the clearinghouse for International Marxism, but right next to him stood Engels and the Rothschilds.

In the Untold History, we are told that the Rothschilds were the agents for the Frankfurt Masons, of which the Landgrave of Hesse was the Master, whose finances the Rothschilds controlled. At this juncture a few notations about Bismarck would be appropriate since he played a major role in shaping the destiny of not only Germany, but the whole of Europe.

According to author John Reeves in his work, The Rothschilds, Bismarck was regarded as a mere valet of the Rothschilds and was half-Jewish.

Documents in the British Museum suggest that Bismarck's natural father was Marshal Soult, the real "Waterloo" of Napoleon I: "Does it not prove that Marshal Soult was his real father and not the quiet Prussian small landowner, the official father of Bismarck?"

> After Napoleon had been put down by the Rothschilds, they needed a new leader and they created such a one in Otto Bismarck. His father, William, married Louise Menken [the Menkens were Jews] — a bourgeoisie of unknown origin. He took her into his country place, which the French troops of Napoleon soon invaded, and in a nearby chateau, Marshal Soult established his headquarters.

> Louis had been in imminent peril of violation, the champagne of Soult, his Asiatic persuasive powers appealed to the heart of Louis more than the beer and heavy wits of her German husband. Soult has since shown an extreme attention to Mrs. Bismarck — Menken and her son, the future 'Man of Blood and Iron.' Soult occupied the highest posts in France and until his death betrayed every Christian ruler. The six years Bismarck passed in Palma Institute in Berlin had left him but regrettable memories. (Cherep-Spiridovich, page 108 -- The Hidden Hand attributed to J. Hoche)

Actually, Louise Bismarck-Menken was not of unknown origin. I traced her antecedents to Haim Solomon who is credited with giving all of his fortune to General George Washington to start the American Revolution. The Jewish Tribune of New York of January 9, 1925, also confirmed that Louise Menken was the descendant of Haim Solomon.

Certain researchers and historians hotly dispute that the money Solomon gave to Washington was his own, but that it came from the Rothschilds, Solomon being their mere conduit. They point to the fact that in spite of giving all his money to Washington, Haim continued to live in luxury. The story of how Bismarck was co-opted by the Rothschilds can be pieced together from Lord Beaconsfield Letters, December 1812 and from Coningsby:

> Lionel Rothschild often took Disraeli to Paris where he was introduced to James Rothschild III. They were visited by Count Arnim, the Prussian Minister. Through Lionel, Disraeli became his friend. Soult was a Cabinet Minister of France and spoke much, perhaps, of his son, or the son of his mistress, ex Menken-Bismarck. Thus it was that the Rothschilds > decided to capture young Bismarck, who was in great need, and was, at least, a half a Jew, who already in 1839 was compelled to struggle against disaster which threatened his property. But the Rothschilds, Soult and Amim were already watching him and all sought to use him. Even in 1839 at Aachen, Bismarck had shown himself rebellious, as had Disraeli in his poem 'Blessings to the regicide dagger.'

>
> But James required that Bismarck and Disraeli display 'arch Conservatism,' which then was winning in order to slip into high society and to acquire power. Therefore, Disraeli and Bismarck dropped the hymns to 'regicide daggers' and became ultra-conservative. Both were ordered to become 'very mundane.' Amim, the Prussian Minister and member of the Reichstag married Bismarck's beloved sister Malvina in 1844 and, according to Disraeli, Bismarck fell entirely under the influence of the Rothschilds andArnim and his sister.

Indirectly we learn the statement made by Walter Rathenau that 300 men rule the world (see The Conspirators' Hierarchy: The Committee of 300). Forty years before, Bismarck indicated his agreement with Rathenau's statement:

> This was repeated by Disraeli when he said that 'the world is ruled by very different personages from what is imagined by those who are not behind the scenes.' Forty years before Rathenau's statement, Bismarck indicated his agreement with both Rathenau and Disraeli.
>
> (Extracted from Coningsby and Cherep-Spiridovich and British Museum papers)

Considered a reactionary, in 1847 Bismarck tried to placate Conservatives by his simulated violence against the Liberals, following the example of Disraeli and thus won the favor of the Prussian King. With a great deal of effort and juggling, Bismarck's controllers managed to get him to marry Johanna Puttkamer in 1847.

Puttkamer was a remarkable woman whose abilities to calm his terrible temper (probably inherited from Soult) because his registered father was a quiet man never given to violent outbursts thus saving his career, which would otherwise have come to an abrupt end. When in 1849 the list of new Cabinet members was proposed to Frederick William IV, he drew a thick line though Bismarck's name and wrote: Red-hot reactionary. Likes the smell of blood.

In 1849 Bismarck had himself elected to the Second Prussian Chamber with the help of Arnim and Rothschild, and in 1851 he attended the Diet of Frankfurt am Main as a Deputy. Count Arnim was also behind Bismarck and he did his part by recommending him to Otto von Manteuffel, the Minister of Prussia. Of von Manteuffel, Professor Langer discusses the background to his importance, historically:

> On May 16, 1850, a number of petty states and Austria met at Frankfurt and reconstituted the old diet of the Germanic Confederation. If Prussia insisted on this union, war with Austria appeared inevitable. When a dispute arose from an appeal . . . both powers mobilized and war seemed imminent.
>
> Tsar Nichols of Russia, irritated by the pseudo liberalism of the Prussian ruler sided with Austria, and Frederick William, who had been averse to war from the very outset, decided to beat a hasty retreat. He sent his new Minister, Otto von Manteuffel to negotiate. . . (Professor Langer, page 726-727)

> When Bismarck was old, his eyes never lost their amazing power. He had by nature contempt for anything weak, sentimental and among his objects of disdain he included several Christian virtues. (Professor F.M. Bowicke, Bismarck and the German Empire, page 5)

In La Revue des Deux Mondes published in 1880 vol. 26, page 203 by Valbert, we read the following:

> The Jews were the only people who could exploit Bismarck in such a way, where the entire liberal reforms in Germany after Sadowa (where the Prussians were defeated by the Austrians in 1866) introduced by Bismarck, served to benefit the Jews. ..

As we have shown, the Rothschilds were particularly interested in the politics of all nations where they had established themselves. For instance, at the Congress of Vienna, the Rothschilds sought to predominate. We learn from Maria Olivia O'Grady:

> . . . The Jews sent representatives to the Congress of Vienna where they sought to influence the official delegates through bribes and presents. The elder Rothschild, it will be recalled, was fearful of the special Jewish privilege he had bought from Karl von Dalberg, prince primate of the Confederation of the Rhine, might be lost unless incorporated in the new constitutions that the Congress was expected to draft.
>
> Jacob Baruch (father of Ludwig Boerne) G.G. Uffenheim and J.J. Gumprecht, Rothschild's special emissaries, would have been run out of town by the Viennese police, had not Metternich intervened.

> The Jewish representatives, of course, had no official position in the Congress. The most important Jewish influence on the members of Congress came from the Jewesses who opened their salons in lavish entertainment of the leading statesmen and rulers who were attending the sessions of Congress.
>
> The most prominent of these Jewesses were Baroness Fanny von Arenstein, Madame von Eskeles, Rachel Levin von Varahagen, Madam Leopold Herz, and the Duchess Mendelssohn von Schlegel. The best that the Jews were able to accomplish at the Congress of Vienna was a number of drafts proposals that invariably offered full rights of citizenship to those Jews who 'assume performance of all the duties of citizens.' This clause did not meet with all the peculiar demands and requirements of the Jewish 'nation,' which actually desired all rights of citizenship without the usual obligations. (The Congress of Vienna, pages 345, 346)

Author Anka Muhlstein in Baron James, The Rise of the French Rothschilds, puts a different interpretation on the events of the Congress of Vienna and their effect on Frankfurt:

> Hardly had the French armies withdrawn when the German authorities addressed themselves to the urgent problem of putting the Jews back in their place. In Frankfurt the rights legally acquired and dearly paid for were now abolished. Once again the Jews found themselves treated like unwelcome aliens.
>
> Realizing that their honor, their liberty, and occasionally their lives were threatened, the Jews turned to the Great Powers meeting regularly at the > Congress in Vienna. But however valid, their arguments were in vain. This left Germany's Jews no choice but to resort, as in the past, to clandestine means and thus find, or buy protection.

>
> Salomon took charge of the Jewish campaign and suddenly the wallet of Gentz, Metternich's advisor grew fat. This resulted in a suspension of the Austrian edicts of expulsion along with statements from Metternich and Hardenberg, the Austrian Chancellor's counterpart in Prussia. (Baron James, The Rise of the French Rothschilds, Anka Muhlstein, page 68)

According to Muhlstein, Jews were attacked in Frankfurt and severely persecuted. Salomon Rothschild chose to move to Vienna, but Amschel remained in Frankfurt and after reminding the government how much they would need Rothschild loans, the violence against the Jews began to subside.

CHAPTER 12

SALOMON ROTHSCHILD SHOWS HIS FINANCIAL CLOUT

In Vienna, Salomon was not allowed to buy a house, so he rented an entire luxurious hotel for himself and then refused the King of Wurtemberg the apartment he had occupied for many years.

Salomon was granted diplomatic immunity and had the title "Baron" bestowed upon him. Metternich then appointed James and Nathan as Consuls, an "unthinkable honor for a Jew" as Salomon noted:

> James did not renew his appeal. Metternich's evident power and protection relieved his anxiety. Thanks to the Chancellor, in fact, the Rothschilds would acquire diplomatic immunity.
>
> Having granted them a useful and flattering title, he would now do considerably more. Nathan and James, at the price of numerous skillfully negotiated loans conceived the idea of having themselves appointed Consuls to represent Austria in London and Paris. A Jew entering the diplomatic corps! It was unthinkable. However, despite the enormity of the proposal, Metternich agreed.

> Only the evil-minded would suspect some connection between the advantageous personal loans made by the Rothschilds to the Chancellor. All court functions lead to new business especially when it has to do with Austria. If James should be appointed in Paris, he could, God willing, take charge of everything related to the liquidation of the debt owed by France to Austria, since the Consul would be allowed to treat with the King in person. {Souvenirs Augustus de Fremilly, page 232, 1908)

> In trying to establish a pattern of powerful Jews attempting to use their influence at international conventions, The Conference of Aix la Chapelle in 1818 was also confronted with uninvited Jewish representatives. Lewis Way, an English clergyman, acted as the Jewish mouthpiece, and introduced a petition to the Conference advocating Jewish emancipation in Europe. Jewish influence in the 1856 Congress of Paris and the 1858 Congress of Paris is evident in the work of both meetings. It does not appear that that Jewry was permitted official representation at either of these two conferences. (Olivia Maria O' Grady)

That did not sit well with the Rothschilds who then demanded more and more from those they held in their power. After receiving titles of barons and consuls, they now desired more visible signs of their power to be displayed.

Their "love of distinctions" was immoderate to say the least. Von Gentz was instructed to let the public know that medals and ribbons were being granted to them, and to advertise the fact: "Salomon von Rothschild and his brother in Paris have received the order of Saint Vladimir in recognition of loans negotiated for Russia."

Von Gentz wrote to a number of leading German journals. It would be as well that you publish the news. Make it Vladimir rather than Saint Vladimir. In a letter to Count von Neipberg, in 1830, Metternich privately criticized the Rothschild's vanity: The Rothschilds would like a small Saint George. What vanity. Despite their millions and their generous loyalty, the Rothschilds have an astonishing appetite for honors and distinction. (British Museum Documents)

The Christian religious nature of the decorations made it all the more extraordinary that the Rothschilds were able to secure them, and point to the power they exercised over Metternich and Bismarck, especially as it is known that Metternich began to object to the Rothschilds demands on the grounds that as non-Christians they were not entitled to receive certain decorations, but that did not stop the flood of requests for special honors. In 1867 Alphonse, the eldest son of James wrote to his cousins in London:

> The most notable outcome of Bismarck's visit (to London) has been the distribution of decorations. My father received the Great Ribbon of the Red Eagle, the highest and most distinguished decoration. No Jew in Prussia has received it. (Gold and Iron, Fritz Stern, page 1150)

Continuing with O'Grady's work, her theme of unofficial, but powerful representation at world conventions where Jews had no standing, she refers to American efforts on their behalf: American Jewry influenced the United States to present their demand for full and equal rights' to the Bucharest Peace Conference of 1913, although the United States was not officially represented at the Conference.

On October 1913, the Anglo Jewish Association addressed a joint memorial to Sir Edward Grey, urging that the new affirmative guarantees for the Jews to be secured, pointing out that Romania had repeatedly ignored and repudiated similar assurance.

> Elihu Root, the United States Secretary of State had issued strong instructions at the direction of President Theodore Roosevelt, to Ambassador White, representing the United States at the Algerian Conference of 1906, directing him to urge upon the conference the consideration of guarantees of religious and racial tolerance in Morocco.
>
> The work of World Jewry at the Peace Conference is nowhere better indicated than in the provisions imposed on Poland by the Versailles Treaty. A ruthless conqueror could not have been more severe. The Polish representatives signed the Minority Treaty on June 28, 1919, thereby committing Poland to divide sovereignty and a superior and privileged class of citizenry. (Olivia Maria O'Grady, pages 344-347)

It has been commented on many times in history that the average person in most countries has little or no time to spare to think beyond making a living, raising a family and holding down a job making these objectives possible, leaving little or no time to attend to politics or matters of economics or other vital issues, such as war and peace, that affected their lives and their nation.

Yet it seemed, that certain groups of people were immune from such restrictions, and always seemed to know where important issues were to be decided, and by whom, and seemed to have a world-wide network that kept them abreast of all political and economic developments. Highly organized and vocal, such groups always had the edge over the local citizenry.

According to The Hidden Hand authored by Cherep-Spiridovich and the extensive work of author Olivia Maria O'Grady, such highly effective groups were always Jewish or Jewish dominated and controlled.

Both authors cite numerous and extensive examples to prove their contention, perhaps two of the more convincing examples being the Paris Peace Conference of 1919 and the establishing of the State of Israel. Continuing with the account by Olivia Maria O'Grady:

> The dawn of 1919 found Paris literally flooded with Jews from all over the world-rich Jews, poor Jews, Orthodox Jews, Socialist Jews, financiers and revolutionaries, they poured into the French capital, -and they went to work.
>
> The Comite de Delegation Juives aupres de la Conference de la Paix (The Committee of Jewish Delegations at the Peace Conference) was fully organized by March 25, 1919. In addition the delegates of the World Zionist Organization and the B'nai B'rith were included in the Committee's membership, purporting to speak for ten million Jews.
>
> Woodrow Wilson, Georges Clemenceau and other international figures were putty in the hands of these International Jews. Although the idea of a world super state had long been a Jewish dream, Wilson's conceit in believing it as his own particular creation was pandered and puffed on all sides by the Jewish delegation and their controlled world press. 'The principles of national self-determination and homogeneity were not allowed to be carried to extremes,' writes one Jewish historian with obvious satisfaction.

> The finesse of the Jewish delegation is clearly discernible in the finished product of Versailles. The groundwork for the destruction of sovereignty throughout Christendom was well laid by the mastermind behind the Comite de Delagation Juives. Absolute sovereignty was restricted. As the basis for the Second World War 'the new and enlarged states' were compelled 'to assume an obligation to embody in a treaty with the principal Allied and Associated Powers, such provisions as might be deemed necessary for the said Powers to protect the inhabitants who differed from the majority of the population in race, language, or religion.'
>
> Included in the Jewish delegates to the Paris Peace Conference was Jacob Schiff, who was later to become one of the Wall Street bankers who financed the Bolshevik Revolution in Russia. The crowning Jewish triumph was the provision that brought 'domestic group rights' under the International guarantee and jurisdiction of The League of Nation -- not one of them was concerned with 'making the world safe for Democracy'. (Wilson's statement of intent, Olivia Maria O'Grady)

Wilson may have been fooled by the intent and purpose of the League of Nations, but a group of wide-awake United States Senators was not. They saw the League of Nations exactly for what it was; an attempt to destroy United States sovereignty, the United States Constitution and the Bill of Rights, and rejected it as such when the treaty was presented to the United States Senate for ratification.

Leading the opposition in the Senate were Senators Hiram Johnson and William E. Borah whose patriotism was unbounded. The treaty was rejected on November 11, 1919. British Prime Minister Lloyd George also saw the dangers of the strictures imposed on nations by the Treaty of Versailles. In 1919 he put his fears on paper during a weekend break in meetings of the Conference:

> When nations are exhausted by wars in which they have put forth all their strength and which leave them tired, bleeding and broken, it is not difficult to patch up a peace that may last until the generation which experienced the horrors of war has passed away. . . It is therefore comparatively easy to patch up a peace that may last for thirty years. What is difficult, however, is to draw up a peace which will not provoke a fresh struggle when those who have practical experience of war have passed away...
>
> You may strip Germany of her colonies, reduce her armaments to a mere police force and her navy to that of a fifth-rate power; all the same, in the end if she feels that she has been unjustly treated in the peace of 1919 she will fund the means of extracting retribution from her conquerors.
>
> The imposition, the deep impression made upon the human heart of four years of unexplained slaughter will disappear with the hearts upon which it has been marked by the terrible sword of the Great War. The maintenance of peace will then depend upon there being no cause of exasperation constantly stirring up the spirit of patriotism, of justice, of fair play. . . Although Lloyd George made a valiant effort to see that justice was done for Germany, he failed, not for the want of trying, but because of the implacable forces of Internationalism arrayed against him, characterized by the vicious and brutally ugly behavior, attitudes and demands of Georges Clemenceau of France.

> That Lloyd George was far-seeing can be gathered from his almost prophetic words written at Fontainebleau in March of 1919. Lloyd George was defeated by the revolutionary forces that had been gathering power since the 18th century. Well organized and financed, they were virtually unstoppable. In a sense Lloyd George was hampered by the presence of his controller. Sir Philip, A.G.D. Sassoon, Bart, related through marriage and blood ties to the Rothschilds. As a member of the British Privy Council, Sassoon was able to join the secret deliberations of the conferees.

Spelling out the French policy at Versailles and its aftermath, TIME Magazine of May 17, 1940 in a rare lapse of Rothschild censorship also confirmed it:

> To the vital Ministry of the Interior, Premier Reynaud appointed energetic, 54-year old Georges Mandel, until then Minister of Colonies. This was no new job for the sharp-nosed stocky little Clemencist, who as the Tiger's chef de cabinet during the last war ran the country's domestic affairs and kept up civilian morale.
>
> Born Jeroboam Rothschild, Mandel has often been called France's Disraeli; a super politician in a country of politicians, lately showed in the Colonial (and Post Office) Ministry that he had lost none of his drive and administrative flair that made him indispensable to Clemenceau. . .

From my studies at the British Museum it is obvious the success of the Paris Peace Conference and the Treaty of Versailles that followed was dependent upon universal acceptance of the League of Nations, the first organized attempt to set up a One World Government that would usurp the sovereignty of all nations, and give Palestine to the Zionists. This opinion is borne out by what Wilson said on his arrival in Paris in January 1919: The League of Nations is the central object of our meeting.

As is well known Wilson had been thoroughly coached and instructed by Mandel House, the servant of the Rothschilds and he knew that he had to obey orders. In researching the papers of Lloyd George at the British Museum, it became obvious to me that the British Prime Minister had put up a good fight against Wilson, but to no avail. In spite of vigorous protests from Lloyd George, Wilson insisted that the first item on the agenda had to be the proposals to establish The League of Nations.

I concentrated many months of research of The League of Nations at the British Museum and discovered that Wilson went to Paris armed with instructions indirectly received from Lord Rothschild via Mandel House as to his agenda.

Wilson had endeared himself to the Rothschilds through Mandel House, when as a professor at Princeton University; he tried to end what he called "snobbery" by banishing student clubs. He was not successful, but this very early indication of his Socialist beliefs drew the attention of House and eventually landed him the governorship of the State of New Jersey, and ultimately, the job of President of the United States. Chairman Will Hayes of the Republican Party National Committee said of Wilson:

> He wants to rebuild the world unimpeded in conformity with whatever Socialistic doctrines, whatever unlimited government-ownership notions, whatever hazy whims that may happen to possess him.

My study of Wilson's presidency shows that Hayes was on the right track, but had no way of knowing anything about the persons who were directing Wilson's agenda. There was nothing hazy at all about the clear instructions he was constantly receiving from London via Mandell House. One such set of instructions from London concerned Wilson's Fourteen Points. In fact the Fourteen Points he was to present to the Paris Peace Conference was authored by the Rothschilds and Justice Brandeis, who passed it to Wilson with orders to use as his own at the Conference, under the watchful eye of Bernard Baruch. The second set of instructions, the League of Nations instructions, was also passed off as Wilson's work. His speech at the beginning of WWI, that America was fighting the "ruling class and not the German people" was pure House rhetoric. To continue with quotes from Olivia Maria O'Grady:

> President Wilson, surrounded by the Jewish financial fraternity, pushed hither and yon by the sinister Colonel House, and counseled by the Zionist Brandeis, imagined himself the great "peace maker' of all history. He was a historian who proved that he knew nothing about history.
>
> In the hands of the Jews, who used him for their own particular purposes, he plunged this country [the United States] into a disastrous war, and started a chain of events that were meant to ultimately destroy America.
>
> Flattered and eulogized by those who bent him to their will, he fancied himself playing God, remaking the world and its people in his own image. Sworn in his high office, to protect and advance the interests of the American people, he suddenly believed he had been given a mandate to save the world.

> He called for 'peace without victory' and declared that he was plunging the United States into a 'war to end war' and to 'make the world safe for democracy.' History has been busy ever since underscoring the asininity of his double talk.
>
> Peace and victory came on November 11, 1918 and Wilson rushed to Paris where he lost both. (Olivia Maria O'Grady)

This is perhaps a trifle hard on Wilson who was, after all surrounded and hedged in by advisors:

> We can now properly appraise this treacherous criminal peace treaty, out of which has grown the present war (WWII).
>
> It was not Wilson who betrayed the German government by the promise of his Fourteen Points, nor Lloyd George who was false to the Arabs to induce them to enter the war; — it was Jeroboam Rothschild, Sir Philip Sassoon and Bernard Baruch. Wilson, Lloyd George and Clemenceau are culpable only to the extent that they acted in obedience to a power they dared not oppose. These three Jews, representing the money power of the Rothschild family, determined the essential provisions of the infamous peace treaty.
>
> They established the International Labor Board; they made provisions for the Reparations Commission and the Brussels Financial Conference; they gave Palestine to the Jews; they established without our membership the League of Nations and the World Court.

> It was our refusal to join that prevented the consummation of their grandiose elaborate machine for the government of the World. (Rothschild Money Trust, pages 67, 68)

Although the name of Colonel House is not mentioned in this account, nevertheless it was House who more than Baruch represented the Rothschild interests in the United States at the conference. Continuing from The Rothschild Money Trust:

> These three Jews are responsible for the abandonment of President Wilson's Fourteen Points and of the flagrant violations of the promises upon which Germany laid down her arms. If President Wilson's pledges had been observed we would have no World War II. Perhaps if we had joined the League of Nations there would be none, for we would be the subjects of the 'King Despot' who would rule us with an iron hand.. .
>
> Jeroboam Rothschild (Mandel) was a member of the Reynaud cabinet and resigned with him and fled with him when France refused to be merged into the British Empire, but decided instead to surrender. The people of France now appear to realize, according to the press, that they are now the victims of warmongers . . .
>
> The League of Nations scheme did not originate with President Wilson. He made no such claim. Its precise origin is unknown, but the Jews claim credit for it. It is no doubt their baby; for it has all the earmarks of their craftiness. . . The London Daily Mail said of it that it is 'the most elaborate sham which history has yet perpetrated.'

Under the pretense of writing a peace treaty with Germany this peace conference established Palestine as a home for the Jews and invested the British Government with a mandate for the government of the country. The Jews have been at war with the Arabs since and the situation has become so intolerable that the British Government sought to divide the country between the Jews and the Arabs and surrender its responsibility, which pleased neither Jew nor Arab.

The people of America do not want a super-government or to be ruled by the pope of Rome or a despot of the blood of Zion. We barely escaped it when the Republicans with the aid of twelve willful democrats defeated the League of Nations project by a very small margin; for the League of Nations was meant to be that very thing. (Olivia Maria O'Grady, pages 68, 69 and 85)

A fitting epitaph (and perhaps a dire warning to the world) was written by O'Grady:

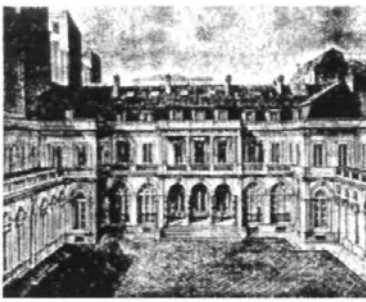
By the end of 1938 the collapse of the League of Nations was almost complete. Of the sixty-two nations that had constituted its membership, only forty-nine remained. At the close of 1940 it had ceased to exist.

It had gone the way of its predecessors - the Holy Alliance (so greatly feared by the Rothschilds-author) the Concert of Europe, and the Permanent Court of Arbitration.

It had failed because the United States had refused to participate, and because humanity had not yet been reduced to its common denominator of mediocrity.

'Mother,' 'home,' 'the flag,' 'heaven' and 'God and Country' were still deeply rooted in the minds and hearts of the people. Another war, and perhaps yet another, would be necessary before such 'reactionary bourgeois' concepts were blasted from the breasts of human beings.

(1) Mayer Amchel Rothschild
(2) Gutte Schnapper Rothschild
(3) The Rothschild family home on Judenstrasse Frankfurt Germany.



Rothschilds most famous sons who controlled a fortune in untold billions of dollars

(1) Jacob James Rothschild
(2) Lionel Rothschild
(3) Salomon, Nathan and Karl Rothschild

(1) Paris Residence of Jacob James Rothschild
(2) Waddesdon Manor (Mansion)
A Rothschild country residence in England

(1) Napoleon Bonaparte
(2) Arthur Wellesley (The Duke of Wellington)
(3) Marshall Soult
(4) General Blucher

CHAPTER 13

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS: AN ATTEMPT TO ESTABLISH A ONE WORLD GOVERNMENT

One of the most astonishing aspects of The League of Nations was the great push to get it accepted by the United States, and the extraordinary lengths and efforts made for this purpose. Wilson demanded ratification of the treaty, as it stood, no discussion, no changes, and no modifications.

The American people, having been assessed by Rothschild agents in America as sufficiently ready to accept anything it was expected to accept secret agreements reached behind closed doors in 1915. This is what the Rothschilds were accustomed to seeing happen. It was always a case of "our will be done" or else expect plenty of trouble.

On September 22, 1919, Professor I. Shotwell, an American Fabianist, demanded that the Senate ratify the treaty without delay, and Charles McParland, General Secretary of the World Council of Churches seconded his plea!

I mention this to illustrate, just how well entrenched International Socialism was in the United States.

Zionism was the key leader, even then. Regarding the Zionist movement in America, there is an interesting account of it in History of Zionism by Walter Laqueur:

> Only in 1917 did the Zionist organization in America come into being. . . But despite the events in Eastern Europe . . . the impact of the movement was hardly noticed in American life. Europe, after all, was far away and the situation of American Jewry and its prospects gave no cause for concern. The movement was basically 'East Side' in character. It lacked money, prestige and political influence. Its leaders, on the other hand, were assimilated Jews such as Rabbi Stephen Wise. . . The breakthrough came during the early years of the war in Europe, when Brandeis became its leader. Brandeis was one of the most respected American lawyers, later a Justice of the Supreme Court. He was won over by Jacob de Haas, a British Zionist and close associate of Herzl, who had settled in America in 1901.
>
> Brandeis, in the words of other Zionist leaders was unrelated to any form of Jewish life, unread in its literature and unfamiliar with its traditions; he had to rediscover the Jewish people. But once his imagination had been captured by the Zionist ideal, he devoted much of his time and energy to the movement, whose president he was from 1914 until his appointment to the Supreme Court. It was the identification of Louis Brandeis with the movement, more than any other single event, which made Zionism a political force. To be a Zionist had suddenly become respectable. (Pages 160,161)

There are some very important statements in this extract from Laqueur's book.

1. Zionism was not the concern of the vast majority of American Jews.

2. The vast majority of American Jews were not much concerned with the war in Europe.

3. Brandeis was not a religious Jew in any sense of the accepted meaning of a "religious" Jew.

4. The Zionist movement before Brandeis joined it was basically a Socialist movement of East side Bolshevik non-religious Jews, the very same ones whom Trotsky recruited for his mission to overturn Christian Russia, in other words, Zionist Jews.

5. The majority of American Jews were not interested in migrating to Israel until Brandeis got their attention. Apparently they did not regard Palestine as a "homeland," at least not in the political sense of a Zionist State, because their religion taught that there could be no Jewish State until the return of the Messiah.

In fairness and wishing no harm to the Jews, and to be strictly objective, I researched thousands of pages of Brandeis history, but could find no evidence that he rediscovered his Jewish religion. I could find no evidence that Brandeis became a religious Jew. What was discovered was that De Haas had converted Brandeis to active Zionism, which is a political, and not a religious movement, in which political movement Brandeis became more of a convert than St. Paul was to Christianity. Brandeis went on to become the provisional president of the World Federation of Zionists, in itself a purely political non-religious body of non-religious Jews.

Perhaps the best-known historic event in which the Rothschilds participated at all stages was the so-called "Balfour Declaration," which is generally accepted as the beginning of the State of Israel in the land of Palestine, which the Zionists had been working to achieve for the past hundred years. But by 1914 they had not made progress toward their goal, at least none worthy of mention. Zionism was no nearer to its often-stated goal of a Jewish State in Palestine than Herzl had been in 1897. According to the Congressional Records and papers in the British Museum, plus the War Memoirs of Robert Lansing, the American ambassador to London, and the writing of Ramsey McDonald, the First World War provided a golden opportunity for the furthering of the Herzl dream of a Zionist state in Palestine. Lansing pushed for America to enter WWI in 1915 and in pressuring Wilson, House, acting for the Rothschilds, joined him. Pressures on Wilson were enormous and the United States entered the war in Europe against the wishes of 87 percent of the American people.

The impression has always been given by establishment historians that a vast majority of Jews favored the establishment of a "Homeland for the Jews" in Palestine. Through a good deal of research I found this to be much of an exercise in propaganda. Actually, in Russia and Britain, there was not inconsiderable opposition to the idea from religious Jews who believed no such homeland could be established until after the return of their Messiah.

To blunt the attitude of religious Jews, Weisman made a speech in London on May 20, 1917 in which he asserted, that he knew that the British government was prepared to support Zionist plans for Palestine.

Of course he was not officially entitled to make such a claim, but no doubt knowing that the power and prestige of Lord Rothschild would more than likely carry the day, he did so, anyway. The anti-Zionist religious Jewish opposition under the direction of Claude Montefiore of the famous Montefiore Jewish dynasty was extremely upset, especially as Weizman had referred to religious Jews as "a small minority."

According to A History of Zionism, a letter, signed by Montefiore and David Alexander, the presidents of the British Board of Deputies was sent to the London Times newspaper, which was published on May 24, 1917, under the heading Palestine and Zionism, Views of Anglo-Jewry:

> They reiterated their protest against the Zionist theory of a homeless nationality, which if generally accepted, would have the effect everywhere of stamping Jews as an anachronism; religion was the only certain criterion. The signatories also said that it would be a calamity if Jewish settlers in Palestine were to get special rights in the way of political privileges or economic preference. This was a contradiction to the principle of equal rights for all. It would compromise the Jews wherever they had secured equal rights and would involve Palestinian Jews in the bitterest feuds with their neighbors of other races. (Pages 193, 194)

The wisdom and foresight of the religious non-Zionist Jews views is mirrored in the tragic events that overtook Palestine, which remains in a turmoil to this very day. Years later their views were echoed by a religious Jewish organization, Friends of Jerusalem (Naturei Karta). In a series of 12 full-page advertisements in the New York Times, they decried the State of Israel as an illegitimate state, established in total flagrant disobedience to religious Jews and the Torah and a calamity for Orthodox Jews.

CHAPTER 14

BRITISH GOVERNMENT TREACHERY BETRA YS ARABS AND LAWRENCE OF ARABIA

By a good deal of trickery involving the betrayal of Lawrence of Arabia, secret deals between the English and French (the Sykes Picot Treaty) the two governments decided to divide Arab lands between them at the end of the war. Does that sound extraordinary? Yes, it was and could only have been done with the backing of the Rothschilds. One such deception involved a letter from the Zionist leader, Sokolow, who designated another Zionist, a certain Sacher, to prepare a draft addressed to Balfour, that the reconstitution of Palestine as a Jewish state was one of its essential war aims. Having second thoughts Sokolow believed this was too ambitious:

> If we ask too much we will get nothing," a view evidently shared by Lord Rothschild. However, they were appalled when the Foreign Office issued its own draft, which employed such terms as 'asylum' and 'refuge' and 'sanctuary' for victims of Jewish persecution. This was, needless to say, rejected by the Zionists, who insisted that the declaration would have no value at all unless the principle of recognizing Palestine as a National Home for the Jewish people was affirmed. Eventually, on 18 July, Rothschild submitted a compromise formula to Balfour. It mentioned not a Jewish state, but a National home.

> (A History of Zionism, pages 195-196 Sokolow, Geschite des Zionismus, British Museum Papers)

Unfortunately the voices of protest by religious Jewish leaders were drowned out by political Zionism, which with the backing of the Rothschilds carried the day in their favor. Ramsey McDonald summed up his feelings about such underhanded behavior:

> We encouraged the Arab revolt in Turkey by promising to create an Arab kingdom from the Arab provinces of the Ottoman Empire, including Palestine.
>
> At the same time we were encouraging the Jews to help us by promising them that Palestine would be placed at their disposal for settlement and government; and also at the same time we were making with France the Sykes Picot agreement partitioning the territory, which we instructed our Governor General in Egypt to promise to the Arabs. The story is one of crude duplicity and we cannot escape the reprobation which is its sequel. (Emphasis added)

What exactly did McDonald mean when he said: At the time we were encouraging the Jews to help us promising them that Palestine would be theirs. How were the Jews to help with the war? By providing men from Jewish countries to fight the Turks like the Arab did? No, it was nothing like that. The Zionists provided no manpower to help the British and the Arabs to fight the Turks. How did the Zionists help?

They persuaded the U.S. Congress to declare war on Germany against the wishes of 87% of the American people. For that, behind the backs of the Arabs and other Palestinian residents, whose antecedents had lived in Palestine for 7,000 years; the British, with U.S. complicity, promised Palestine to the Zionists although not remotely sanctioned to do so by any international law.

Only a very few voices were raised in protest over what Arnold Toynbee called "the calamity." Several writers, Olivia Maria O'Grady among them, joined in the protest against the Sykes Picot partitioning plan that led to the so-called Balfour Declaration:

> Throughout the war, England and her allies continuously proclaimed that they were fighting for world freedom. What kind of a freedom is contained in the Balfour Declaration? By what right did Britain propose to dispose of the land of another people? Upon what moral ground may one nation seek to establish a national home for alien people in the territory of another? Palestine did not belong to Britain.

Arnold Toynbee was a greatly favored British historian and public figure of note who had received universal recognition for his work, A Study of History, comprising ten volumes, constituting an exhaustive re-examination of human development in the light of the idealist philosophy of history.

Thus no one would dare call McDonald, Toynbee and Lawrence of Arabia "anti-Jewish" or "anti-Semitic" the threat of which had kept so many others of a like mind from speaking out against the duplicity of the British Government as expressed in the illicit Balfour Declaration. Toynbee expressed his feelings of anger about the betrayal of the Arabs over Palestine in A Study of History.

> While the direct responsibility for the calamity that overtook the Palestinian Arabs in A.D., 1948 was on the heads of Zionist Jews who seized lebensroum for themselves in Palestine by force of arms in that year, > a heavy load of indirect responsibility was on the heads of the people of the United Kingdom; for the Zionists would not have had in A.D. 1948 the opportunity to conquer an Arab country in which they had what amounted to no more than an inconsiderable minority in A.D. 1918 if during the intervening thirty years, the power of the United Kingdom had not been exerted continuously to make possible the entry of Jewish immigrants into Palestine, contrary to the will, in despite of the protests and without regard to the forebodings of the Arab inhabitants of the country who in A.D. 1918, were duly to become the victims of this long pursued British policy.

Lawrence of Arabia (Colonel Lawrence), who could less still be accused of anti-Jewish bias or smeared as "anti Semitic" did not remain silent over the betrayal of his commitment to the Arabs:

> If we won the war, the promises to the Arabs were dead paper. Yet the Arab inspiration was our main tool in winning the Eastern War. So I assured them that England kept her word in letter and in spirit. In this comfort they performed their fine things; but, of course, instead of being proud of what we did together, I was bitterly ashamed.

Other voices added to what Lawrence had expressed as a feeling of utter betrayal, among them, O'Grady:

> Colonel Lawrence had good reason to be ashamed. While the Arabs were fighting and dying for England, Britain's Foreign Minister, Arthur Balfour was bartering Palestine for a Jewish pledge to bring the United States into the war on England's side. In addition to this treachery, England and France, by the terms of the Sykes Picot Treaty agreed to divide the Arab lands between them at the end of the war.

I pondered for months over the statement of Toynbee, because Toynbee's background and affiliations made it highly unlikely that he would express feelings in the least bit critical of the Zionists or of his mentors, Rockefeller and Rothschild. According to documents in the War Office files (and copies in the British Museum) Toynbee was the protege of Lord Bryce, a follower of the Philosophical Radicals. Toynbee followed in the footsteps of Bryce by writing an article for the Encyclopedia Britannica, 9th Edition.

The article was entitled German Terror in France: A Historical Record and it was an unabashed exercise in anti-German propaganda, published, significantly in New York in 1917. Obviously, it was an incitement to help President Wilson with his battle to drag America into the war in Europe. Though none of the claims of German brutality could be substantiated — nevertheless, the article was widely accepted as true.

It was just the kind of justification Wilson needed from a Fellow of Balliol College, Oxford, as the reason why America needed to send her sons to die in France "to make the world safe for democracy."

We next hear of Toynbee when he was appointed as a Member of the British Delegation to the Paris Peace Conference, - hardly the prestigious position that he would jeopardize at the time of his planned future with the Royal Institute for International Affairs, the Foreign Policy arm of the Committee of 300.

As such, Toynbee must have been intimately familiar with the promises made to the Sheriff of Mecca, Hussein bin Ali and Colonel Lawrence, and the magnitude of the subsequent betrayal of the trust of these two men, who had made possible British victory over the Turks.

Toynbee had authored a major work, which called for an authoritarian One World Government, a copy of which was delivered to President Wilson by Colonel House and upon which many of Wilson's and the Royal Institute for International Affairs dictates were based. I found that Toynbee was supported with funding to the extent of a quarter of a million dollars, but there was no direct indication that he was also funded by the Rothschilds, although there might have been this connection, in view of the fact that it was House who delivered the instructions Wilson was to follow at The League of Nations conference.

Herein lies the seeds of disaster, the origin of the turmoil that continues to this day in Palestine, and fair-minded people, like the Jewish Orthodox Naturei Karta, knew the well hidden history of the Rothschild-Balfour sell-out of the Arabs contained in that document. The Naturei Karta Orthodox Jews do not agree with a "Jewish Homeland" conception. This noble Jewish Orthodox movement is opposed to a Zionist presence in Palestine.

As for the Christians of Europe and America, they have fallen into a state of indifference toward the fate of Palestine's "other" inhabitants. This does not redound to their honor and the Christian ethic of fair play embodied in the words of Christ: "Do unto others as you would have them do unto you."

Throughout the ages, philosophers, historians and scholars have posed the question: Why is it that the history of wars show, that they are always begun by the so-called "elite," the rulers of nations? One reason as enunciated by Henry Clay is when ever there is discontent among the populace, that foreign threat is used as a pretext to quell such unrest.

The second and perhaps the most important reason is that all wars are economic in origin. Since control of banking and finances are in the hands of the elite, they have been known to excite wars for economic gains. For instance, the international bankers reaped huge fortunes from the First World War. The Rothschilds gained enormous profits out of financing both sides of the American Civil War.

There is also the Bertrand Russell theory, that wars diminish populations. In the eyes of the Committee of 300, the world is filled with too many people, who are depleting the world's natural resources at an alarming rate. The solution, Russell said, is to get rid of what he referred to as "useless eaters," who should be culled at regular intervals.

Ten million dead in WWI was not enough to satisfy Russell, who promoted the idea, that plagues and pandemics should be introduced at regular intervals to wipe out "useless eaters," who had escaped the wars. The AIDS pandemic was deliberately introduced in the expectation that it would wipe out millions from the pool of "excess population."

The elite have devised ways to preserve their members from plagues as evidence by the success in warding off the Black Plague pandemic of the Middle Ages. With regard to military service of the kind faced by foot soldiers, the elite have a record of successful evasive tactics witness the record of President G.W. Bush and Vice President Richard Cheney. These are not isolated instances, but are found in abundance in the records of all nations.

CHAPTER 15

UNDERHAND DOUBLE DEALING

William L. Langer, Coolidge Professor of History, Emeritus Harvard University, somewhat tersely stated the political situation in 1915 as follows:

> Campaigns in Asiatic Turkey, 1916-1917
> . . . Palestine was to be under an international administration. May 9, 1916, The Sykes-Picot Agreement between Britain and France . . . the territories mentioned in the above agreement to be French and British administered, while the rest of Arabia was to be divided into French and British spheres of influence, though organized as an Arab state or federation of states.

In a classic understatement, Professor Langer then added: "These agreements were not entirely compatible with other agreements made with Arab chieftains, agreements, which indeed, were not compatible with each other." In other words two different mandates were made, offering two sets of objectives, the one totally unknown to the Arabs.

Is there any previous history of such actions by a U.S. president ever having been approved? Was it lawful under the U.S. Constitution for Wilson to have carried out his negotiations, essentially in privacy with private persons not officially sanctioned by their government? The answer to these questions must be in the negative. The consequences for the U.S. Government and for the American people were far reaching, and humiliating. Moreover, there has never been an explanation for the American people why the Balfour Declaration was submitted to Lionel Rothschild for his acceptation, since he held no official position? For this reason alone, the Balfour Declaration was and is a spurious document. It is clear that already at that point the British Government had begun to double-deal the Arabs and their brilliant British leader, Colonel Thomas Edward Lawrence, best known as "Lawrence of Arabia." Professor Langer then goes back two years to October 31, 1914 and gives a full account of the geographical position of the Arabs, and what Britain did to try and snatch victory from the jaws of defeat in the War in the Middle East:

> Lord Kitchener (Commander of the British forces) had offered Hussein, the Grand Sheriff of Mecca a conditional guaranty of independence. Negotiations between the Sheriff and the British government were embarked upon in July 1915. On January 30, 1916, the British accepted Hussein terms, leaving the exact status of Baghdad and Basra and of the sphere of French influence in Syria, undetermined.

It is worthy of note that there is no mention here of a "Jewish homeland" in Palestine being reserved for Jews.

> On June 5, 1916, the beginning of the Arab revolts in the Hijaz and an attack on the Turkish garrison at Medina.
>
> On June 7, Hussein proclaimed the independence of the Hijaz and the (Turkish) garrison at Medina surrendered.

On October 29, Hussein was proclaimed king of all Arabs. He summoned the Arabs to make war on the Turks.

On December 15, the British government recognized Hussein as king of the Hijaz, and all Arabs. It was largely in order to strengthen the Arab insurrection that Sir Archibald Murray, (commander in Egypt since March 19, 1916) decided on a cautious offensive in Sinai and Palestine. During all of these revisions and military actions, there was never once any mention whatsoever of a 'Jewish Homeland' in Palestine being a part of any of the negotiations and agreement between the British government and the Arabs. One would certainly be on safe ground to assume, that had this been mentioned, the Arabs would have baulked at it there and then, and would never taken El Arish. The majority of historians agree on this vital point.

On December 21, 1916, the British took El Arish, after building a railway and pipeline across the desert. On April 17-19 1917, the British were forced back by a combined force of Turks and Germans with heavy losses. June 28, Murray was replaced by Sir Edmund Allenby.

On July 6 began the emergence of the spectacular war hero Colonel Thomas E. Lawrence, who galvanized the Arab movement and took Aqaba, thus beginning the brilliant thrusts against the Turkish garrisons and especially against the guards of the Hijaz railway, the most important link in the Turkish communications. History confirms that all this fighting along the Hijaz rail link and Aqaba was done solely by Arab forces under the command of > Lawrence. No British troops were involved in these key campaigns and there is no mention of any Jewish forces being involved. It is readily admitted by Langer and other historians that without the help of the Arabs, the British would not have been able to drive Turkey out of Arabia and Palestine. In reflection, it was the Arabs under Lawrence, who drove the Turks out of Arabia and Palestine. It is utterly illogical to believe, that the Arabs under Lawrence and under his promises did so knowing, that a 'Homeland for the Jews' was to be the reward for their fighting."

Langer then goes on to say:

> On the Palestine front the new British commander, Gen Edmund Allenby, had begun his advance in October 1917. . . On December 9, Allenby took Jerusalem. The British advance was delayed by the fact that Allenby had been obliged to send large contingents of his army to France to meet the crisis on the battlefront in France where the British Army was being defeated with heavy losses, and to halt the victorious German advances. The British Army ordered all its forces fighting in Mesopotamia and Turkey back to the German and French fronts to help to stem the advances of French and German troops in Europe.

I suspect, that there were no British troops left in Palestine other than a few garrison and supply troops, the vast majority having been sent to France on March 18, 1918. Langer statement, that British forces materially assisted by the Arabs is wrong. It was Arab forces assisted by a few British troops left behind after the main British Army was shipped in France that did the bulk of the fighting. Langer added that British forces put an end to the Turkish presence in Palestine. I suggest his account is palpably wrong.

It was the Arab Forces that ended a Turkish presence in Palestine. No French or British or Jewish troops were present at major battles in Palestine. That is an undisputed fact. Toynbee and Lawrence were horrified and expressed outrage against Langer's report that appeared in the London Times declaring it false. It is obvious that stripped of his British troops, Allenby had to rely on Arab forces to press his campaign against the Turks, knowing that the battle-seasoned Arabs would push the Turks out of Palestine during their September 8, 1918 campaign. Langer states:

> The British broke the Turkish lines near the Mediterranean and began to roll up the enemy forces. The British forces, assisted materially by the Arabs under Lawrence, were now able to push northward.

Here again Langer very much tries to minimize the key role played by the Arab forces who did most of the fighting. On page 316 of her book, historian O'Grady stated her opinion of the events in Palestine:

> With the British Army marching on the Holy Land, Jewish prospects for Palestine at the hands of the Kaiser began to fade. If Great Britain would guarantee world Jewry a foothold in Palestine, world Jewry would work for Great Britain. Negotiations were opened with the British government in February 1917, with Sir Mark Sykes acting as the principal intermediary. On November 2, 1917, Lord Balfour reduced the results of the secret bargaining and extensive communications between private persons in the U.S. in a letter addressed to Lionel Rothschild, the uncrowned King of Israel.

This letter was to become known as The Balfour Declaration and read as follows:

> Dear Lord Rothschild, I have much pleasure in conveying to you, on behalf of His Majesty's Government, the following declaration in sympathy with Jewish Zionist aspirations which has been submitted to and approved by the Cabinet.
>
> His majesty's Government views with favor, the establishment in Palestine of a national homeland for the Jewish people and will use its best endeavors to facilitate the achievement of this object, it being clearly understood that nothing shall be done which may prejudice the civil and religious rights of non-Jewish communities in Palestine or the rights and political status enjoyed by Jews in any other country. I shall be pleased if you would bring this Declaration to the knowledge of the Zionist Federation.
>
> The Jews labored diligently to make the Gentile public believe that Lord Balfour, seeing the 'justice' of their cause wrote the declaration after 'selling' the idea to the British government. In reporting the issuance of the letter, the Zionists said:
>
> 'The Balfour Declaration is justly so-called, not only because it fell to Sir Arthur Balfour, as Foreign Secretary, to write the historic letter, but also because he, more than any other single statesman, is responsible for the policy embodied in the Declaration'.

In fairness to the Jewish people, I searched, but could not find any reference to Lawrence of Arabia or Sheriff Hussein nor any of the leaders of the people living in Palestine having been consulted by Balfour or Sykes although a diligent search was made to see if such had perhaps been recorded and had escaped the notice of researchers, but such was not be the case. Continuing with O'Grady:

> And of course, nothing could be further from the truth. The original draft was written by the Jews themselves. Who was the Justice Brandeis who edited it? Brandeis was a far left Socialist of the American Democrat Party, a U.S. Supreme Court Justice and a member of several Zionist organizations. All through the negotiations of Arthur Balfour and Lord Rothschild, none of which ever included Sheriff Hussein or Lawrence of Arabia; Brandeis acted as a United States citizen and was never authorized by the Congress, the State Department to act as a U.S. government spokesman.

It is stated by historian O'Grady that "President Wilson approved it." That raises important issues: When Wilson became involved in the "discussions" between Brandeis, Lionel Rothschild, Lord Balfour and the American Zionist Party, was he acting in a capacity other than the President?

* If in the negative, was Wilson acting officially in his role of U.S. President?

* Had the Congress approved Wilson's acts and were they funded by the Congress?

* If in the affirmative had Wilson been authorized by a U.S. Congressional Resolution to act in any capacity whatsoever?

> President Wilson approved it, and it was then submitted to Balfour for his signature. No event in the > history of the United States is more humiliating. There is no explanation as to why the Declaration was written by Brandeis, who held no government office and then submitted to Lionel Rothschild, who held no official position in the British government. (Maria O'Grady)

The behind-the-scenes activities that went on are explained by Dr. Jacob de Haas, in his Biography of Justice Brandeis:

> A considerable number of drafts [of the Balfour Declaration] were made in London and transmitted to the United States through War Office channels for the use of the American Zionist Political Committee. The American ascendancy in the war councils led the British to ask for President Wilson's consent and approval of the terminology of the declaration before its issuance.
>
> The draft that was cabled from government to government was handed to the Brandeis regime for its approval. After a most necessary revision, President Wilson acting through Colonel House, who was in full sympathy with Zionist aims, authorized cabling to the British government the version that was published, and which all the allied governments in turn gave their approval.
>
> The 'Brandeis regime' refers to the Provisional Committee of the General Zionist Affairs of which Brandeis was chairman. Can you the reader, imagine that! Cabled drafts, the United States, the British War Office, all working to the benefit of the Zionists! What immense power do they wield!

Again, there is no mention of Hussein, Lawrence, the Arab leaders or the people of Palestine being consulted in any way, nor does it appear that the United States Congress knew anything about the secret negotiations between the non-American Government Brandeis committee and Lord Rothschild, Wilson and Balfour. Only the Zionists were consulted.

> Most students of Jewish intrigue suspected both the British and Jewish schemes and purpose behind the Balfour Declaration. Although the United States had been in the war for nearly seven months when the Declaration was made public, its significance as the factor that involved the United States was not unnoticed.
>
> There was considerable evidence available from which accurate inferences might be drawn. Government negotiations for deals of this nature however, are always secret, and it is usually very difficult to obtain conclusive evidence at the time of the transaction.
>
> When the event is beyond repair and lost in the mists of the past, men are apt to write their memoirs and to boast of secret exploits that one time rocked the world. So it was with Mr. Landman. He was honorary Secretary of the Second Joint Zionist Council of the United Kingdom, editor of the Zionist and Secretary and Solicitor for the Zionist Organization. Later he was legal adviser to the New Zionist Organization.

Under the title, Great Britain, the Jews and Palestine, published in the London Jewish Chronicle of February 7, 1936, Mr. Landman writes in part as follows:

During the critical days of the war, in 1916, when the defection of Russia was imminent and Jewish opinion was generally anti-Russian, and hopes that Germany if victorious, would in certain circumstances give them Palestine, several attempts were made by the Allies to bring America into the War on their side. These attempts were unsuccessful.

Mr. George Picot, of the French Embassy in London and Gout of the Quai d'Orsay Eastern Section, who was at that time in close touch with the late Sir Mark Sykes, Cabinet Secretariat, took the opportunity of convincing the representatives of the British and French governments that the best and perhaps the only way to induce the American President to come into the War was to secure the co-operation of Zionist Jewry by promising them Palestine.

By so doing, the Allies would enlist and mobilize the hitherto unsuspected powerful force of Zionist Jewry in America, and elsewhere in favor of the Allies on a quid pro quo basis. At that time, President Wilson attached the greatest possible importance to the advice of Mr. Justice Brandeis.

Sir Mark obtained permission of the War Cabinet to authorize Mr. Malcolm to approach the Zionists on that basis, neither Mark Sykes nor Mr. Malcolm knew who the Zionists leaders were, and it was Mr. L.J. Greenberg to whom Mr. Malcolm applied for information to whom he should address himself... The Zionists carried out their part and helped to bring America in, and the Balfour Declaration of November 2, 1917 was but the public conformation of the verbal agreement of 1916.

> This verbal agreement was made with the previous acquiescence and approval of not only the British, French, American and other Allied Governments, but also of the Arab leaders. . . As already explained elsewhere in detail Dr. Weitzman and Mr. Sokolow knew that Mr. James Malcolm came to them as the emissary of the British War Cabinet, which authorized him to say in their name that England would give Palestine to the Jews in return for Zionist assistance, through Justice Brandeis in inducing the United States to come to the help of the Allies. Both Sir Mark Sykes and Mr. Malcolm informed the Arab representatives in London and Paris that without the assistance of the United States the prospects of any Arab State arising after the war were problematical, and that they must therefore agree that Palestine should go to the Jews as a regard for their assistance in bringing in the United States.

After a good deal of diligent research, I could not find the names of the "Arab representatives in Paris and London" allegedly informed of the plot to go behind the promises given to Hussein bin Ali, Sheriff of Mecca and Medina and to Colonel Lawrence, nor does Mr. Landman name these mysterious "Arab representatives." That raises the question "why not?" As he mentions everyone else by name, why are the "Arab representatives" kept anonymous?

What is abundantly clear is, that neither Lawrence or Hussein bin Ali were informed of what was going on, while they were risking their lives and the lives of their men in the war against Turkey, nor could any record be found that these two men knew anything about the secret negotiations with the Zionists nor that they were asked to send their representatives in London and Paris. The Zionists were informed, but not the American people on whose backs the War was to be fought.

CHAPTER 16

"PERFIDIOUS ALBION" LIVES UP TO ITS REPUTATION

> In any event, like the ordinary American people, Lawrence and Hussein bin Ali knew nothing about what Ramsey McDonald called "a triple deal" going on behind their backs. And when the time came for Wilson to drag America into the European conflict against the will of the vast majority, his enfeebled excuse was the war was a war "to make the world safe for democracy." The treason committed by Wilson lives on. Dr. Bella Dodd wrote in 1930 that so bad was the situation under Wilson, that he felt "modern history is largely a conspiracy against the truth. (The Conspiracy Against God and Man, page 9)

I discovered that but for the backing of Baron Edmond Rothschild the settlements of Russian Zionists established at Rison, Zikron and Rosh Pina would have failed and there would have been virtually no Jewish presence in Palestine. This was a key part of Rothschild strategy to make it appear that Jews were already living in Palestine — a subterfuge that worked. Rothschild also assisted with establishing two new colonies, Ekron and Medull. Altogether twenty-one Agricultural settlements existed by the end of the century, but Rothschild did not trust the abilities of the colonists and insisted in keeping direct supervision and control of the settlements. Hubert Herring in his book And So To War sums up the price the U.S. had to pay to so that the Zionists might have Palestine:

> We paid for the war. We paid with the lives of 126,000 dead, of 234,300 mutilated and wounded. We paid with the dislocated lives of hundreds of thousands whom the war wrenched from their accustomed places in a peaceful world. We paid in the imponderable damage to our national morale through the lashings of war hysteria. We paid with a period of economic confusion from which we have not yet escaped. The direct bill for the war reached the figure of fifty-five billions of dollars. The indirect bill can never be reckoned.

And what was the quid pro-quo from the Zionists side? As far as I could ascertain it amounted to absolutely nothing. An interesting aside was the failure of Herzl to obtain the blessing of Pope Pius X for Jewish immigration to Palestine: We are unable to favor this movement. We cannot prevent the Jews from going to Jerusalem, but we could never sanction it.

According to A History of Zionism, pages 129-130, the exchange took place at a meeting with the Pope in 1903, meaning that Lord Arthur Balfour knew that there was strong opposition from the Catholic Church against Zionist immigration to Palestine, long before he signed on to the declaration, but about which he informed no one. So the pattern of double-dealing was already apparent in 1903.

Catholic opposition to Israel may have contributed to the Rothschilds violent hatred of Russia with its large Christian population.

Herzl, the father of Zionism died when he was 44 years old. According to A History of Zionism, he never got on very well with the Rothschilds or with Orthodox Jewry whose leading rabbis did not like his autocratic style. Herzl always wanted to have the final say on everything.

> There was, as Herzl's critics pointed out, very little specifically Jewish in Herzl. This emerges perhaps more clearly in his vision of the Jewish state...
>
> Herzl envisaged a modern, technologically advanced and enlightened state, enlightened by the Jews, but not specifically a Jewish state. (A History of Zionism, pages 132-133)

It can hardly be argued that Herzl was interested in Palestine as a religious "homeland" for the Jews, particularly in light of the fact, that the bulk of the new settlers came from Russia and had no previous connection to Palestine and there was no history of Russian Jews ever having lived there, nor were they particularly religious.

Lacquer makes this abundantly plain. Lord Chamberlain came forward with an offer to provide a "homeland" for the Jews in Uganda, even though Uganda was not the British Government's land to give. Chamberlain told Herzl that he had been on a tour of Uganda and thought: Here is a land for Dr. Herzl, but of course he only wants Palestine or its neighborhood. He was right. Herzl brushed aside the idea. His fixation was with Palestine and nothing else would do. On May 30, 1903 he wrote Rothschild: I am not discouraged. I already have a very powerful man to help me. (A History of Zionism, Walter Laqueur, pages 122,123)

This was the true autocratic style of Herzl in action. Although I was not able to uncover any direct links between the Rothschilds and Sir Halford Mackinder, such as correspondence that passed between intermediaries hinting that the two did consult on a number of matters, especially in writing the blue print for the coming One World Government-

New World Order which had been assigned to Mackinder to complete. A protege of the London School of Economics which was a hotbed for Communist ideals, Mackinder nevertheless put up a good conservative front and is believed to have influenced President Wilson at the Paris Peace Conference as to what steps were to be implemented to usher in a New World Order through a League of Nations mandate. It is certain that the Rothschilds provided a great deal of input for the World Socialist dream. One month after Wilson arrived at the Paris Peace Conference, Mackinder's new book Democratic Ideals and Reality was published. The timing of the release of the book was no accident. In his book Mackinder called for a New World Order (NWO) to be established in a One World Government, ostensibly The League of Nations. If this goal could not be achieved by peaceful, voluntary means, then force was to be resorted to.

Mackinder admitted that while the New World Order would be ideally a democratic institution, it could never be expected that at times it would not be a dictatorship. The Zionists claimed that The League of Nations was their concept and this is referred to by Maria O'Grady in her book where she stated:

> President Wilson was surrounded by Jewish financial fraternity pushed hither and yon by the sinister Colonel House and counseled by the Zionist Brandeis. (Page 342)

The Zionists greatly favored the concept of a League of Nations and claimed it as their creation: The League is a Jewish idea, said Nahum Sokolow at the Carlsbad Conference. We created it after a fight of 25 years.

Ultimate World Government dominated by Socialists is the long-held goal of Socialism, and it is well known that the concept was favored by the Rothschilds. As one of their own family, Jacob Schiff worked hard to establish a League of Nations. It received a donation of 3,000 pounds from N.M. Rothschild of the London branch of the family. As we shall see there may have been an ulterior motive to this, as the League was to play a decisive role in granting a mandate for Palestine to the British Government, a decisive step along the road to granting "a Homeland" for the Jews in Palestine. With that in mind I return to Lord Balfour and his so-called "Balfour Declaration," based on double-dealing, deception and secret deals behind the backs of Colonel Lawrence and the Arabs.

Balfour made haste to explain that a "Jewish Homeland" in Palestine did not mean the imposition of a Jewish state upon the inhabitants of Palestine, but in the light of subsequent events, this emerged as the goal of the Zionists. As Balfour put it:

> . . . but the further development of the existing Jewish community, in order that they may become a center in which the Jewish people, as a whole, might take, on grounds of religion and race, interest and pride.

What Balfour left out was that nothing the British did or said could obscure the fact that Palestine was not theirs to give, nor did the British Government have the slightest right to secure a mandate for Palestine. But Balfour, backed by Lord Nathan Rothschild, pressed ahead anyway, as if the two men had an inherent right to act in the arbitrary manner which they saw fit. The right of the Arab and other population groups, including Christians that extended back for more than 7,000 years was totally disregarded by Lord Balfour. No less an authority than Walter Laqueur, one of the foremost experts on Zionism confirmed that the bulk of the Jews who were to inhabit Palestine under the Balfour Declaration came from Russia. They had no previous connection to Palestine. Laqueur also pointed out that Russian Jews were not overly happy about being uprooted from Russia and sent to Palestine:

> Russian Jewry was divided in its attitude toward Zionism and a Jewish national home (a religious homeland) and would not have in any case have been able to keep Russia in the war. The Allies on the other hand, to put it somewhat crudely, would have won the war even if no promise to the Zionists had been made.

What Laqueur was explaining, if somewhat obliquely, was the "deal" the Zionists had struck with Balfour, namely, that if the Zionists could bring the United States into the war on the side of the allies, the British would establish a Jewish Homeland in Palestine in return.

> At a private meeting soon after the passage of the Balfour Declaration, when asked whether it had been his intention to make a bid for Jewish support in the war, Balfour snapped 'certainly not' and went on to explain that he felt that he was instrumental in righting a wrong of world historical dimensions. In 1922 Balfour made a speech in which he said that the whole culture of Europe had been guilty of great crimes against the Jews, and Britain had taken the initiative in giving them the opportunity of developing in peace, the great gifts which they had, in the past been able to apply in countries of the Diaspora. (A History of Zionism, page 203)

Balfour did not explain why it was considered legal to give Palestine to the Jews when it belonged to a people who had been there for 7,000 years, especially as a big tract of land in Madagascar, as well as land in Uganda, had been offered and rejected without discussion. Nor did Balfour explain that his magnanimous gesture in favor of the Jews would be at the expense of the Arab and other non-Jewish populations of Palestine. He never explained what connections the bulk of the new settlers, coming as they did from Russia had with Palestine.

According to Dr. Jacob de Haas, Balfour's altruistic protestations must be very much doubted because the real motive behind the Declaration was to get the United States to enter the war on the side of the Allies.

Confirmation of the true motives behind the Balfour Declaration came from another well-founded source, Congressional Record, April 25, 1939, pages 6597-6604, which reflects a speech made in the U.S. Senate by Senator Nye:

> There has been published in a series of works under the title "The Next War." One of the volumes in this series is entitled "Propaganda in the Next War." This particular volume was written by one Sydney Rogerson.
>
> I have been unable to obtain any trace of his background; but the editor in chief of all of these works, including the one entitled "Propaganda in the Next War" is by a man whose name is recognized the world over as a authority in Great Britain. He is none other than Captain Liddell Hart, associated with the London Times, a writer and military authority in Europe.
>
> I understand that this particular volume "Propaganda in the Next War," published last fall and placed in circulation, instead of having the circulation enlarged, now is suffering at the hands of those who desire to retire it from circulation. A few days ago I came on the floor of the Senate with the volume itself. I am sorry that I do not have it with me > today. I am told that it is the only copy of "Propaganda in the Next War" available in the United States. It can be had, I can borrow it against if there is any occasion for me to need it in the Senate, but it is no longer easy to obtain. I wish I had the entire work and that it could be read by every member of the Senate.

The following are quotations from Propaganda in the Next War:

> From time to time the issue of which side the United States would take hung in the balance and the final result was a credit to our profaned machine. There remain the Jews. It has been estimated that of the world's population of 15,000,000 no fewer than 5,000,000 are in the United States; 25 percent of the population of New York are Jews. During the Great War we bought off this huge Jewish public by the promise of a National Home in Palestine, held by Ludendorf to be a masterstroke of propaganda, as it enabled us not only to appeal to the Jews in America, but to the Jews in Germany as well.

George Armstrong in his work The Rothschild Money Trust explains how this came about:

> There can be no doubt about the fact that prior to President Wilson's second election in 1916 he kept us out of the war. There can likewise be no doubt about the fact that he was elected on that slogan. Why did he change his mind soon after the election ? Why did he make an arrangement with the British Government to help the Allies? That has been until now, an unexplained mystery. (Page 62)

CHAPTER 17

"TRIPLE CROSS" DECIDES FATE OF PALESTINE

Ramsey McDonald characterized the Balfour Declaration as "a triple cross," yet The League of Nations made its first mistake in a series of many by granting a British mandate on September 23, 1923, proving so early in the game that it was not an impartial body by any definition. Reciting the Balfour Declaration in the preamble of the Mandate Commission, it dealt with the problems of immigration and how it proposed they were to be dealt with by a number of Articles, of which Article 22 was the most compelling. Nowhere did it deal with the question of Britain giving away land that it did not own:

> Whereas the League of Nations declares: 'Where populations are not yet able to stand alone, the machinery of government should be set up for them in keeping with the accepted beliefs that the well being of and developments of such peoples forms a scared trust of civilization'.

To the inexperienced the subtlety of the way in which the Wilson guarantees were short-circuited may not be immediately apparent, but what Article 23 did was to negate Wilson's guarantees of "self determination and independence" and replace them with the imagined right of The League of Nations to interfere in the affairs of sovereign nations and states, in effect soiling its own charter. Thus it must become obvious to the fair-minded that from its very inception, the League intended to play fast and loose with the internal affairs of sovereign nations and states. This immorality and underhanded political gerrymandering was continued even more shamelessly when the League gave birth to its bastard child, the United Nations, which awarded Palestine to the Zionists in 1948 thereby doing violence to the "sacred of civilizations" embodied in Article 22 of the deceased parent League, long since forgotten.

Lawrence of Arabia and the Sheriff of Mecca were appalled by the betrayal of the British promise to Emir Hussein, who had fought the Turkish Army to a standstill, believing in the promises of Lawrence that Britain always kept her word.

At the Peace Conference, the Arabs were represented by Emir Feizal, son of Sheriff Hussein. He had commanded the Arab troops under the direction of Colonel Lawrence, and was a signatory to the McMahon-Hussein Treaty, which gave the written assurance that Britain would keep her commitment and promise to the Arabs over Palestine.

Unable to fully understand English and French and not being a man accustomed to dark intrigues and betrayals of one's word, Feizal did not comprehend what was happening, so much so that he appealed to Wilson, who sent an American Commission, the King-Crane Commission to Palestine to investigate.

What the King-Crane Commission members reported to Wilson was startling: Ninety percent of the population of Palestine opposed any Jewish immigration to Palestine. Quoting from the Commission's report:

> To subject a people so minded to unlimited immigration and a steady financial and social pressure to surrender land would be in gross violation of the principles just quoted, and of the people's rights, although it kept within the forms of > law, with the best possible intentions, it may be doubted whether the Jews could possibly seem to either Christians and Moslems proper guardians of the Holy Places, or custodians of the Holy Land as a whole.

The Zionists were determined to bury the report. Wilson, bowing to the Zionists who surrounded him, compromised his principles and a bogus "mandate system" replaced the "self determination" clause.

Under the supervision of The League of Nations, a bogus "mandate" for Palestine was awarded to the British. Wilson's belief in the "backward" nature of non-European populations convinced him that they would accept the mandate system. The King-Crane Commission report was shelved, leaving Imperialism and Zionism triumphant in the guise of mandates. The Commission's report simply disappeared from view.

It was not published in the London Times or the New York Times, nor was it put into the business of the House and Senate. To repeat, it simply vanished! But fortunately for "the sacred trust of civilization" the report was published in a minor publication called the Editor and Publisher. How and why did it "vanish?" The reader can draw his or her own conclusions, which are rather self-evident.

> When Justice Brandeis heard that the British officials administering the Mandate were not favoring Jews, he immediately set out for Palestine accompanied by his biographer, Dr. de Haas. Upon their arrival in the Holy Land they found the reports to be only too true. Dr. de Haas wrote that the British Commander in Chief and military and civil aids regarded the Balfour Declaration as a forgotten episode of the war. The American Supreme Court Justice went straight to Balfour.

An added note: I emphasize the fact, that an American Supreme Justice journeyed to Palestine to admonish a British official, a Foreign Minister no less, and demanded that the Palestine Administration be reprimanded! Who had given the American non-official, non-representative of the U.S. Government such authority? By this arrogant display of power, Brandeis intimidated all who opposed Zionist policy for Palestine.

> A few hours later the British Foreign Office was reminding the military authorities in Egypt and Palestine, not only of the verbal content of the Balfour Declaration, but that the matter was 'chose-jugee,' or very much current.
>
> A number of Palestinian officials sought desirable exchanges and Colonel Meinertzhagen; a pronounced Zionist was dispatched to Palestine. There had been no protests, no stirring of troubled political waters. The Brandeis direct action diplomacy had achieved results. (Dr. Jacob de Haas, biographer of Justice Brandeis)

How in the world could a person with no official government standing, no official position, go to Palestine and Britain and start making demands that the Zionist be obeyed? Perhaps I should retrace my steps and connect some of the threads.

It is a fact that when Brandeis went to see Balfour, the latter immediately contacted Lord Nathan Rothschild, whom it would appear, gave the green light for what steps Balfour told him he wanted to take. Thus, in my opinion, there was a definite connection between the progress of Zionist plans for Palestine and Lord Rothschild, leading back directly to Balfour and then to Brandeis.

* The resentment of the Arabs flared into violence in 1929;

* Jewish-Arab controversy over rights to the Wailing Wall of the Herodian Temple developed into open conflict;

* The Christian Arabs joining with the Mohammedans against the Jews.

> A British Commission reported that the disturbances were caused by rising Arab fears of a rising Jewish majority and the systematic acquisition of land by the invaders. The Commission recommended that restriction be placed on immigration and the purchase of land. In spite of the cries of the Zionists, the recommendations were accepted. The British Government published the findings in what is known as the White Book, October 20, 1930. . . In November 1938, the British Government announced that it would drop the partition proposal and attempt to promote an understanding between the Arabs and the Zionists. The Arabs took the understandable position that their country was being stolen from them, and that the negotiations were in a category of bargaining with a thief for the return of some portion of your property.
>
> When the Arabs and the Jews were unable to reach an agreement the British announced that it would have to find a solution of its own. In its White Paper of May 17, 1939, it rejected its former interpretations of the Balfour Declaration as contrary to British obligations to the Arabs. The statesmen of Britain undoubtedly realized the unfairness of the Balfour Declaration to the Arabs after it was too late to do much about it. The so-called MacDonald White Paper of 1939 was an apparently sincere desire to correct the wrong of 1917. The White Paper in attempting to rationalize Balfour's policy, insisted that the Jewish Homeland in Palestine had already existed. So that there would be no doubt as to Britain's future stand, the White Paper declared:

'His Majesty's Government therefore now declares unequivocally that it is not part of their policy that Palestine should become a Jewish State. They would indeed regard it as contrary to their obligations to the Arab people under the Mandate as well as to the assurances which have been given to the Arab people in the past that the Arab population of Palestine should be made the subjects of a Jewish State against their will. The wrath of the Jews knew no bounds. The new British policy on the subject meant the defeat of their carefully laid plans and they had no intentions of permitting the controversy to end with the White Paper. They unleashed a world-wide campaign of abuse against the British Government supplemented by propaganda material thoroughly distorting the facts.' Concluding at last that Great Britain as the Mandatory would never permit them to set up a Jewish States in Palestine, the Jews embarked on a campaign of violence to drive the British to either repudiate its White Paper or surrender the Mandate to the United Nations.

Hagana organized by the Zionists on the pattern of a regular army was mobilized and held ready to strike. Two terrorist groups, the Irgun Zvei Leumi and the Stern Gang were unleashed against the British Mandate authorities and the people of Palestine. The terrorists, following the traditions of their Khazar brethren of Poland and Russia, assassinated bombed and plundered. (Olivia Maria O'Grady)

CHAPTER 18

ZIONISTS SEIZE PALESTINE

Without going any further we now have the history of the incursion of the Zionists into Palestine, which was the basis of three wars, countless acts of terrorism and unrest, a total absence of peace which has plagued Palestine and the Middle East and will continue to do so until the rights of all parties are recognized with justice for all. Unfortunately, the fallacy of The League of Nations was perpetuated by an equally bastard creation, the United Nations.

On July 8, 1919, President Wilson having acted out his orders from Colonel House who had received them from the Rothschilds returned home.

If Wilson expected to be received like a conquering hero, he was sadly mistaken. An indication of the fact that Wilson was under the control of foreign personalities may be deduced from the fact that he had not taken one single member of the legislature with him to Paris or even a member of his own Democrat Party.

His advisors consisted in the main of Wall Street bankers and International Socialists. One of the strangest aspects of his trip to Paris was that he and his entourage accepted gifts of jewelry worth more than one million dollars from a number of non-government well-wishers.

The political storm that broke over the president when he introduced his One World Government blueprint to the United States Senate was unlike anything ever experienced before. Most probably influenced by the domineering "attitude" toward Germany that governed the proceedings in Paris, Wilson demanded that the Senate ratify the treaty exactly as it was presented, with no material changes and no debate being permitted.

This was an astonishing development in American politics, which had never been attempted before. It was all or nothing based solely on the secret closed sessions held in Paris. (The German delegation was kept in their hotel for a week while this was going on and took no part in it). Wilson was not without support for his dictatorial attitude which came from an American member of the Fabian Society, Professor Shotwell, who more or less told the Senate to hurry up and ratify the Treaty.

Shotwell was a prominent member of the upper-level parallel secret government of the United States, the Council on Foreign Relations (CFR). Senator Robert Owen, who had been appointed Chairman of the especially created Federal Reserve Act in 1919, now chaired the commission on The League of Nations Treaty Report to the Senate.

Others who backed Wilson's treaty were Eugene Delano, Thomas J. Lamont and Jacob Schiff. Lamont had been a long-time Fabian Socialist-Communist sympathizer, and Schiff later helped to bankroll the 1904-1905 Russo-Japan War, and the Bolshevik Revolution in Russia. All were related to or affiliated with the Rothschilds.

Most notably, Schiff was a Wall Street banker, who began his career in banking with the financial backing of the Rothschilds, whose creation he was.

On March 19, 1920, the Treaty of Versailles came before the Senate for ratification, but strong objections developed at the very outset. Wilson's demands that the treaty be passed "as is" angered many Senators who offered a number of amendments and reservations, which Wilson refused to accept on the advice of Colonel House acting for the Rothschilds. On November 19, the Senate defeated the Treaty of Versailles with and without reservations, seeing in it great dangers to the sovereignty of the U.S. Constitution and as attempt at usurping of its powers. The vote was 49-35.

For once, Colonel House and the Rothschilds were on the losing side. Wilson then did an extraordinary thing; he vetoed the joint resolution of Congress declaring the war with Germany at an end! At this point, it is necessary to retrace our footsteps: In the run-up to World War I and Wilson's attempt to embroil America in it, angry voices were raised against Wilson and his administration.

In fact, 87 percent of the American people were opposed to war, but could not prevail over the International Socialists and their international bankers. The Chicago Tribune was adamant and scathingly opposed to America's entry and declared that "Brandeis ruled the White House by secret telephone." Cyrus D. Eaton stated:

> America dishonored itself by entering the World War, while in later years (1925) Captain H. Spencer, in his book, "Democracy or Shylockcracy," quoted a telegram in which Sir William Wisemen, President Wilson's British MI6 controller said: "Brandeis called Rothschild." Justice Dembitz Brandeis was undoubtedly under the control of the Rothschilds. Long after the U.S. Senate refused to ratify the Treaty of Versailles, loud voices of anti-Americanism were still being heard.
>
> For instance Paul Hymens an ex Minister of Belgian Foreign Affairs said: "America refused to ratify the treaty and considered void the man who went to Europe to act in her name." (The New York Evening Post, July 16, 1925)

This was nothing new in so far as the character of President Wilson was concerned. While he was moving every political force he knew to get the United States into WWI under intense pressure from the Rothschilds via Colonel House, Wilson had grossly and violently assaulted the United States Constitution by ramming a law through the U.S. Congress, drafting the Militia of the States to be sent to fight in France.

This remains, in my opinion, one of the worst violations of the U.S. Constitution in American history; because Wilson did it against the Constitution, knowing precisely what a gross wrong he was doing in disregard of his oath of office.

But, before providing details of Wilson's horrendous crime against the American people, leaving aside the crimes against the Arabs and Palestinians, I would like to give some hitherto unknown facts about the man who was Wilson's controller and alter ego Colonel Mandel House, simply because this mysterious and sinister man played such a huge background shadowy role in the history of he United States, plus the fact that he was an intimate friend of the Rothschilds.

Edward Mandel House was the son of Thomas William and Elizabeth (nee Shearn). House had immigrated to the United States in 1837 and gone to live in Texas where he became involved in the cotton industry and entered into banking for and on behalf of the Rothschilds.

House, the elder, always acted as the trusted agent for the Rothschilds. Edward was educated at Cornell and became an adviser to the Governor of Texas although holding no official position, a career that was duplicated in the Wilson administration.

The State of Texas made the younger House an honorary Colonel, a title to which he clung all through his extraordinary career. There is no indication why the State of Texas bestowed favors on Edward House.

In the first part of 1900, the Rothschilds sent House to Europe to learn the business of how bankers control politics and politicians. When he returned to America, House became the guiding light in Democrat politics and it was he who selected Woodrow Wilson as the Democrat Party nominee for the Presidency.

House was largely responsible for Wilson's success in winning the election, and then developed his policies, especially foreign policy. It is believed by some real authorities on the subject that House was the conduit for the Rothschilds orders for the establishment of the Federal Reserve Banks, although the United States Constitution prohibited a Central Bank.

Thus it may be safely stated that House presided over twenty-five fateful years that changed the face of the United States forever, and led to a lawless Federal Government that destroyed in a few years what the Founding Fathers and the generation that followed had taken almost two hundred years to build.

Wilson was the first President of the United States to assume the de facto status of an Emperor of what was to become the Empire of the United States of America, the driving force and leader of a New World Order inside an International Socialist One World Government.

CHAPTER 19

THE ROTHSCHILDS ESTABLISH A CENTRAL BANK IN AMERICA

There had been profound changes in Europe under the tutelage of the Rothschild Dynasty, perhaps some of the more important being:

* The rise of Napoleon I as the chosen Rothschild agent for toppling of the Monarchs of Europe;

* The fall of the Romanov Dynasty and the destruction of Christian Russia at the hands of the Bolshevik Communists;

* The Anglo-Boer War of genocide, a most important war at the turn of the 19th century that was swept under the carpet.

I believe that these most profound changes could not and would not have occurred save and except for the guiding hand of the Rothschild Dynasty and the commitment of its vast financial resources to this end.

Before dealing with events in pre-Bolshevik Russia, I will cover the history of what gave rise to Rothschild intervention in South Africa to secure the largest gold and diamond fields in the world that resulted in the Anglo Boer War 1899-1903.

In the 1830s the farmers at the Cape (known as Boers) moved into the vast, uninhabited hinterland in what became known as The Great Trek. They were angered by British interference in their lives, particularly the freeing of slaves. They overcame great hardships traveling a thousand miles in ox wagons often over rugged mountains, and settled on the barren land of what was to become the Orange Free State and Transvaal Republics.

When huge finds of diamond and gold occurred, the barren lands were immediately coveted by the Rothschilds who sent an agent in the person of Cecil John Rhodes to tie up possession and control in their name. In 1898, Rhodes, the agent for the Rothschilds in South Africa, requested Lord Rothschild to buy out French interests in the diamond mines, setting the stage for complete control by the Rothschilds.

The British Government "annexed" an area of the Orange Free State known as Griqualand West (the location of the diamond finds) and three years later annexed the Transvaal, although in both cases they had no lawful or legitimate claim to the land whatsoever, a tactic they were to use again in Palestine in 1917. (The Balfour Declaration)

Cecil Rhodes was the chief instigator of the Boer War. The fabulous gold fields of rich veins, which extended for 200 miles from East to West, was a glittering prize the Rothschilds were determined to acquire. Friction with Britain became endemic as the Boers refused to recognize Queen Victoria's bogus claims to the Orange Free State and the Transvaal Republics.

A clear provocation was the raid by 600 armed men under Starr Jameson in an attempt to overthrow the Boer Government of President Paul Kruger.

It was a prelude to the Anglo-Boer War, which broke out in 1899, after the machinations of Rhodes to achieve the desired goals of the British Government to seize the gold and diamond fields, failed.

The Boers were descended from Dutch, Irish, Scots, English and German stock. They had emigrated to the southernmost tip of Africa known as "the Cape," where first the Dutch and then the British established a refueling, food and fresh water station for their ships plying trade between the Far East and Europe. At what became known in later years as Cape Town, a thriving independent community was established under Dutch rule.

At that time there were no black (Bantu) people in Africa south of the Zambezi River, in the vast, empty hinterland between the Cape and the Zambezi River to the North. Only a few nomadic "Hottentots" - a non-Bantu Mongolian type of people lived along the sea shore of the Cape eking out a precarious living through beachcombing and scavenging. They soon became workers in the vegetable gardens of the Dutch East India Company. But the British invaded the Cape settlement and set up their own administration under the British East India Corporation (BEIC) opium trading company in London.

From this inauspicious beginning grew a thriving, bustling community in which the Dutch were integrated. After the British invasion, the BEIC in London began to seriously interfere in the internal affairs of the Dutch community.

The Dutch, who were referred to as "Boers" (farmers) then began to organize a plan to leave the Cape and "trekked" (traveled) into the vast uninhabited plains of the north. After the long journey the Boer arrived and settled in the uninhabited land they named the Orange Free State Republic and the Transvaal Republic. I want to emphasize that the thousands of square miles of land the Boers traveled through was devoid of the Bantu races who lived north of the Zambezi. Contrary to popular history, the Boers did not take the Transvaal and Orange Free State away from the Bantu.

The discovery of the richest gold strike ever known brought Rhodes to the scene and from then onwards, Queen Victoria began to assert her unfounded claim to the new republics. War was inevitable after Victoria rejected the peace proposals of the God-fearing Paul Kruger.

Queen Victoria was determined to have war, and in 1899 the British Government sent the first contingents of troops, which by 1901 would reach the amazing strength of 400,000 men, this, to overcome a guerilla force that never numbered more than 80,000 men in the field at any time, many of them as young as fourteen years and as old as seventy five years.

The epic struggle of the Boers ought to be a model for all countries threatened by big, bullying governments. For almost three years the farmer-soldiers fought and defeated the pride of the British Army.

The Boers only agreed to end the fighting after 27,000 of their women and children died in inhuman concentration camps set up by Lord Kitchener and Alfred Milner, a servant of the Rothschilds. With their cattle slaughtered, their farms burned to the ground and their women and children dying in the thousands as a result of the vindictive Lord Milner's genocidal policies, the Boer warriors were compelled to come in from the field and lay down their arms.

Throughout the struggle, Rhodes kept his masters, the Rothschilds, fully briefed and carried out their instructions to the letter. Today, N.M. Rothschild still controls the gold trade from London. Rhodes operated in a period when the British Empire was the most powerful political, economic and military force in the world, yet the Boers were not afraid to take on the Empire in a war they knew they could not win, but which they fought with astonishing courage, determination and bravery.

The British Empire was like the Persian, Assyrian, Babylonian and Roman Empires, built upon twin pillars of stripping the assets of their "Dominions" and using virtual slave labor of the inhabitants to accomplish the task.

The "noble" families of England could be traced back to the Venetian and Genoese Black Nobility and the great banking families of those city-states. They were the masters of propaganda and have not lost their touch, which was their most successful weapon in the Boer War and the First and Second World Wars. Behind the government stood the banking families, of which the Rothschild banks were the most powerful and influential. Some historians have held to the belief that the fortune they received from South Africa "made the Rothschilds rich."

It is a belief with which I do not agree. The Rothschilds were wealthy beyond belief well before their agent, Cecil John Rhodes, a master of deceit and cunning, a man who hated Christianity — secured the gold and diamond treasures of South Africa as the monopoly of the Rothschilds. From documents and papers I studied in the British Museum in London, it was clear that shortly before the death of Mayer Amschel, his fortune exceeded the combined fortunes of the world's richest men.

The full extent of the Rothschild fortune was never made known, but what is known is that it grew at an astronomical rate. Amschel knew the power of money and like old John D. Rockefeller who aped his philosophy of secrecy Mayer knew that secrecy is paramount to success. His religious belief that the Jews were God's chosen people never wavered, and he flaunted his belief on every occasion, public and private. To give some idea of the Rothschild wealth I provide the following:

> His son Lionel was the friend and counselor of the Prince Consort and of Disraeli whose Sidonia in Coningsby is a (thinly disguised) ideal portrait of him. . .
>
> He brought about the enactment of the disabilities bill which permitted Jews to hold office in England. He > advanced the British government the money for the Irish famine loan (about $40,000,000) and also for the Crimean War (about $80,000,000) and for twenty-four years he acted as the agent for the Russian government.

>
> He had a large share in the successful funding of the United States national debt, provided the funds for the immediate purchase of the Suez Canal shares; he was also active in facilitating the payment of the French indemnity to Germany; in directing the finances of the Austrian Empire and the Egyptian loan of 8,500,000 pounds (about $40,000,000). (The Jewish Encyclopedia, Vol. 10, pages 501-502)

Jacob (James) Rothschild's fortune, which was independent of Lionel's or any of the other family members, was estimated by historians to be $200 billion at the time of his death according to author Armstrong who wrote. . . "But this was only an estimate, since no inventory of his estate was filed." It was of course in keeping with one of the principles laid down by Amschel that secrecy was to be maintained. Above all else, the Rothschilds were always involved in financing wars.

Hymym Solomon (also known as Haim) was involved in financing the American Revolution. Seligman Brothers and Speyer and Company financed the North and Messrs Erlanger the South in the Civil War. More recently, in the great development of railway finance the firm of Kuhn, Loeb and Company has taken a prominent role.

Although it does not say so in so many words, it is clear to anyone who knows anything about banking of the period, that the Rothschilds' financed the North and South through front men and front banks. There have been various estimates of the wealth of the Rothschilds, and one who knew perhaps better than others, Count Cherep-Spiridovich estimated that they made $100 billion out of WWI alone. Historian John Reeves in The Rothschilds: Financial Controllers of Nations gives a good accounting of the Rothschilds achievements:

> Little could Mayer have anticipated that his sons would in after years come to exercise such an unbounded sway that the peace of nations would depend on their nod; that the powerful control they exercised on the European money markets would enable them to pose as the arbiters of peace and war, since they could at their pleasure, furnish or withhold the pecuniary means required to carry on a campaign.
>
> But this, incredible as it may seem, was what their vast influence, combined with their enormous wealth and unlimited credit, enabled them to do, for no firms existed strong enough to oppose them for any length of time, or rash enough to take up a business which the Rothschilds had refused.

A short note of explanation: It happened that the Rothschilds would refuse an offering although sound, simply to punish, that particular nation, or company, for some wrong doing, imagined or real. Had any other bankers have taken up what the Rothschilds rejected, their punishment would be swift.

CHAPTER 20

THE U.S. CONSTITUTION TRAMPLED BY CORRUPT LEGISLATORS IN THE PA Y OF THE ROTHSCHILDS

The question has often been posed and encountered by me: "How did the United States with its Constitution, the highest law of the land, which forbad a central bank, come in the end to have just such a central bank, totally in violation of the Constitution." To answer the question would require many thousands of pages of explanations, but in the following brief accounting, I shall try to provide a clue as to how the Federal Reserve Banks were forced down the throats of the American people.

In the first instance, the Federal Reserve Bank is not "Federal" being owned by anonymous stockholders, and not by the United States Government. In plain language it is a private bank masquerading as a federal government institution.

As such it is not accountable to the American people, in witness whereof, it has never been audited by government auditors as is required by law if it were a government bank. The great Louis T. McFadden, Chairman of the House Banking Committee, once declared from the floor of the House: . . . the Federal Reserve banking system is the greatest swindle in history, a fraud on the American people.

On Friday June 10, 1932, in a debate in the House of Representatives on the Federal Reserve Bank, the courageous McFadden said:

Mr. Chairman, we have in this country one of the most corrupt institutions the world has ever known. I refer to the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve banks. The Federal Reserve Board, a Government board, has cheated the Government of the United States and the people of the United States out of enough money to pay the national debt. The depredations and the iniquities of the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal reserve banks acting together have cost this country enough money to pay the national debt several times over.

This evil institution has impoverished and ruined the people of the United States; has bankrupted itself, and has practically bankrupted our Government. It has done this through defects of the law under which it operates, through misadministration of that law by the Federal Reserve Board, and through the corrupt practices of the moneyed vultures who control it. Some people think the Federal Reserve Banks are United States Government institutions. They are not Government institutions. They are private credit monopolies, which prey upon the people of the United States for the benefit of themselves and their foreign customers; foreign and domestic speculators and swindlers; and rich and predatory moneylenders. In that dark crew of financial pirates there are those who would cut a man's throat to get a dollar out of his pocket. . .

The 12 private credit monopolies were deceitfully and disloyally foisted upon this country by bankers who came here from Europe and who repaid our hospitality by undermining our American institutions. These bankers took money out of this country to finance a war against Russia. They created a reign of terror in Russia with our money. . . They financed Trotsky's mass meetings of discontent and rebellion in New York. They paid Trotsky's passage from New York to Russia so that he might assist in the destruction of the Russian Empire. They fomented and instigated the Russian revolution and placed a large fund of American dollars at Trotsky's disposal in one of their banks in Sweden. It has been said that President Wilson was deceived by the attentions of these bankers and by the philanthropic poses they assumed. It has been said that when he discovered the manner in which he had been misled by Colonel House, he turned against that busybody, that 'holy monk' of the financial empire, and showed him the door. He had the grace to do that, and in my opinion, he deserves great credit for it.

In 1912 the National Monetary Association, under the chairmanship of the late Senator Nelson Aldrich, made a report and presented a vicious bill called the National Reserve Association bill. This bill is usually spoken of as the Aldrich bill. He was the tool, but not the accomplice, of the European-born bankers who for nearly 20 years had been scheming to set up a central bank in this country and who in 1912 had spent and were continuing to spend vast sums of money to accomplish their purpose.

. . . Under the tutelage of those sinister Wall Street figures who stood behind Colonel House, established here in our free country the worm-eaten monarchical institution of the 'king's bank' to control us from the top downward, and to shackle us from the cradle to the grave. The Federal Reserve act destroyed our old and characteristic way of doing business...

> It fastened down upon this country the very tyranny from which the framers of the Constitution sought to save us. The danger that the country was warned against came upon us and is shown in the long train of horrors attendant upon the affairs of the traitorous and dishonest Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Reserve Banks. . . The Aldrich bill was created by bankers of European origin in New York City. It was a copy and in general a translation of the Reichsbank and other European central banks." (Notably the Bank of England)
>
> (From the Congressional Records of the House of Representatives, the Collected Speeches of Congressman Louis T. McFadden)

On Thursday June 15, 1933, McFadden went to do battle once more against the imposition of a central bank on America, in gross violation of the United States Constitution. Speaking in the House of Representatives, McFadden complained about foreign bankers taking over the money and credit of the American people, and he concentrated on Jacob Schiff, whom he said, was an agent of the Rothschilds:

> He also hit out at a Mr. Mayer who is a brother-in-law of Mr. George Blumenthal a member of the firm of J.P. Morgan and Co., who, I understand, represents the Rothschild interest... I want to make it perfectly plain, that in placing Mr. Mayer at the head of the Federal Reserve system you are turning it over completely to this international finance group.

How was the U.S. forced into the slavery of the Federal Reserve Bank system? The answer is really quite simple:

It was done through the money power of the Rothschilds and a group of traitors in the U.S. House and Senate willing to sell their souls in exchange for a life of opulence and ease. Such men are found in all countries, and there is no way to foreclose against their treachery. Their infamous deeds continue to reap a bitter harvest. For daring to expose the truth about how August Belmont entered the United States for the sole purpose of gaining control of politicians who would make it possible to impose Rothschild control of the money and credit of the United States, McFadden was murdered.

There were three attempts on his life; one by a shooting that did not succeed, and two attempts to poison him, the last of which killed this great and courageous American. His murderers were never found and justice has still to be done.

Thus was a great American Christian patriot silenced, an unspeakable foul deed was done and financial slavery imposed on the American people. For as long as the elected representatives of the people in the U.S. House and Senate abide by their oath of office, to preserve and protect America from the ravages of the international bankers who lead International Socialism's onslaught against the Constitution, the blessings of liberty shall be those of the American people.

But when our representatives bow to the money power of the international bankers and prostitute themselves on the alter of Rothschild money power then has the hour arrived that We, the People have lost our freedom and the rights guaranteed by the Constitution.

The Federal Reserve Act was a smashing blow against the Constitution, another nail in the coffin of a once-free American people. The Federal Reserve Act was a progression along a road that will end with the total destruction of the Constitution. One of the Rothschild servants, Lord Bryce, said that it would take fifty years to destroy the Republican form of government guaranteed to the American people by their Constitution. Lord Bryce predicted that: Security provided by for the protection of the Constitution will be gone like the morning mists.

This is the same Lord Bryce, who through false testimony published shameless lies about German atrocities in Belgium that brought the United States into the First World War.

Having acquired control of the leading banks of Europe and having become the lenders of first resort to every government on the Continent and England, the Rothschilds then acquired control of the Bank of England. In order to hide this fact it was decreed that the names of the bank's stockholders were never to be made public:

> This power brought about the establishment of the gold standard, first in the British Empire, and then in other countries as stated. They acquired the controlling interest in the Bank of England for which the late Lord Rothschild was the gold agent and governor.
>
> The Bank of England is one of their many fronts. They no doubt have the controlling interest in most of the other central banks of issue. In strict keeping with the secrecy which has been one of the cardinal principles of the Rothschild rulers from the very beginning, the Bank of England refuses to reveal its stockholders. . .
>
> They [the Rothschilds] sent one of their agents, Paul Warburg, as their representative to America, just prior to World War I, to change our banking systems.
>
> Through their ownership and control of J. P. Morgan and Co. and Kuhn, Loeb and Co., private banks, they owned and controlled the principal New York national banks and trust companies, and through them controlled the New York Federal System. . . It is essential in order to control at will the expansion and contraction of credit that there be some supreme authority with the power to increase or decrease at will the volume of money in circulation.

Prior to the regime of the Rothschilds this power resided in the kings and emperors of the world, for they were then the supreme authority. In our country (the United States) our National Constitution vested this power (solely) in the Congress of the United States. . . Under the Rothschild influence the banking systems of the world were all radically changed. The supreme authority for the issue of money, as well as to extend credit, was transferred by the various governments to the bankers of their respective countries. The Bank of England became the model for other central banks of the world. At the time of the establishment of the Federal Reserve System, our government was the only one of any consequence that even pretended to exercise its sovereign right to issue and control the volume of money in circulation. The establishment of the Federal Reserve System brought about a complete surrender to the banking fraternity of the sovereign power of the American people to regulate values through their congressional representatives, as guaranteed to them by their national Constitution.

The panic of 1907 was, like all our other panics, a manipulated one. It was brought about by the refusal of the reserve bank of New York to pay currency to their country bank depositors, which in turn made it necessary for these banks to refuse to pay their depositors in currency. It was therefore due primarily to an insufficient quantity of currency in circulation and an inadequate method of increasing the supply.

In the midst of the campaign for the reform of our banking and currency system (to prevent further manipulations that could result in panic) Paul Warburg, a German Jew, migrated from Frankfurt am Main, the original home of the Rothschilds, to America. He was at that time a member of Kuhn, Loeb and Company in New York, the American branch of the Rothschilds, upon his arrival here. The following is a Naval Secret Service report on him in December 1918:

'Warburg, Paul, New York City, German; was naturalized as an American citizen 1911, was decorated by the Kaiser; was vice-chairman of the United States Federal Reserve Board, is a wealthy and influential banker; handled large sums of money furnished by Germany for Lenin and Trotsky; subject has a brother who is leader of the espionage system of Germany.'

The Federal Reserve System is the product of the Rothschilds and its adoption was secured by the same underground, deceptive manner that they always employ to obtain their objectives. Paul Warburg evidently came to America to reform our banking and currency system and evidently he and the Rothschild interest then anticipated the world war [the First World War 1914-1918] although it did not come about until some three years later.

This is the sordid story of the greatest disaster that ever befell the American people. We then surrendered to Jeroboam Rothschild and his successors, complete domination over our welfare and happiness. Prior thereto, great influence was through his Morgan and Co., and Kuhn, Loeb and Co., banks and their subsidiary affiliates, but now his authority is made supreme and unlimited. This surrender perfected his control over the economy of all of the people of the world.

(Emmanuel Josephson, Rothschild Money Trust, pages 36,40, 41, 132 134 and 1600)

CHAPTER 21

THE ROTHSCHILDS THWART THE U.S. CONSTITUTION

What is so astonishing about the audacious hijack of the United States credit and money supply by the Rothschilds is that it was accomplished in the face of stringent provisions in the United States Constitution that forbad establishing a central bank.

We are reminded by the words of Jesus Christ at his crucifixion when He said: "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." This prayer of forgiveness was for and behalf of the Roman soldiers, and not for the Sanhedrin, who had demanded his execution.

Thus we say of those members of the U.S. Congress who were ignorant of what was being done, and ignorant of the gigantic swindle being perpetrated upon them, and worse still, ignorant of the Constitution they had sworn an oath to uphold: "Father, forgive them for they knew not what they did."

But for the traitors, the deceivers, the liars and the betrayers who did know what they were doing, I say that death by hanging for treason, as suggested by the framers of the Constitution, would have been far too lenient a fate for them. Some scholars of the period wondered why the Federal Reserve Act was presented when it was.

Two reasons come to mind. A pliant Socialist president in the White House, the architects of the Federal Reserve knew that war was coming. Thus it was essential to have the Central Bank up and running before hostilities commenced. Subsequent history has shown that the Federal Reserve Act was passed in time to make the coming war happen. Without the massive financing provided by the U.S. there is every reason to believe, that WWI would not have broken out.

The second reason is, of course, the more obvious one: Complete control of banking and finance of the United States. Passage of the illegal, unconstitutional, Federal Reserve Act made it possible for the Rothschilds through the treason of Wilson, to drag the United States into WWI that resulted in the death of millions of young Christian men, the flower of the European and American nations, and cost the United States billions of dollars.

The treason-mongers were never punished and America is still suffering today from the effects of that terrible war and the one that followed, and from the stranglehold which the Rothschilds have over an allegedly "free America" from which they continue to reap obscene profits.

Any real freedom for the American people ended the day that the Rothschild gained control of America's currency, credit and economy through establishment of the Federal Reserve Banks. When one considers the power of the Rothschild to have been able to establish their banking system in the heart of the American republic, we are reminded of the following verse: Upon what meat doth this our Caesar feed that he has grown so great?

The story of that "meat" is what I have tried to recount in this work and perhaps it will shed some light on the mystery of how both Wilson and Roosevelt were able to impose their wills upon the American people, even though they had the shocking example of the treason committed by President Woodrow Wilson still fresh before their eyes.

There can be but one answer as to the source of that power; the Rothschild agents in America who desired and actively sought American entry into WWII. The book, Propaganda in the Next War, authored by Captain Liddell Hart, throws a good deal of light on how, for the second time, the American people were dragged into a war in Europe although the vast majority of them totally opposed, but unfortunately, the book appears to rendered unavailable. Author Armstrong said:

> Apparently it is a semi-official book of the British government. The destruction of these copies of the book was probably by the order of Secretary of War, Hoar-Belisha...
>
> The establishment of a Jewish homeland was not an issue in the world war or in the peace treaty with Germany. The Arabs were our allies and they fought side by side with the soldiers of the allies. It was coldblooded indefensible robbery perpetrated at the instance of 'Elders,' Lloyd George and Woodrow Wilson and Georges Clemenceau. (Rothschild Money Trust, pages 65, 79)
>
> The worst of it is that the establishment of this 'Jewish homeland' was cold-blooded treachery to the Arab Government and the people. The Arabs claim that they were induced to enter the war on the side of the Allies by the promise that what is known as the Balfour Declaration would be rescinded and the Arabians would not be molested in the peaceful ownership and possession of their country.
>
> This contention is not denied by the British Government, but the excuse is made that Woodrow Wilson insisted that the Jews be given this home and > that Lloyd George consented as a matter of policy and in order to get some other things in the peace treaty that he desired. Palestine is now properly called the 'twice promised land.' It is likely that Germany also promised it in consideration of the Russian deal. (Rothschild Money Trust, page 70)

One of the least noticed after effects of WWI and the subsequent peace treaty was the demonetizing of silver, which has always figured prominently in the monetary systems of the world since ancient times. Silver is a noble metal, but it is not regarded as being anywhere near as valuable as gold by the Rothschilds although it has always been a good defense against inflation.

Neither silver, gold coins nor scripts/certificates can be inflated. It was most probably with this in mind that the Rothschilds made strenuous efforts to demonetize silver and get rid of coinage in the money systems of the world. I do not propose to give a history of the Bank of England in this book other than to refer to it from time to time.

The Bank of England was and still is the model for all "fractional reserve banks," including the illicit Federal Reserve Bank of the United States. Its original charter was amended eight times up to 1844, and undoubtedly, the Rothschilds had a great deal to do with the latter amendments, especially the Peel Amendment, which made drastic changes that greatly favored the Rothschilds' banks.

The Peel Amendment was adopted in 1844 and its immediate effect was to demonetize silver, which had hitherto circulated as coinage in every country, even nation, since time immemorial as real money.

This was done because the Rothschilds wanted their war debts to be repaid in gold, a fact that became apparent when they refused to accept payment of Civil War debts in silver and demanded of the United States Government that the debts be paid in gold. No doubt the Peel Amendment foresaw such matters and was adopted specifically to lay the foundation for what was to follow. The amendment also gave the British a monopoly over gold, because they held the gold stolen from the Boers of South Africa in 1899-1902.

Incidentally, it was Peel who had steered the Jewish Disabilities Bill through the House that made it possible for a Jew to run for public office for the first time in the long history of England. But in the middle of the struggle against strong opposition, Peel fell of his horse while out riding and died from his injuries. He was an accomplished horseman, which makes the accident all the more strange. That left Disraeli the chief protagonist for the bill. Disraeli's maiden speech to the House of Commons on December 7, 1847 as party leader, had been drowned out by his opponents led by the feared Irishman, Daniel O'Connell.

Those for the Jewish Disabilities Act were Sir Moses Montefiore, related through marriage to the Rothschilds, and one of two Sheriffs of the City of London. Although a Jew, Montefiore could hold the high office, because the House of Lords had no jurisdiction or control over the City of London. Montefiore had come to the House to receive permission to listen to the debate.

The bill was presented not directly, but what it became known as, a bill to remove restrictions from all faiths, what the Rothschilds always did, calling such an approach as a "side wind."

The measure was to end the longstanding practice, which held, that Jews could not become magistrates, schoolteachers or enter Parliament; could not vote if they refused to take the Christian oath and could not practice law.

Lionel de Rothschild had refused to take the Christian oath, and although elected to the House of Lords could not take his seat because of his obdurate opposition to the Christian oath being administered.

The 'Jew bill' as it was referred to by the Tories would not go away, even after eleven years of opposition by members like Lord Derby, Lord Bentinck and Sir Robert Inglis, who when asked why Jews should be excluded from Parliament stated: "The Jews are voluntary strangers here, and have no claim to become citizens but by conforming to our moral law, which is the Gospel."

The Tories in the House of Lords were solidly against the "Jew bill" as Lord George Bentinck called it as he explained it each time the bill came up again for eleven years. One must give credit to the tenacity of the Rothschilds, when they wanted something they clung on tenaciously until they got it. As Lord Bentinck explained:

> The Jew Question I look upon as a personal matter as I would a great private estate or Divorce Bill. Disraeli will of course warmly support the Jews, first from hereditary prepossession in their favor and next because he and the Rothschilds are great allies. (From Hansard Report)

Bentinck was later found dead, apparently from a heart attack at the age of forty-six. Like the death of Peel before him, Bentinck's passing left many unanswered questions, the most pertinent of which have never been addressed.

On February 20, 1849 the Jewish Disabilities Removal Act came up again for consideration in its third reading in the House with Disraeli in charge. In the gallery sat Louise de Rothschild, observing the proceedings on behalf of Lionel Rothschild. The measure passed by a vote of 272 to 206, but died in the Lords.

In the following year, July 29, 1850, Lionel de Rothschild again tried to take his seat, but the Clerk refused to allow it and thus was generated a new round of frenzied activity characterized by scathing debate.

The measure was now being referred to in the Times as the "annual pastime" of Parliament. Having been struck down in 1849, 1851, 1853, 1856 and 1857, Disraeli in 1858 tried a new tack by changing the wording of the Oath, but the Lords again rejected it.

Disraeli hit back by appointing a committee to look into a basis of the restoration of the new Oath and appointed Lionel de Rothschild on the committee. Finally, amid ugly scenes and rearguard opposition from Lord Derby, much grumbling with a razor-thin majority voting for it, a compromise was reached: Each House would formulate its own Oath. At the sumptuous home of Lionel de Rothschild there was great rejoicing that the "eleven years of shouting and screaming in every corner of the House" was over.

On July 26, 1858, Lionel de Rothschild was sworn in on the new, non-Christian Oath, shaking hands with Disraeli as he went up to do so in a public display of the gratitude he owed his protege whom he had wisely and with great foresight, converted to Christianity at a tender age possibly in anticipation of his need for the very service he had now delivered.

CHAPTER 22

THE ROTHSCHILDS BREAK OPEN THE HOUSE OF LORDS

The floodgates had been opened. Lord Rothschild took his seat, followed in quick succession by David Salomons, Sir Francis Goldsmith, Nathaniel de Rothschild, Frederick Goldsmid and Julian Goldsmid.

It is interesting that none of these men represented Disraeli's own party, the Conservative Unionist Party "Tory Party." But the chief opponent, Earl Derby, now losing support from his own party, put his objections in writing:

> Without imparting any disloyalty or disaffection to Her Majesty's Subjects of the Jewish Persuasion, the Lords consider that Denial and Rejection of that Savior, in whose Name each House of Parliament daily offers up its collective prayers for the Divine Blessing on its Councils, constitutes a moral unfitness to take part in Legislation of a professedly Christian Community. (Hansard Report)

The most visible results of The Jewish Disabilities Removal Act was that it provided the Rothschilds and other leading Jews access to the House of Lords and removal of the hated Christian Oath. With the other change, the Peel Amendment to the Bank of England, the ordinary people, as usual, had no inkling of how they were being bamboozled and how much they would lose. The miscreants worked so skillfully that while the victims were walking around with their eyes wide open, yet not comprehending what they saw, the Rothschild solidified their grip on world monetary systems.

Of course the deception is still practiced today where U.S. coinage is made to look like silver, but which coinage has no silver content whatsoever. U.S. coinage might as well be made of plastic, but that would not do, because then the multitudes might just wake up to the deception after all these years! Even the Encyclopedia Britannica sought to conceal the deception of the Peel Amendment:

> It was indispensable in attempting to obviate the defects inherent in our currency, to proceed cautiously, to respect, as far as possible, existing interests, and to avoid taking any steps that might excite the fears or suspicions of the public; but the measures . . . were so skillfully contrived as to provoke little opposition, at the same time that they effected most important and highly beneficial changes. (Encyclopedia Britannica Vol. III, page 323)

For instance: What were the "defects" it speaks about? The principle "defect" was that hitherto it had not been easy to wage war, as there was never enough money for such wars and additional money had to be raised by additional taxation. This meant that at some point, even the slumbering multitudes would become enraged and rise in rebellion against overburdening taxes.

The other "defect" was that paper money had to be backed by bullion and what was desirable was the full practice of the old Babylonian system of fraudulent fractional reserve banking meaning in plain language that banks could issue a certain amount of paper money not backed by real assets such as silver and gold. Without these changes and the flood of paper money that followed the Peel Amendment and the Federal Reserve Banks establishment in America, WWI and WWII would not have been possible to promote. There was simply no real money for such wasteful wars, nor would the people have stood for additional taxes to finance such misadventures.

In fact, there would have been no Gulf War, no invasion of Iraq in 2002, no bombing of Serbia and no war against Afghanistan, -- were it not for an abundant supply of worthless paper money, which are called U.S. dollars. Accepted as such all over the world — in reality they are pieces of paper issued by a private banking system, which cannot be exchanged for gold or silver.

Why, in the words of the Encyclopedia Britannica, was it necessary to "proceed cautiously?" If this was an honest need why should there have been caution about the move? But the encyclopedia gives the nasty game of deception away in the words, "that might excite the fears and suspicions of the public."

By its own admission we now learn that there was a need for caution because base deception of the public was being engaged in and that the deception had to be "skillfully contrived to provoke little opposition."

What an admission that wholesale deception and gross fraud were being perpetrated on the people. The perpetrators very well knew that the people would go into revolt if they found out, so the Peel Amendment had to be disguised as "highly beneficial changes."

Who were the recipients of the "highly beneficial changes?" There was only one party who benefited and that was the Rothschild Dynasty and their banks all over the world.

If this were not true, the "highly beneficial changes" would have been shouted from the rooftops of London and of every city in the world. But the "highly beneficial changes" were for the benefit of the Rothschild banking empire and not for the people of the many nations affected by it.

While Sir Robert Peel presented the amendment to the bank's charter, its author was indeed Lionel Rothschild through his "valet," Benjamin Disraeli, whom he had created and made famous as England's Prime Minister, in the manner in which the Rothschilds created and made famous Napoleon I. Lionel Rothschild's influence over the Bank of England had never waned since he frightened the bank into giving him de-facto control through this attack on its gold reserves, as explained earlier by demanding his paper be exchanged for his gold.

It should be recalled that on August 4, 1847, when Disraeli's eligibility to run for a seat in Parliament was paper-thin, because he could not claim property ownership in fear of his many creditors, and property ownership being a necessary qualification, it was Baron Mayer de Rothschild, the High Sheriff of the county in which the town of Aylesbury was situated, who certified Disraeli as a qualified candidate and then declared him duly elected, after another candidate, a John Gibbs, had been persuaded to withdraw from the election.

But the watching crowd did not take the result well. Perceiving Disraeli as an interloper, he was met with hisses and heckling. It is also worth mentioning, that while Disraeli was in such deep financial straits that could and would have badly affected his career in Parliament, it was Lionel de Rothschild who bought his debts and discharged them. The deal is mentioned in Disraeli by Weintraub, page 401:

> Through Philip Rose and Lionel de Rothschild, Montague discharged all debts. The Montague mentioned is said to have 'offered to buy up Disraeli's debts and charge a lower than usurious interest rate.' Critics suggested that the real

> 'purchaser' of Disraeli's debts was in fact, Lionel Rothschild.
>
> Another indisputable fact is, that in September 1848 the Rothschilds had a hand in buying Hughendon, Disraeli's country home for him through a front man, the Marquis of Titchfield. As Disraeli wrote to his wife Mary Anne, 'It is all done; you are the Lady of Hughendon'.

I mention these facts, as they seem to bear out the claim that Disraeli was "a mere valet of the Rothschilds."

A study of the methods used by the Rothschilds to put over the deception of the Peel Amendment shows that they used in precisely the same way to put over the Federal Reserve Banks swindle on the American people. In both instances, the author and finisher of the plot were one and the same -- the Rothschilds.

The catastrophe in 1840 was staged and managed by the Rothschilds to set the stage for the crucial amendment of 1844 that was to be so beneficial for the Rothschilds in that it ended the restraining influence of silver coinage and silver certificates.

The Rothschilds stage-managed the panic of 1907 which opened the way for the American version of the Peel Amendment, the deceitful and downright unconstitutional Federal Reserve Banks, which bill was steered through the Senate by their numerous agents in place, notably Senator William Aldrich. The Peel Amendment and the Federal Reserve Act are twins of the same parentage, the Rothschilds, who used their front men and servants to conceal the real authors of these infamous fiscal and monetary measures of deception.

How were the Rothschilds able to accomplish the double success that placed the yoke of slavery around the necks of the ordinary people? They did it by owning and controlling the leaders of both political parties in the British Parliament and the political leaders of both parties in the U.S. House of Representatives and the U.S. Senate. Since then, nothing has changed.

The status-quo remains entrenched. The two measures gave the Rothschilds complete control over the monetary and fiscal policies of the British Empire and the complete monetary and fiscal control over the United States, thereby multiplying not only Rothschild wealth, but Rothschild power to dictate policies to both the British and United States Governments, making them "lord and master over the money markets of the world.

Disraeli did not say that the Rothschilds achieved complete mastery of the foreign and domestic policies of the governments of the world, but this was hardly necessary to enunciate as it became self-evident at the Paris Peace Conference.

On the instructions of their Rothschild masters, President Wilson and Prime Minister George organized two committees that were called the "Financial Committee" and the "Economic Section." Rothschild agents Baruch and Thomas Lamont, a partner of J.P. Morgan and Co. were appointed to the Financial Committee.

The net end result of the deliberations and decisions of the two committees made it almost impossible for Britain and France to repay their war debts to the United States, more than likely with the intention that they should be "forgiven," which they were, in the most flagrant abuse of the U.S. Constitution. There were and are no provisions in the United States Constitution that would allow for loans and gifts to foreign powers, much less that debts should be written off. But to the Rothschilds it was just another hurdle to be overcome, and the U.S. did write off billions in debt owed by the Allies.

The intention was quite clearly that the debts owing to the Rothschilds would be repaid and that was the bottom line. Unfortunately, the Rothschild agents in the U.S. Government went along with the plan that robbed the American people of billions upon billions of dollars and enriched the Rothschilds with like amounts, this, in the most flagrant violation of the highest law of the United States, the Constitution.

In its wake, the blatant disregard of the Constitution resulted in strengthening International Socialism that caused poverty and suffering, with revolutions that led to the rise of Communism.

Who was this Disraeli, a man who had such a profound effect on the history of England? How did he aspire to his position of power?

Benjamin Disraeli (1804-1881) who was given the title of Lord Beaconsfield in his later years was the first person of Jewish descent to become a prime minister of England.

A study of documents in the British Museum, show that Disraeli owed his rise to fame and power solely to Lionel Rothschild. When he was discovered by Lionel, Disraeli was in a state of desperate poverty, but he still managed to rise to power and fame because Lionel Rothschild found him a useful servant. Bismarck, another of Rothschild's "creations" said that Disraeli was the originator of the plan to bring down the United States through civil war.

The American Civil War was the most senseless fratricide ever in the history of the world, and cost the lives of nearly 800,000 men. It was a war that should never have happened, and would not have happened had it not been for the "hidden hand" of the Rothschilds and their agent, Disraeli, upon whose soul the blood of the dead of the Civil War must forever lie.

Lionel Rothschild became Benjamin's mentor and guide. Starting from the young Disraeli's formative years, Lionel took charge and steered his protege from one success to another.

> Disraeli was to Lionel what Weishaupt was to Amschel; Gambetta to James Rothschild III, what Poincare was to Alphonso Rothschild IV and is to Eduard Rothschild V, or as was and is Kerensky (Kirbis) to E. Rothschild V...
>
> Disraeli was the Horse of Troy slipped into the upper classes of Great Britain, carrying inside a score of Jews as future Lords and Ministers. Now they entirely rule her. (Let Us Prevent The Second World War. (Count Cherep-Spiridovich)

According to Buckle's Life and Death of Disraeli, "no career in English history is more marvelous than that of Disraeli and none has hitherto been shrouded in greater mystery."

But to Thomas Carlyle, the great English essayist and historian, Disraeli was an "adventurer and a superb Hebrew conjuror." Carlyle wrote a notable work on the French Revolution and his lectures On Heroes, which were greatly acclaimed, made him a better judge of Disraeli than Buckle's History of Civilization in England. Professor William Langer also does a more realistic job in assessing the worth of Disraeli, but none of these historians say anything at all about his mentor and controller, Lionel Rothschild. Cherep-Spiridovich is the least charitable of all toward Disraeli:

> The politics of Disraeli consisted chiefly in his hatred of Russia . . . Taken by Lionel under his guidance, Disraeli henceforth assumed a triumphant scorn, that which would be worthy of a Mephistopheles. As he was luridly pale with flashing eyes and black hair, he adopted a dress coat of black velvet lined with white satin, white gloves, hanging fringes of black silk, white ivory stick with black tassels.

> All this was devilishly combined in order to make a stronger impression on influential old ladies. And through them, Benjamin learned in London all the secrets needed for his patron-Lionel, with whose money Disraeli stepped into the highest places.

Sarah Bradford, in her book Disraeli, states on pages 60 and 186 that Disraeli had "strong Zionist feelings, which he expressed in private." Bradford mentions several other significant things as they related to the Rothschild's patronage of Disraeli:

> They knew his wife Mary Anne before the marriage, relating how the Rothschild ladies became increasingly intimate with her. (Page 187)

> Disraeli was often entertained at the home of Anthony de Rothschild and was "considered as part of the family." (Page 386)

Disraeli, Author Weintraub relates how close Lionel was to Disraeli (page 243) and how he "considered Lionel his best friend. . . He saw him more than anyone else in London and never needed an invitation to dine. After the death of Disraeli's wife Mary Anne, he practically lived at Lionel's house. (Pages 243 and 611) Anthony de Rothschild was the best and kindest host in the world. (Page 651)

Weintraub mentions that Alfred de Rothschild was extremely generous toward Disraeli. We are left in no doubt that Disraeli and the Rothschilds enjoyed an extraordinarily close friendship reaching far beyond that which would be understood by the normal meaning of the word.

CHAPTER 23

ROTHSCHILDS SURROGATE FINANCED ATTACK ON RUSSIA

Earlier herein, I indicated that I would explain in some detail the Rothschild involvement in the war between Japan and Russia in 1904-1905. At that time the government of Japan thought they were receiving a helping hand from Jacob Schiff who worked behind the scenes to foment tension between Russia and Japan, but what was actually behind the loan Schiff gave to the Japanese?

The Rothschilds needed Japan in their quest to destabilize Russia. Their hatred of the Romanov family was unbounded. The attack by the Japanese fleet on Port Arthur set the stage for the Bolshevik Revolution that was to follow in due time. As Lionel Rothschild once remarked, "there has been no friendship between the Court of St. Petersburg and my family."

The Russo-Japanese War began on February 8, 1904. The Communists were jubilant seeing in the attack a chance to strike a blow against the government. Russian newspapers like Novoye Vremyo charged that the Zionist Jews were secretly helping Japan. In this they were correct because Jacob Schiff was instrumental in floating several loans in favor of Japan.

Schiff was tied to the Rothschilds through his birth in Frankfurt on January 10, 1847. His father was known to the Rothschilds. When he reached adulthood, Jacob became a broker for the Rothschild bank in Frankfurt. During 1865 the Rothschilds sent him to New York to connect up with the firm of Frank and Gans. Under the instructions of the Rothschilds he started his own brokerage house of Budge, Schiff and Co. in 1867. The partnership lasted for about six years and was dissolved in 1873 at which time Schiff went to Europe.

After a tour of German banking firms in 1873 he returned to the United States in 1875, and was made a member of the banking firm Kuhn, Loeb and Co., a well known "front" for Rothschild banking interests in America. Schiff hated Russia and saw in a Russo-Japanese War the chance to strike a blow against the Tsars and perhaps bring about the end of their rule over Russia.

By his express order, Kuhn, Loeb and Co., floated the three large Japanese war loans in 1904 and 1905. In appreciation he was awarded the Second Order of the Sacred Treasure of Japan. After the decisive defeat of the Russian fleet at Port Arthur, the stage was set for the grave unrest in Russia that was to follow:

July 28, 1904
Murder of Viacheslav von Plehve, the able minister of the interior

August 22,1904
Jewish rioting erupted in Kiev, Rovno and Volhnia, continued to October

January 22,1905
Bloody Sunday led by Rothschild agent "Father" Giorgi Gapon

October 2-30,1905
A General Strike in which the whole country joined

December 22-January 1,1905-06 Insurrection of workers in Moscow

May 2,1906
The dismissal of Count Witte, recognized by historians as the beginning of the end of the rule of the Romanov's

The murder of von Plehve was predicted in a Jewish poem circulated in February 1904, addressed to "Haman." Easily identified as the minister of the interior, it read that the "new Haman" would soon die. On the morning of July 28, 1904, a terrorist by the name of Sazonov threw a bomb at von Plehve as he stood in the square before the Warsaw depot in St. Petersburg.

Just before the Bolshevik Revolution erupted, Schiff gave Lenin $20 million to further the Bolshevik cause. It is no wonder that Pope Leo XIII wrote in his Apostolic Letter of March 19, 1902, Parvenu a la Vingt-cinquieme Anee:

> Including most nations in its immense grip it unites itself with other sects of which the real inspiration and the hidden motive powers. It first attracts and then retains its associates by the bait of worldly advantage, which it secures for them. It bends governments to its will sometimes by promises, sometimes by threats. It has found its way into every class of society, and forms an invisible and irresponsible power, an independent government, as if it were within the body corporate of the lawful state.

Well did Dr. Gerard Encausse in Mysteria in the April 1914 issue declare:

> Side by side with the international politics of each State, there exist certain obscure organizations of > international politics. . . The men that take part in these councils are not professional politicians or brilliantly-dressed ambassadors, but certain, unknown men, high financiers, who are superior to the vain ephemeral politicians who imagine that they govern the world.

Before he was turned in favor of the conspirators, Winston Churchill remarked about events in Russia:

> The leading spirits of a formidable sect, the most formidable sect in the world, and with those spirits around him, set to work with a demoniacal ability to tear to pieces every institution upon which the Russian State depended. Russia was laid low. Russia had to be laid low. She was laid low in the dust.

Churchill was referring to the diabolical fury of Lenin and Trotsky, and the terror and destruction they brought down on Christian Russia. (Speech in the House of Commons on Nov. 5, 1919)

Lenin was but another valet of the Rothschilds sent to do their bidding. Their hatred for the Romanovs' knew no bounds. The one thing that infuriated the Rothschilds was the Tsar's attempt to form a Holy Empire that would acknowledge Christ as it leader. There are several accounts: The Jewish author A. Rappaport's book, The Curse of the Romanov's, Professor William Langer's account, John Spencer Bassett in The Lost Fruits of Waterloo and documents in Lord Milner's private papers.

The Holy Alliance was considered a Christian League of Nations, Austria, Prussia, and Russia with the hope that Britain and France and all the nations of Europe would join. The nations were to swear an oath of allegiance to "The One and Only True Sovereign, to whom alone, all power by divine right belongs, namely God, our Divine Savior, Jesus Christ."

The leading light in this hoped-for alliance was Tsar Alexander I who moved mightily to make it become a reality. The Rothschilds immediately expressed their opposition to it. Professor Langer defines it thusly, which in my opinion is a prejudiced account:

> On September 26, 1815, the Holy Alliance, a document drawn up by the Tsar Alexander I, signed by the Emperor Francis I and by Frederick William III and ultimately by all European rulers, excepting the prince regent of Britain, the pope, and the sultan of Turkey. It was an innocuous declaration of Christian principles, which were to guide the rulers in their relations with their subjects and with each other.
>
> These vague and unexceptionable principles were probably meant by the tsar as merely a preface to some form of international organization along the lines recommended by the Abbe de St. Pierre a century earlier.
>
> The importance of the document lay not in its terms, but in its later confusion in the public mind with the Quadruple Alliance and more particularly, with the reactionary policy of the three eastern powers which were regarded as bound by a pact directed against the liberties of the people, camouflaged as religion.

In the first instance, it was not "camouflaged as religion." That was the interpretation put upon it by the Rothschilds who did all they could to stop Britain from signing the document.

In France, the Rothschilds were instrumental in getting the "separation of Church and State" to help to dissolve the Holy Alliance. Rappaport's book in this regard:

> The re-establishment of European peace has given to Czar Alexander I great satisfaction. Alexander directed his attention to the irreligiousness of the nations as the source of evils. He conceived the idea of reviving religious fervor in the peoples and thus re-establish a patriarchal regime, purity of family life, obedience to the law and authority. But the rulers must set an example and serve as models for their subjects.
>
> The sovereigns of Europe must carry out their missions as rulers of empires and kingdoms in the spirit of the founder of Christianity, which should be the link uniting the sovereigns to their peoples and among themselves. (Curse of the Romanov's, page 336)

Apparently the Holy Alliance was at variance with the plans of the Rothschilds if we take into account the writings of Count Cherep-Spiridovich, who believed that from that moment on in 1815, the Rothschilds sealed the fate of Russia and the Romanov family. Cardinal Manning stated: An association has been formed for the express purpose of rooting out all the religions of the establishments and overturning all the governments of Europe. The cardinal believed that the first victim was France in the French Revolution and Russia was its second victim. There is evidence that Disraeli did not tell the truth about Russia. It was the Rothschilds, who fomented the Bolshevik Revolution and financed it through their New York banking fronts of Jacob Schiff and J.P. Morgan, and in London by Lord Alfred Milner. It is a fact that Schiff gave Trotsky $20 million for the task of overthrowing Christian Russia.

The history of the Rothschilds shows that they did not hesitate to spend part of their huge fortune to achieve political goals. In this they achieved astonishing successes.

That the Rothschilds held and exercised amazing power over nations and governments is born out by the following:

> The Kaiser had to consult Rothschild to find out whether he could declare war. Another Rothschild carried the whole burden of the conflict which overthrew Napoleon. (The Patriot, Dr. Stuart Holden, June 11, 1925)

> The revolt in Georgia (Caucasus) was staged by the Rothschilds. (Humanite, September 1924. This was a Jewish magazine)

> The Rothschilds can start or prevent wars. Their word could make or break Empires.
> (Chicago Evening newspaper, December 3, 1923)

> Alphonso Rothschild consented to pay all the indemnity of France to Germany, if France would elect him King.
> (Journal d'un Officier d'Ordonance by Comte d'Hemson)

> At the last, decisive council of the British Cabinet on July 3, 1914, Mr. Lloyd George invited Lord Rothschild to listen to the debate. The Prime Minister played his demonical game on behalf of the Rothschilds, whose mere tool he has always been and still is. If England had honestly declared that she would stand by Russia and France there would have been no war, because the Kaiser would never have permitted it, not withstanding the 10 Jews who closely surrounded him: Bethman-Hollwig-Rothschild, Rathenau, Ballin and Dembury. (Unrevealed History, Count Cherep-Spiridovich)

> The Rothschilds have been the backbone of all political and financial happenings since 1770. Their name ought to be mentioned on each page of the history of every country. The authors, teachers, lecturers and politicians who do not speak of them, must be considered dupes, hypocrites or criminally ignorant. (Unrevealed History, Count Cherep-Spiridovich)

> Most of the Archives containing details about the Rothschilds were purposefully burned in Paris during the Commune in 1871, of which Rothschild was the chief financier. (La Libre Parole, May 27, 1905)

> In February 1817, the free masons, Bublikoff and others; all valets of the Rothschilds, went over to Russia and stopped the fast food trains that were going to Petrograd, in order to provoke the people into revolt. (Unrevealed History, Count Cherep-Spiridovich)

> On February 15, 1911, Schiff and Co., urged President Taft not to renew the Commercial Treaty of 1832 with Russia. When he declined, Schiff refused to shake his hand, saying, 'this means war.' The murders of Luschinsky and Prime Minister Stolypin and World War followed.
> (Towards Disasters; Dangers and Remedies, Count Cherep-Spiridovich)

The Rothschilds consorted with kings, princes and potentates, they amassed huge fortunes and titles, lords and barons, "Sir" and "Lady" and had innumerable honors bestowed upon them. They wished to forget their beginnings and their founder who made it all possible by misappropriating the "windfall" he was given charge of by the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel.

Mayer Amschel	1743-1812
Anselm Mayer	1773-1855
Salomon	1774-1855
Nathan	1777-1836
Karl	1788-1855
Jacob James	1792-1868

CHAPTER 24

SOME OPINIONS ON THE ROTHSCHILDS, THEIR ROLE IN WAR, REVOLUTION AND FINANCIAL INTRIGUES

This chapter consists of opinions by various authors and authorities which cannot be conveniently included in the body of the book because they are somewhat disconnected.

Nevertheless, in my opinion they are important, because they provide a basis for the writings of those historians and researchers who have been almost solidly at one with the belief that the Rothschilds were one of the greatest forces at play in the 18th and 19th centuries, and who are in all probability, even more so, today.

The First World War brought to Eduard Rothschild more than 100 billion dollars. (Count Cherep-Spiridovich)

This mighty revolution which is at this moment preparing in Germany and of which so little is as yet known is developing entirely under the auspices of the Jews, who almost monopolize the professional chairs of Germany. (Coningsby, Disraeli, page 250, writing about events in 1844-1848)

Historians agree that he meant the Rothschilds. Practically all wars and revolutions were then financed by the Rothschilds. (Disraeli in Coningsby, pages 218-219)

The League of Nations is a Jewish idea. We created it after a fight of 25 years. (Nathan Sokolow, Zionist leaders at Carlsbad Congress, August 27, 1932)

The League of Nations is run entirely by Jews: Paul Hymans, Sir Eric Drummond, Paul Mantaux, Major Abraham, Mrs. N. Spiller, The Jew 'valet,' Albert Thomas who helped with French millions to help enthrone the Bolsheviks in Russia, is "chief of the Labor Section. He receives a fabulous salary." (Le Peril Juif La Regue d'Israel chez les Anglo Saxons, B. Grasset, Peres, France)

Again this appears to refer to the Rothschilds and I take pains to point out that in most cases "Jews" may be substituted for "Rothschilds."

The modern social revolutionary movement dates back from the middle of the 18th century. Ever since that time there; has been a flowing of a continuous stream of subversive agitation, assuming many forms, but essentially the same, ever broadening and deepening until it became a veritable flood, which has submerged Russia and which threatens to engulf our civilization. (The Revolt Against Civilization, Lothrop Stoddard)

The great revolutionary movements began between the middle and the end of the 18th century, when in 1770, Amschel Rothschild became the manager of the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel. Amschel hired all of the Miliukovs, Kerenskies and Lenins et al of the 18th century to start their subversive agitation, just as E. Rothschild hired those of the 20th century. (Count Cherep-Spiridovich)

Facts of world importance are known to too few men, and we need more facts. Humanity cannot find the light unless it has facts. (Editor of the Chicago Daily News)

What is this formidable sect of which Abbe Burruel speaks in the 18th century and Churchill in the 20th? Upon the answer may rest the power of Christianity and of civilization based upon Christianity. It was a power outside of Russia; it was a worldwide power and it was strong enough to bring down Russia, and also, the House of Hohenzollers. What was it? (Cause of World Unrest, Nesta Webster, page 35)

Lloyd George said he did not believe any statesman or ruler caused war. It may be a century before the world will know the full truth. (Senator Copeland, Congressional Record)

The House of Rothschild with a few co-religionists conspires to own the world.
(The Secret of the Rothschilds, Mrs. Mary Hobart)

The Kaiser had to consult Rothschild to find out if he could declare war. Another Rothschild carried the whole burden of the conflict which overthrew Napoleon. (The New York Times, July 22, 1924)

In the Imperial Archives in Berlin was found a letter from Rothschild to Wilhelm II, urging war.
(Truth About The Jews, Walter Hurt, page 324)

To the public, the archives of the family, (the Rothschilds) which could throw so much light upon history are a profound secret, a sealed book kept hidden.
(The Rothschilds, Financial Rulers of the World, John Reeves, page 59)

Bismarck, Beaconsfield (Disraeli), the French Republic, Gambetta etc., all are a force as nothing. A mere mirage. It is the Jew alone with his Bank who is their master and who rules all of Europe. The Jew will prefer VETO and suddenly, Bismarck will fall. . . To the Rothschilds, nothing could have occurred more propitiously than the outbreak of the American revolt and the French Revolution, as the two enabled them to lay the foundations of the immense wealth they have sine acquired.

(The Rothschilds Financial Rulers of the World, John Reeves, page 86)

Mrs. Nesta Webster cannot escape the conclusion that international financiers put up the money (for revolutions and wars.) More it is the Jewish financiers who supply the funds; it is Jews who have been the agents-provocateurs of revolutions of revolutions for the last two thousand years. It is the Jews who are the secret inner council of the five principal organized horrendous movements at work with which organized government has to contend. (The New York Times, March 8, 1925)

In the whole range of history, no one has aroused emotions so opposite and intense, or has claimed so much of the admiration of, the fear, and the hared of mankind. (Napoleon, Hebert Fisher)

A man, Napoleon, born without any advantage of wealth or high descent made himself master of the world before he was 35 and he finished his career of un-paralleled romantic impossibility when he was 46. (How Great Was Napoleon? Sydney Dark)

In conclusion how amazing it is, that the same leaders of the elite of the world, who have the power to excite wars for their own benefits, can also break and consign to obscurity, those formerly important national leaders who oppose their grand designs, particularly their plans to establish a New World Order operation inside a World structure of a single One World Government dictatorship. Unless a counter force can be erected to oppose these plans, the world could very well be plunged into the darkness of a brutal dictatorship by the year 2025.

The Rise of the House of Rothschild

COUNT EGON CAESAR CORTI

Translated from the German by Brian and Beatrix Lunn

1770-1830

The Pedler on Horseback

Caricature of the House of Rothschild

FOREWORD

Historians, in interpreting the nineteenth century, have laid stress on many and various aspects of the period under study; and descriptions of isolated periods, single episodes, and individuals are scattered amongst hundreds and even thousands of books. On the other hand, certain special features of the period under consideration have been, for various reasons, entirely neglected.

An example of such neglect is the ignoring by historians of the role played by the Rothschild family in the history of the nineteenth century, and the object of this work is to appraise the important influence of this family on the politics of the period, not only in Europe but throughout the world. For, strangely enough, the influence of the Rothschilds is barely mentioned, or at the most casually referred to, in otherwise comprehensive and painstaking historical treatises.

Special literature dealing with the House of Rothschild usually falls into one of two groups, either fulsome paeans of praise commissioned by the House itself, or scurrilous pamphlets inspired by hatred—both equally unpleasant. There are, however, two works of serious value in existence, which are partially compiled from legal documents, but they are of small scope. One is by an employee of the Rothschilds, Christian Wilhelm Berghoeffer, and the other is the impartial work of Dr. Richard Ehrenberg; but these treat only of isolated incidents in the history of the House, and throw no light on its pan-European importance.

The object of the present work, which deals with the period 1770-1830, is to trace the rise of the House of Rothschild from its small beginnings to the great position it attained, culminating in the year of its great crisis.

In the course of my researches I found that references to the name of Rothschild in official documents and in books of memoirs were as common as they are rare in contemporary textbooks. I made a point of collecting all available data until my drawers were literally crammed with letters, deeds, and documents containing the name of Rothschild, and bearing dates of almost every year of the nineteenth century. My next step was to visit the various European capitals which had been the scene of the family activities, in order to enrich my store of references with all the relevant literature. The subject is indeed inexhaustible, but the material I had amassed encouraged me to essay a complete picture.

The subject required the most delicate treatment, but my determination to undertake the work was accompanied by the definite intention of according it complete impartiality, for I was convinced from the beginning that a prejudiced outlook would render the work utterly valueless.

The House of Rothschild, as will be readily understood, did not throw open its archives to my inspection, for it is particularly careful in guarding its more important business secrets. But this was not entirely without its advantage, for it left me completely free from political considerations and uninfluenced by racial, national, and religious predilections or antipathies. I was thus enabled, in accordance with my wish, to begin an independent historical research into the part played by this House in the nineteenth century, which I knew to be far more important than is commonly thought.

The general scheme of this work will be built upon facts alone, in a practical way such as will help us to form our own judgment on individuals and the part they played in world events.

I should like to take this opportunity of expressing my special sense of gratitude toward all those whose advice and assistance have been so valuable to me in my work.

Above all I have to thank Dr. Bittner, Director of the State Archives at Vienna, as well as his exceedingly helpful staff, Professors Gross, Antonius, Reinoehl, Schmidt, Wolkan, and his Chief Clerk, Herr Marek. I should also like to thank Lieutenant-Colonel von Carlshausen, grandnephew of the man who helped the Rothschilds up the first rung of the ladder, and the Director of the Prussian Secret State Archives at Berlin, Geheimrat Klinkenborg. My thanks are also due to Dr. Losch of the Prussian State Library in Berlin, Dr. A. Richel at Frankfort and the staff of the Municipal Museum in that city who, together with the Director of the Portrait Collection in the Vienna National Library, Hofrat Dr. Rottinger and Dr. Wilhelm Beetz, who so kindly assisted me with the illustrations.

The material was collected for over a period of three and a half years, and only after much care has been spent on it do I now offer it to the public. It is submitted in the hope that it will be judged in accordance with its intentions. It is inspired by an intense love of truth, and it relates the story of an unseen but infinitely powerful driving force which permeated the whole of the nineteenth century.

The Author

Vienna, July, 1927.

CONTENTS

CHAPTER I The Origins and the Early Activities of the Frankfort Family Rothschild Page 1

CHAPTER II The Rothschild Family During the Napoleonic Era " 28

CHAPTER III The Great Napoleonic Crisis and Its Exploitation by the House of Roths-child " 109

CHAPTER IV The Brothers Rothschild During the Period of Congresses, 1818-1822 " 187

CHAPTER V The Rothschild Business Throughout the World " 277

CHAPTER VI The House of Rothschild Rides the Storm " 343

NOTES " 409

BIOGRAPHICAL NOTES " 425

BIBLIOGRAPHY " 429

The Rise of the House of Rothschild

CHAPTER I

The Origins and the Early Activities of the Frankfort Family Rothschild FRANKFORT-ON-THE-MAIN, seat of the Imperial Elections since the Golden Bull of 1356, acquired a dominating position amongst the great cities of Germany during the second half of the eighteenth century. Formerly the capital of the kingdom of the East Franks, it had become subject to the empire alone as early as 1245, and in spite of many vicissitudes it had maintained its leading position throughout the centuries. It expanded considerably during the last few centuries before the French Revolution and now numbered some 35,000 inhabitants, of whom one-tenth were Jews. By virtue of its natural position, lying so close to the great waterway of the Rhine and to the frontiers of France and Holland, it had become the gateway for the trade of Germany with the western states. Trade with England too constituted an important element in the activities of its inhabitants.

It was natural that members of the Jewish race, with their special gifts for trade and finance, should be particularly attracted to this city. Moreover, towards the end of the Middle Ages the Jews in Frankfort enjoyed a great measure of freedom, and at first no difficulties were placed in the way of their settlement. It was not until the non-Jewish members of the business community at Worms saw that they were suffering from the competition of these enterprising people that the Christian citizens combined in their superior numbers.

Now began a period of harsh oppression for the Jewish inhabitants. In order that they might be removed from the neighborhood of the most important church in the town, they were ordered by a law passed in the year 1462 to leave the houses they had been living in and to settle in a quarter set aside for the purpose—the so-called Jewish City.[1] This, however, consisted only of a single dark alley, about twelve feet broad, and lay, as described by Goethe, between the city wall and a trench. For more than three hundred years this continued to be the sole residence of the Frankfort Jews, whose continuance in the city became more and more unpopular with the other inhabitants. As early as the second decade of the seventeenth century a rising broke out under one Fettmilch, one of the objects of which was to drive the Jews out of Frankfort. This object was indeed achieved through murder and pillage. Although the Jews soon returned to the city, they had to submit to innumerable restrictions and regulations embodied in a special law dealing with the so-called "Status of Jews." They were made subject to a poll-tax, and were compelled, as being a foreign element in the town, to purchase the "protection" of their persons and property. Hence they came to be called "protected Jews." The number of their families was to be limited to five hundred and only twelve marriages a year were allowed, although this number might be increased if a family died out. The Jews were not allowed to acquire land, or to practice farming or handicrafts. They were also forbidden to trade in various commodities, such as fruit, weapons and silk. Moreover, except during fairs, they were forbidden to offer their wares anywhere except outside the Jewish quarter. They were forbidden to leave the space within the ghetto walls by night, or on Sundays or holy days. If a Jew crossed a bridge he had to pay a fee for doing so. They were not allowed to visit public taverns and were excluded from the more attractive walks in the city. The Jews accordingly did not stand high in public esteem. When they appeared in public, they were often greeted with shouts of contempt and stones were sometimes thrown at them. Boerne has stated that any street urchin could say to a passing Jew, "Jew, do your duty," and the Jew then had to step aside and take off his hat. However that may be, the oppressed condition of the Jews and the bent of many of them to usury, combined with the natural hostility of the Christians and their feeling that they were not as sharp in business, created an atmosphere of mutual hatred that can scarcely have been more painful anywhere than in Frankfort.

The progenitors of the House of Rothschild lived under conditions such as those in the ghetto of Frankfort. The earlier ancestors of Meyer Amschel Rothschild, who laid the foundations of the future greatness of the house, existed in the middle of the sixteenth century; we know their names, and their tombs have been preserved in the old Jewish cemetery at Frankfort. Formerly the houses in the Jewish quarter were not numbered, each house being distinguished by a shield of a particular color or by a sign. The house in which the members of the Rothschild family lived bore a small red shield. There is no doubt that it is to this fact that they owe their family name; it is first mentioned in 1585 in the name "Isaak Elchanan[2] at the Red Shield," his father's tombstone simply bearing the name Elchanan. About a century later Naftali Hirz at the Red Shield left the ruinous old building from which the family had derived its name, and occupied the so-called Haus zur Hinterpfann, in which the Rothschilds were now domiciled as protected Jews.

Until the time when Meyer Amschel Rothschild—who was born in the year 1743, six years before Goethe—reached manhood, the family were principally engaged in various kinds of retail trade. At the beginning of the eighteenth century they had become money-changers in a small way. From the occasional records of their tax payments which have been preserved, it would appear that they were not a poor Jewish family, but that they were only reasonably well off.

In any case it is clear that Meyer Amschel came into some small inheritance when, in 1755, in his twelfth year, he lost his father and mother, of whom he was the eldest son; this gave him the incentive to throw himself into the battle of life with that vigor and industry which his parents had implanted in him in his early childhood. In the conditions of those times the struggle was certainly much more severe for a young Jew than for his more fortunate Christian neighbors.

When he was a boy of ten Meyer Amschel had been employed by his father in changing coins of every kind, that is, in exchanging gold and silver for the appropriate amount of copper known as coarse money. In the chaotic conditions prevailing in Germany—divided as the country was into innumerable small principalities, cities and spiritual jurisdictions, all of which had their own currency systems—the business of money-changing offered magnificent opportunities of profit, since everybody was compelled, before undertaking even the shortest journey, to call for the assistance of the exchange merchant. As the boy grew up, an important side interest developed out of this occupation, as he occasionally became possessed of rare and historically valuable coins, which awoke in him the instincts of the coin collector.

After leaving the school at Furth, where he was educated in the Jewish faith, Meyer Amschel entered the firm of Oppenheim at Hanover. While there he happened to make the acquaintance of the Hanoverian General von Estorff, an ardent coin collector, who employed him to obtain many valuable coins for his collection. As the general was connected with the ruling house in Hesse, this acquaintance was to have fruitful results. In his spare time Meyer Amschel now devoted himself more and more to numismatics. He got hold of any papers about the subject that he could, and in course of time became an expert in his subject, although his general education left a very great deal to be desired. At a comparatively early age he returned to his native city of Frankfort, in order to take possession of his inheritance, and having done so, to lay the foundations of a business of Ins own. For this he had received a practical education from his earliest youth, both at home and at Hanover.

About the same time General von Estorff left Hanover for the court of Prince William of Hesse, the grandson of the old Landgrave William VIII, who resided at Hesse; he proceeded to the small town of Hanau, which lies quite close to Frankfort. The prince's father Frederick II of Hesse had married a daughter of King George III of England of the House of Hanover, and the two rulers used their family relationships to consolidate their dynastic and political interests. The sale of soldiers for service under foreign governments, practiced by so many German princes at this time, was an important part of their activities; England, being particularly accustomed to carrying on wars with foreign mercenaries, was an exceedingly good customer.

Unfortunately Frederick II fell out with his wife, his father, and his father-in-law, because he changed over from the Protestant to the Catholic faith. In order to protect his grandson from his father's influence the old landgrave decided that William was to be kept away from Cassel, and allotted the county of Hanau to him. Until he should be able to assume the rulership of that province he was sent to King Frederick V of Denmark, who had married the second daughter of the King of England, and whose daughter was destined to be the future bride of young William.

The relations of the ruling House of Hesse with England and Denmark were to be fraught with the most important consequences for the rise of the House of Rothschild, which was enabled to make use of the close business connection that it succeeded in establishing with the ruling House of Hesse, to get into touch with the courts and the leading statesmen of Denmark and England.

The old Landgrave William VIII died in 1760. Frederick assumed the government at Cassel, and William became crown prince; and as the bridegroom of the Danish princess he became, in accordance with the will of his grandfather, independent ruler of the small county of Hanau with its 50,000 inhabitants, to whose interests he devoted himself with the greatest zeal. William was a thoroughly active person, and was never idle for a moment. He read a great deal, and actually wrote some essays on matters of local historical interest. He also tried his hand, though without any great success, at etching, modeling and carpentering, and he had a very definite flair for collecting.

It would appear that General von Estorff aroused his ruler's interest in coin-collecting; in 1763 William adopted this hobby with great enthusiasm, and it afforded him much pleasure and satisfaction. Estorff spoke to him about Meyer Amschel Rothschild, who had bought coins for him in Hanover in former days, as being a great expert in that line.[3] On the strength of this introduction Rothschild selected some of his finest medals and rarest coins, and went to Hanau to offer them to the young prince. He did not succeed in seeing him personally, but he managed to hand them to someone in the prince's immediate entourage. This offer proved to be the starting-point of a lasting business connection, even though at first it was of a quite loose and impersonal nature.

At that time a large number of foreigners used to visit Frankfort every spring. The town fairs were widely famous, The latest products of the whole world were on view there, and young William of Hanau, who had a talent for business, took a special interest in these fairs and constantly attended them. Meyer Amschel always managed to get advance information about these journeys from the prince's servants, and profited by these occasions to offer William while he was in Frankfort not only rare coins but also precious stones and antiques. Although this was principally done through the prince's retinue, he sometimes managed to conduct these transactions personally, and in any case he managed to establish a regular business relationship. He was fortunate in that the prince did not share the general aversion to Jews, and appreciated anyone who seemed intelligent and good at business, and whom he thought he could use in his own interests.

At that time titles and honors were of far greater practical importance than they are today; unless a person had some kind of prefix or suffix all doors were closed to him, and everyone who did not have a title of nobility by the accident of birth would endeavor to obtain an office, or at any rate an official title, from some one of the innumerable counts or princelings who in that day still enjoyed sovereign rights. Meyer Amschel Rothschild, being a shrewd man with an astonishing knowledge of human nature for his years—he was only twenty-five—concentrated on using his connection with the Prince of Hanau to obtain a court title. He hoped thereby not merely to raise his prestige generally, but more particularly to advance his relations with other princes interested in coins.

In 1769 he wrote a most humble petition[4] to the Prince of Hanau, in which, after referring to various goods delivered to the prince to his Highness's most gracious satisfaction, he begged that he might "most graciously be granted the advantage of being appointed court agent." Meyer Amschel promised always to devote all his energy and property to the prince's service, and he concluded his letter with a perfectly sincere statement that if he received the designation in question he hoped thereby to gain business esteem, and that it would otherwise enable him to make his fortune in the city of Frankfort.

This letter, which was written in a style expressive of extreme humility, was the first of an almost endless series of petitions which the various members of the House of Rothschild were to address in the course of the nineteenth century to those occupying the seats of the mighty. Many of these were favorably considered, and assisted no little in establishing the fortunes of that House. This, the first of the series, was granted, and the nomination was duly carried into effect on September 21, 1769. Henceforth to the name of Rothschild was attached the decorative suffix "Crown Agent to the Principality of Hesse-Hanau."

This more or less corresponded with the present-day practice under which a tradesman may display the royal coat-of-arms with the legend "By special appointment," etc. It was a mere designation carrying no obligation, and although it gave expression to the fact that a business man enjoyed the patronage of a customer in the highest circles, it did not imply any official status whatever. Nevertheless this first success gave much joy to Meyer Amschel, since it not only enabled him to make great profits in his old coin business, but gave his firm a special prestige with the world at large, as even the smallest prince shed a certain glamour upon all who came anywhere near his magic circle; and the Prince of Hanau was grandson of the King of England, husband of the daughter of the King of Denmark, and destined to be the ruler of Hesse-Cassel.

At the age of twenty-five Meyer Amschel was a tall, impressive-looking man of pronounced Hebraic type; his expression, if rather sly, was good-natured. In accordance with the custom of those times he wore a wig, although, as he was a Jew, he was not allowed to have it powdered, and in accordance with the customs of his race he wore a small, pointed black beard. When he took stock of his business and his little property, he could say to himself with justice that he had not merely administered his inheritance intelligently, but substantially increased it. Although he could certainly not be classed amongst the wealthy men of Frankfort, or even amongst the wealthy Jews of that city, he could assuredly be described as well off, and was in a position to think of founding a family.

He had been attracted for some time by the youthful daughter of a tradesman called Wolf Solomon Schnapper, who lived not far from the Rothschilds' house in the Jewish quarter. She was seventeen years old when Meyer Amschel courted her, had been brought up in all the domestic virtues, was simple and modest, and exceedingly industrious, and brought a dowry with her which, though small, was in solid cash. Meyer Amschel's marriage was celebrated on August 29, 1770. After his marriage he would have liked to move from the house zur Hinterpfann, which he rented, into a house of his own, but he could not yet afford to do so. The young couple's first child, a daughter, was born as early as 1771, after which followed three boys in the years 1773, 1774, 1775, who were given the names Amschel, Solomon, and Nathan.

While his wife was fully occupied in bringing up the children and running the house, Meyer Amschel developed his business, in which his invalid brother Kalman was a partner until he died in 1782. Without neglecting his ordinary business of money-changing, he bought several collections of coins from needy aristocratic collectors in the district, and he had an antique coin catalogue of his own printed, which he circulated widely, especially among such princes as were interested in numismatics. He sent such catalogues to Goethe's patron Duke Karl August of Weimar, to Duke Karl Theodore of the Palatinate, and of course always to his own benefactor at Hanau,[5] Prince William.

The prince's mother still kept him away from his father, Landgrave Frederick, who was ruling at Cassel, and who made several unsuccessful attempts to get into touch with his son. William had married Princess Caroline of Denmark six years before Meyer Amschel's marriage; but from the first moment of their union they had realized that they were not suited[6] to one another. Indeed so little physical or spiritual harmony was there between the young couple that their marriage might be regarded as an absolute affliction. It finally led to William's entirely neglecting his wife and living with numerous favorites, who bore him children. The families Haynau, Heimrod, and Hessenstein are the descendants of such unions, it being William's practice to obtain titles for his illegitimate children from the Emperor of Austria, in return for the moneys he lent to him. It is difficult to verify the fantastic figures[7] given as to the total number of his illegitimate children; but there is no doubt they were very numerous.

When he assumed the government of his small territory, William of Hanau was in a position to play the role of absolute ruler, and his highly marked individuality immediately made itself felt. He was insolent even with the nobility, and often observed that he did not like them to take advantage of any marks of familiar "condescension"[8] that he showed them. On the other hand he did not show any pride in dealing with persons who he thought would serve his interests. He was exceedingly suspicious, quick to see a point, and easily made angry, especially if his divine right was questioned.

He held broad views in religious matters, associated much with Freemasons and practiced complete religious tolerance. Under his rule the Jews enjoyed all kinds of liberties; they did not, for instance, have to display in the market signs to distinguish them from Christian tradespeople. Indeed William took pleasure in their marked talent for business, for in this matter he felt himself to be a kindred spirit. Business considerations governed him even when he was specifically considering the welfare of his soldiers. He would concern himself with the smallest details of their equipment; would pass the new recruits, and would give precise instructions as to the length of the pigtail to be worn. He was particularly fond of parades, and tortured his men with drill and button-polishing. One reason he was particularly anxious that his troops should look smart was that he could make a great deal of money by following the example of his father and grandfather in selling his men to England. His father Landgrave Frederick had in this way gradually transferred to England 12,000 Hessians, and amassed an enormous fortune in the process. In the same way William sold to England in 1776 the small Hanau regiment, which he had just formed. The conditions of such "subsidy-contracts" were exceedingly oppressive to the customer, as he had to pay substantial compensation for any man who was killed or wounded. The crown prince also increased his property considerably by this means. After deducting all expenses he realized a net profit of about 3,500,000 marks from this business, and there being no distinction between the public and the private purse of a prince, this money was at his absolute personal disposal.

In spite of his princely origin, such were the business instincts of this talented young man that this financial success simply whetted his appetite for amassing greater riches. Had William not been destined to succeed to the throne of Hesse, he would have been an outstandingly successful man of business. As it was he found such outlet as he could for his commercial instincts within the sphere of his princely dignity. Father and son continued to accumulate large capital sums, and they refrained from bringing over to the Continent substantial proportions of the subsidy moneys, which they invested in England itself. The management of these funds was entrusted to the Amsterdam financial house Van der Notten. England did not always pay in cash, but often in bills of exchange that had to be discounted. For this purpose the prince and his officials had to employ suitable middlemen in large commercial centers like Frankfort; although the middlemen had to get their profit out of the business they could not be dispensed with in view of the restricted means of transport and communication at that time. Purchases and sales had to be carefully regulated to prevent the market from being suddenly flooded with bills, the rate of exchange being consequently depressed.

This work fell to the various crown agents and factors; of these the Jew Veidel David was the principal one attached to the landgrave at Cassel, Rothschild being employed only by the crown prince at Hanau, and only in exchange business and to a limited extent in conjunction with several others. His personal relation with the prince was at first exceedingly slender, for, however enlightened he might be, a ruling prince did not easily associate with a Jew, and only long years of useful service, acting upon a temperament such as William's, could break down such natural obstacles. In the first instance men of business had to deal with the crown prince's officials ; to get on good terms with them was a primary essential for anybody who wanted to do business with the prince.

One of the most influential members of the crown prince's civil service was an official at the treasury called Carl Frederick Buderus.[9] He was the son of a Hanau schoolmaster, and had shown a special aptitude for the duties of a careful and accurate treasury clerk. His father had been writing- and music-master to the children of the crown prince's mistress Frau von Ritter-Lindenthal, ancestress of the Haynaus, and this had given him the opportunity of bringing to the crown prince's attention a plan of his son's for increasing the milk profits from one of the prince's dairies by the simple expedient of forbidding the practice, adopted by the office concerned, of omitting fractions of a heller in the accounts. Young Buderus showed that this would increase the revenue by 120 thalers. This discovery appealed so strongly to the avaricious prince, who counted every half-penny, that he entrusted Buderus with the accounts of his private purse, in addition to his normal duties.

Buderus henceforth displayed the greatest zeal in looking after the financial interests of the crown prince. He is generally credited with having been responsible for the introduction of the Salt Tax when the problem of providing for the prince's innumerable natural children became pressing. The resulting increase in the cost of this important article of diet was heavily felt, especially by the poorest inhabitants of Hesse-Cassel. There being no distinction between the public treasury and the private purse we can readily imagine how great this man's influence as. Moreover, the officials of that period were always personally interested on a percentage basis in the financial dealings which they carried through in their official capacity. By arrangement with amenable crown agents with whom they had to deal they could, without any suggestion of bribery, or of acting against the influence of their master, easily so arrange matters that their personal interests would be better served by a clever agent than by one who was less adaptable.

Meyer Amschel brought to his work a certain natural flair for psychology, and he always endeavored to create personal links wherever he possibly could. He naturally made a special point of being on good terms with the Hanau Treasury officials, and especially with Buderus. They, however, had not as yet sufficient confidence in the financial resources of the Frankfort Jew Rothschild to entrust to him anything except the smaller transactions.

Through the death of Landgrave Frederick, the crown prince suddenly succeeded to the throne of Hesse-Cassel, and to the most extensive property of any German prince of that period. On October 31, 1785, his father Frederick II had suddenly had a stroke during his midday meal and had fallen off his chair, dying a few minutes later. This news came as a complete surprise to the crown prince, as his father had latterly scarcely ever been ill. William of Hanau accordingly succeeded to the throne of Hesse-Cassel as Landgrave William IX. On reading his father's will he learned with pleasure that the country was free of debt, and that he had come into an enormous property. The subsidies received for the sale of mercenaries had been most profitably invested, and estimates the value of the inheritance varied between twenty[10] and sixty[11] million thalers—unparalleled sums for those times.

The new landgrave united his private property at Hanau with his inherited posssessions, and now found himself disposing of an amount of money which conferred far greater power on him than his new dignity. He moved his residence from Hanau, which was close to Frankfort, to Cassel, which lay much farther north, with the result that Meyer Amschel Rothschild's relations with the Hessian court at first suffered from the greater distance which separated him from his patron. But the Jewish tradesman was determined not to lose such a useful connection without a struggle. In order to remind the new landgrave of his existence he visited Cassel again in 1787, bringing with him a remarkably beautiful collection of coins, medals, and jeweled gold chains, and offered these wares to the landgrave at exceptionally low prices. The prince at once appreciated the real value of the articles, and eagerly did business with Meyer Amschel, who took advantage of the opportunity to submit the humble request that he should not be forgotten if any future bills of exchange required discounting, or the prince wanted to purchase English coins.

Rothschild had deliberately made a loss on these small deals in order to secure the chance of much more profitable business in the future, and his valuable articles were readily purchased from him because they were cheap, promises being freely made with regard to the future. But two years passed without his services being asked for. He stood by enviously, seeing other agents getting bills to discount, and being asked to pay interest only after six or eight months, or else to pay over the money in instalments, an arrangement equivalent to allowing the firms concerned substantial free credits. Rothschild had closely followed the business dealings of these firms, and had thought out a very useful way of transacting such matters if he should be entrusted with them.

He decided to pay another call at Cassel. During the summer of 1789 he wrote a letter to the landgrave[12] in which he referred to the services that he had rendered during a long course of years as Hesse-Hanau crown agent, and asked to be considered in connection with the bills-of-exchange business on a credit basis. In order to put himself on a level with his rivals he promised always to do business at a price at least as high as that offered by any banker in Gassel.

The petition—which shows that Rothschild already had control of considerable sums of money—was submitted to the landgrave by Buderus, but William decided that he must first obtain further information about Rothschild's business. His inquiries all produced satisfactory results; Meyer Amschel was described as being punctual in his payments, and as being an energetic and honorable man, who therefore deserved to be granted credit, even if precise figures regarding the extent of his possessions could not be obtained. Nevertheless, Rothschild received only a comparatively small credit transaction to carry out, whilst simultaneously a transaction thirty times as great was entrusted to Veidel David; but, though modest, it was a beginning. Buderus, whose position in the meantime had been steadily increasing in importance, often had occassion to travel between Cassel and Frankfort on business matters. We have evidence of the fact that as early as 1790 he had business dealings with Rothschild's father-in-law Wolf Solomon Schnapper, and it was Schnapper who brought him and Meyer Amschel together.

Rothschild would often get advance information of Buderus's journeys to Frankfort so that he could go and see him when he came. The Hessian official heard from other sources in Frankfort of the clever Jew's rising reputation, and of how he always met his obligations punctually. Buderus was also gradually influenced by Rothschild's own persuasive powers. As early as November, 1790, Buderus's accounts contain an entry regarding a "draft of 2,000 Laubtaler to the order of the crown agent Meyer Amschel Rothschild."[13]

Rothschild now urged Buderus, if occasion should arise, to recommend him to the landgrave for substantial dealings also. In 1794 an opportunity for this occurred. The capital sums invested by Hesse in England had grown to a very considerable amount, and the landgrave gave instructions that a portion of them should be brought over to Cassel. In addition to the Christian banking firm of Simon Moritz von Bethmann, which had been established in Frankfort for centuries, and four other firms, Buderus put forward the name of the crown agent Rothschild as suitable for carrying through this transaction. The landgrave, however, attached far too much importance to his old connection with Bethmann, at that time the outstanding banking firm in Germany, and with the other old established firms, and on this occasion too Rothschild was left out. But it did not occur again. In the end Buderus's efforts were successful in overcoming the landgrave's aversion, and henceforward Rothschild also was employed to an increasing extent in discounting bills and in other business.

His dealings with the court at Cassel soon became very active, and as Meyer Amschel carried through the matters entrusted to him, not merely conscientiously but with a shrewd eye to gain, the profits which he derived from them increased considerably. It was necessary for the young household that business should be brisk, for in 1788 another son, Carl Meyer, was born, and in 1792 a fifth son Jacob, called James, and Meyer Amschel's marriage had also been blessed with five daughters. There was the large family of twelve persons to feed; however, Meyer Amschel's flourishing business was not merely adequate to support his family, but there was a considerable and constantly increasing surplus available for increasing his business capital. In 1785, as an outward and visible sign of his increasing prosperity, he bought a handsome residence, the house known as zum grunen Schild, while he transferred to a relative the house zur Hinterpfann in which he had lived hitherto, and which he had partially purchased since being nominated crown agend.

The house into which the Rothschild family now moved is still standing almost as it was then; it is the right half of a building comprising two quite small family dwellings, typical of the straitened circumstances of the Jewish quarter. Only the three left windows of the house front belonged to the Rothschilds, and above the first door was a small, scarcely noticeable five-sided convex green shield.[14] The right half of the building, known as the house zur Arche, belonged to the Jewish family Schiffe, who kept a second-hand shop in it; over the door was a small carved ship representing the boat of Columbus.[15]

As the door of the Rothschild house was opened, an ancient bell was set ringing, sending its warning notes right through the house. Every step one took revealed the painful congestion in which the Jews of that period were compelled to exist, the only quarters where they were allowed to live being comprised within the small and narrow Jews' street. Everything in the house was very narrow, and each particle of space was turned to account. A creaking wooden staircase, underneath which cupboards had been built in, led to the upper floor, and to the little "green room" of Gudula, the mistress of the house, so called because the modest furniture in it was upholstered in green. In a glass case on the table was the withered bridal wreath of Meyer Amschel's wife. Let into the left wall was a small secret cupboard, concealed by a mirror hanging in front of it. In this matter, too, space was carefully utilized, there being cupboards built into the wall wherever possible, such as are now coming into use again.

On the ground floor was the parents' small bedroom, while the numerous children had to share one other little room. A narrow passage led to a kind of roof terrace—a tiny roof garden with a few plants. As the Jews were not allowed in the public gardens this roof garden furnished a modest substitute, and served as the family recreation ground. As it is laid down that the Feast of the Tabernacle must be celebrated in the open air, and there was no other place available, the little roof garden was used for this purpose.

Behind the house, and overlooking the narrow court-yard, was a room about nine feet square, which was actually the first banking house of the Rothschilds. Its most important article of furniture was a large iron chest with an enormous padlock. However, the lock was so contrived that the chest could not be opened on the side where the lock was, but only by lifting the lid from the back. In this room, too, there were secret shelves cleverly concealed in the walls. The kitchen of the house was very modest, the room being about twelve feet long and only about five feet broad; a tiny hearth, which could accommodate only one cooking pot, a chest, and a bench were about all that it contained. There was one fixture that constituted a great luxury for those times, a primitive pump which conveyed drinking water direct to the kitchen.

Such was the scene of the early activities of Meyer Amschel and his sons, whose energy and enterprise laid the foundations for the future development of their House. Berghoeffer's researches indicate that the annual income of the House of Rothschild, before the war period of the 1790's, may be estimated at between 2,000 and 3,000 gulden.[16] We are better able to realize what this meant when we consider that the expenditure of Goethe's family, who were people of position, was about 2,400 gulden a year. On such an income it was possible to live quite comfortably at Frankfort at that time, although the political disturbances which were developing soon began to produce their effect. Events profoundly affecting the course of all future history had taken place. The repercussions of the French Revolution were felt throughout Europe. There was no one, whether prince of peasant, who did not directly or indirectly feel its The principle of equality which it proclaimed aroused emotions of hope or dismay throughout the world, according to the social position of each individual, On the standards of the revolutionary armies was inscribed their determination to extend the benefits of their achievements throughout the world, and those who had seized the reins of power were soon to aim at world dominion. This fact constituted a special menace to the German princes whose territories bordered on France. The refugees of the French nobility flooded Germany, and many of them arrived at the Cassel court.

Landgrave William had occasion to hear many of the terrible stories told by the emigrants who had lost their nearest relatives under the guillotine, and had been forced to go abroad as homeless refugees reduced to absolute poverty. The impression gained from the sufferers themselves, the news regarding the threatened execution of the king and his consort, and the reports of the cruel treatment meted out to all who enjoyed princely or noble privileges caused him to tremble for his crown, as all the princes of Europe were trembling. He was also concerned about his enormous wealth, a special source of danger at such a time; and he therefore did not require much pressing to join the great coalition of princes against revolutionary France.

At the head of this coalition was Francis of Austria, who was shortly to be elected emperor, and who had been the first to ally himself with Prussia against France. Landgrave William attached particular importance to his relations with the man who was shortly to be emperor, and in a letter[17] to the "Most Excellent, Most Puissant King and highly honored cousin" he hastened to promise his military help as a proof of his "most special devotion to your high wishes." Francis of Austria expressed his gratitude and observed that this should serve as an example to others, especially as "not only every territorial prince and government of whatever kind they may be, but also every private person possessed of any property, or who has been blessed by God with any possessions or rights acquired by inheritance or otherwise must realize with ever growing conviction . . . that the war is a universal war declared upon all states, all forms of government, and even upon all forms of private property, and any orderly regulation of human society, as is clearly proved by the chaotic condition and internal desolation of France and her raging determination to spread similar conditions throughout the world."[18]

But the union of princes had much underrated the offensive of revolutionary France. Under the handicap of bad leadership and lack of unity the Allies were unable to prevail against the revolutionary armies, inspired by the ideals of liberty and nationalism. Prussia and Hesse were forced to retire; and the French General de Custine actually succeeded in crossing the Rhine in 1792 and reaching Frankfort, with the result that William retired in a panic to Cassel, greatly concerned about his crown treasures. With rage and indignation he read the French manifesto to the Hessian soldiers which urged them to forsake the "tyrant and tiger who sold their blood in order to fill his chest." The landgrave finally succeeded in driving the small French force out of Frankfort. This cost him a considerable sum of money but his loss was made good by a new subsidy contract under which he delivered 8,000 Hessian soldiers to England, which had joined the Coalition against France. Meyer Amschel Rothschild and his rivals were kept fully occupied in discounting the bills received from England in connection with this transaction.

When, in 1795, Prussia withdrew from the war against the French Republic, the Landgrave of Hesse followed her example. His ambition now was to have the comparatively modest title of landgrave changed, and to attain electoral rank. In the meantime he had been created a field-marshal of Prussia, and in 1796, when Napoleon's star was in the ascendant, relations between the two countries were particularly cordial. In spite, however, of the secession of Prussia and Hesse, England and Austria continued to carry on the war of the coalition with varying success. Whilst Bonaparte was victorious in Italy, the Archduke Karl gained a series of successes in the south of Germany. Frankfort had to suffer again from the vicissitudes of war; on July 13, 1796, it was actually bombarded by the French with the result that some of the houses in the Jewish quarter—156 buildings including the synagogue, most of which were inferior wooden structures—were set on fire.

The Rothschild house, which was one of the best-constructed buildings in the street, suffered only slight damage. In view of the time required to rebuild these houses a departure had to be made from the ghetto precinct, and the Jews had to be allowed to reside and trade outside the strictly defined boundary. The Rothschilds were among those who took advantage of this favorable opportunity, and transferred their merchandise business —they were dealing increasingly in war requirements such as cloth, foodstuffs, and wine—to the Schnur Gasse which lay near the center of the town, renting accommodation at a leather dealer's.

The military developments of the first coalition war, in which Meyer Amschel's princely customer at Cassel was actively engaged with varying fortunes, entailed considerably increased activity on the part of the various crown agents in the landgrave's service. Although the war had caused not a little damage to Frankfort[19] it had brought the town certain indirect advantages. The Frankfort Bourse benefited by the decline of the Amsterdam Bourse, which had hitherto held a dominating position, and which almost completely collapsed when the French conquered Holland in 1795. The result was that much more business came the way of the Frankfort bankers, and Meyer Amschel Rothschild's financial and trading business, which was closely associated with war requirements, increased by leaps and bounds.

The war profits realized at that time formed the real foundation of the enormous fortune that was later built up by the House of Rothschild. It was of course impossible any longer completely to conceal such large profits. Until 1794 the family property had for twenty years been assessed at the constant figure of only 2,000 gulden, and they had paid taxes in accordance with this "assessment," amounting to about thirteen gulden annually. Suddenly in the year 1795 this amount was doubled, and in the year after that Rothschild was included amongst those whose property was worth 15,000 gulden or more, that being the highest figure adopted for assessment purposes.

Meanwhile the three eldest sons had grown up, and after the age of twenty were associated with their father in the business to an increasing extent. Like their two eldest sisters they were placed in responsible positions and rendered active assistance to their father. A large family, which to so many people is a cause of worry and anxiety, was in this case a positive blessing as there was abundance of work for everybody. It made it unnecessary for Meyer Amschel to take strangers into his business and let them into the various secret and subtle moves of the game. Since the number of available children increased in proportion as the business expanded, it was possible to keep all the confidential positions in the family. The strong traditional community and family sense of the Jews, reenforced by persecution from outside, compelling them to unite in their own defense, did wonders. The two eldest sons had been zealously engaged in the business from boyhood, and their father wisely encouraged them by letting them share personally in the business, apart from the general family interest in its prosperity.

When the eldest daughter married, in 1795, the son-in-law Moses Worms was not employed in the business, but when the eldest son Amschel Meyer married in 1796, the daughter-in-law Eva Hanau was given a post.

In spite of the growing number of available members of the family, Meyer Amschel found it necessary also to engage bookkeepers with a knowledge of languages, as the Rothschild family at that time were all quite uneducated, speaking and writing only a bad kind of Frankfort Yiddish German, apart from Hebrew; and in view of their expanding connections with persons in the highest circles they had to pay particular attention to matters of epistolary style. As the only person he could find capable of carrying out this work, was a Christian girl, Rothschild did not hesitate to take her into the business.

It was at this period that Meyer Amschel entered into a highly elaborate deed of partnership with his two eldest sons, which provided that profits and losses should be divided between the three partners according to a definite scheme.

The growing demands upon the treasury arising out of the war served to develop the relations with the Landgrave of Hesse. After the separate Peace of Basel William of Hesse adopted the attitude of an impartial observer of the warlike activities in Europe, and occupied himself principally in the profitable administration of his extensive possessions. He was no stranger to the authentic delights of avarice. Great though his wealth was, his appetite for increasing it remained keen. He showed the greatest ingenuity in effecting savings of every kind, and spent all his spare time thinking out schemes for the profitable investment of the large cash resources which were accumulating in his treasury.

The ruling landgrave gradually became a banker to the whole world, advancing his money not only to princes and nobles, but also to small shopkeepers and Jews, and even to artizans, where he could get good interest. The amounts lent ranged from hundreds of thousands to a few thalers, according to the financial repute of his customers. Cobblers and tailors paid the same rate of interest for small advances as princes for heavy ones. The debts were all accurately registered in account books, making up an enormous number of volumes. If a banker wanted to borrow from him he had to deposit government securities with the landgrave. Thus his enormous fortune consisted of cash, jewels, art treasures and coins, as well as acknowledgments of sums lent and debenture certificates deposited as security.

The withdrawal in 1795 of Prussia and Hesse from the war against France had resulted in the temporary estrangement of the Austrian Emperor Francis; but he and the landgrave soon reestablished cordial relations, for each of them had need of the other. William desired support in the acquisition of territory, and in his efforts to attain the dignity of elector, while the emperor was sadly in lack of funds owing to the long war with France. The landgrave therefore asked the emperor's support in his aims; the emperor wrote on September 8, 1797,[20] to say that he appreciated the efforts which his cousin was making on his behalf, and was grateful to learn that the landgrave was sympathetic to his need for a loan. "I also believe," he wrote, "as it is my duty to do, in your sentiments of loyalty to me and to my house, of which I have received special proof in the matter of the loan that is being negotiated by Herr Kornrumpf. I flatter myself that your Highness will carry this through to my complete satisfaction. Your Highness may rest assured that for my part I sincerely wish to be of service to you also."

The details of such transactions were generally negotiated by Jewish agents, and although Meyer Amschel was not employed on this occasion, he was soon to serve as the middleman between the landgrave and the emperor.

This was made possible by the fact that Rothschild's wealth had increased rapidly during the last years of the war. Towards the end of the eighteenth century it cannot have been far short of a million gulden. The transfer of bills of exchange, cash payments, and the consignments of merchandise from England, the principal supply of the Frankfurter Platz, which in its turn, supplied the whole of Germany, made it necessary to appoint a representative on the other side of the Channel. As it was essential that any such representative should be a trustworthy person, the obvious thing was to appoint one of the live sons.

The two eldest, Amschel[21] and Solomon, who, in 1798, were twenty-five and twenty-four years old respectively, were thoroughly initiated into the Frankfort business. The third son, Nathan, a highly gifted young man of twenty-one, intensely industrious and with a very independent spirit, felt that his elder brothers did not give him sufficient scope. In spite of his youth, he too benefited by the wise arrangements of his father, and had his own personal share in the business and in the family property.

As the continental states, owing to war and revolution, produced much less, but consumed a great deal more than in normal times, English commercial travelers swarmed over the Continent of Europe and in 1798, one of them called at the Rothschilds' house of business, and was received by Nathan. English commercial travelers of that period were exceedingly conscious of the commercial and political supremacy of their country, and they were wont to adopt an arrogant manner, as they felt that the Continent was dependent upon their goods. The Englishman's manner annoyed Nathan Rothschild; and he met his arrogance with brusqueness, whereupon the foreigner took his departure.

This incident was the immediate cause that decided Nathan to propose to his father that he should go to England himself, in order to become a merchant there on his own account and also to represent the firm of Rothschild generally. His father and brothers did not show any opposition to the enterprising young man and supported his decision in every way. Nathan took as-much ready money with him as was practicable and the rest he had sent on after him; the capital which he brought with him to England amounted altogether to, a sum of about twenty thousand pounds or a quarter of a million gulden. About a fifth of this sum was his own money; the rest belonged to the business. The action of his father and brothers showed great confidence in this young man who did not even know the language of the country he was about to enter as a complete stranger. Their confidence was to be justified, for Nathan was destined to become the outstanding figure in the Roths-childd business.

This first branch establishment of the House of Rothschild resulted from the family relationships and the requirements of the trade with England, without any preconceived plan, and without the remotest idea of the importance of this step for the future of the business.

The Napoleonic epoch, which followed upon the French Revolution, was to be the occasion for the foundation of a second branch in Paris and for the first collaboration between the brothers Rothschild in Frankfort, London, and Paris.

CHAPTER II

The Rothschild Family During the Napoleonic Era

THE turn of the century coincided with an important part of the wars against the French Republic, arising out of the revolution. The Peace of Luneville, concluded in 1801, had set the seal on the brilliant Bonaparte's territorial victories, thereby giving France the leadership on land, while, however, England's preeminence at sea was confirmed. Although Bonaparte had overcome all his other enemies, he was bound to admit that sea-girt England had maintained its position. The Treaty of Amiens, which followed upon that of Luneville, merely marked a transition stage, and was bound to lead to a resumption of the struggle, until one of the two great opponents should lie bleeding on the ground.

This struggle was the predominant feature of the next fifteen years, and converted almost the whole of the mainland of Europe into a theater of war. The result was that innumerable substantial firms, banks, and private persons lost their property, while on the other hand persons possessing industry, energy, and resource, with a flair for turning opportunity to account, were enabled to gain riches and power.

At any rate within their own caste, the Rothschild family had at that time achieved a position in which their future was bound to be profoundly affected by political developments. As early as 1800 their father Meyer Amschel had been the tenth richest Jew in Frankfort; the only question was as to the attitude that the head of the business house and his sons would take in the stormy times that were to follow.

Numerous competitors were richer than they, or as rich, had better and older connections, and some had been received into the Christian Church and no longer suffered from the stigma of Judaism. The Rothschilds, on the other hand, had the advantage of a chief who was industrious, energetic, and reliable, and a man of intelligence. He had to help him four hard-working sons who were developing into first-rate business men under the guidance of their father. One of these, Solomon, had just married Caroline Stern, herself the prosperous daughter of a Frankfort tradesman, and had thus been enabled to found a home of his own. The third son Nathan was living in the camp of Napoleon's great enemy England. In hat country with its sea-power and its world-wide commerce, his undertakings were far better protected against Napoleonic interference than those of his father and brothers on the Continent. He was able to form a much more dispassionate judgment of the great events which followed so rapidly upon one another during those years, and was in a better position to turn them to account, Moreover, Nathan was the most enterprising of the five sons, of which fact his decision to go to England was itself an indication.

The commercial activities of the House of Rothschild in Frankfort itself were not limited to one branch of business. It took any chance of earning a profit, whether as commission or forwarding agents, or in the trade of wine and textiles, which had recently been declared free, and in silk and muslin, not to mention coins and antiquities. The wine business in particular expanded greatly; and Meyer Amschel did not fail to use every opportunity for extending his connections with princes and potentates even beyond the sphere of the Duke of Hesse. One of the most important connections established at Frankfort was that with the princely House of Thurn and Taxis, the head of which, Prince Karl Anselm, held the important position of hereditary postmaster in the Holy Roman Empire.

This family was of Milanese extraction; in Italy it was known as della Torre, in France as de la Tour. It had invented the idea of a post, and had introduced a postal system in the Tyrol, toward the end of the fifteenth century. In 1516 it was commissioned by the Emperor Maximilian I to inaugurate a mounted postal service between Vienna and Brussels. Even at that early date the dignified rank of postmaster general was conferred upon one of its members.

That was the starting point of the impressive development of the Thurn and Taxis postal system, which came to embrace the whole of Central Europe. The head offices of the system were at Frankfort, but the family were not satisfied with the normal development of their undertaking. They turned the information obtainable from the letters entrusted to their charge to profit.

The end of the eighteenth and the beginning of the nineteenth centuries saw the development of the practice of opening letters, noting the contents and then sending them on to their destinations. In order to retain the postal monopoly, the House of Thurn and Taxis offered to place the emperor in possession of the information derived from the so-called secret manipulation of letters. If, therefore, one were on good terms with the House one could easily and swiftly obtain news, and also dispatch it.

In the course of time Meyer Amschel had come to realize that it is of the greatest importance to the banker and merchant to have early and accurate information of important events, especially in time of war. As his native town was the headquarters of the postal and information service, he had had the foresight to get into touch with the House of Thurn and Taxis, and had transacted various financial matters to their great satisfaction. It was on this fact that he relied when he appealed to the fountainhead of the Imperial Postal Service at Frankfort, his Imperial Majesty himself.

In a petition to his Majesty that he and his sons should be granted the title of crown agent, Meyer Amschel brought forward precisely those matters from which he had derived the greatest profit, namely, his financial and commercial transactions in the war against France, and the services which he had rendered to the House of Thurn and Taxis. He had been honest and punctual in his business dealings, as those witnesses would testify who indorsed his petition.

The Roman-German Emperor, whose power at this time was practically limited to the granting of honors, did actually consent to grant Meyer Amschel the title of imperial crown agent by a patent dated January 29, 1800. Not only was this a passport to him throughout the whole of the Roman Empire in Germany; it also carried the right to bear arms, and liberated him from several of the taxes and obligations laid upon the Jews of that period, The patent and the title were signed and granted by Francis II, simply as Roman-German Emperor, and had nothing to do with Austria or Austrian Government departments. It was not until much later that the brothers Rothschild entered into actual relations with Austria and her statesmen. Even as late as 1795, when the Landgrave of Hesse lent the Emperor Francis a million gulden, and in 1798 when he lent him an additional half-million, other bankers conducted the transaction, the Rothschilds having nothing whatever to do with it.

The dispensations enumerated in the imperial patent were more or less paper ones, since most of the smaller or greater territorial princes, of whom there was such a plenitude in Germany in 1800, applied their own laws and regulations. This, however, was a minor consideration with Meyer Amschel; the important point was that the new title "imperial crown agent" sounded much better than Hessian Landgraviate, and was likely to attract a number of other titles. Prince von Ysenburg and the German Order of St. John both conferred upon him court titles in recognition of loans of money from the principality, negotiated by Meyer Amschel. In 1804 Rothschild requested the Prince of Thurn and Taxis to bestow a similar favor upon one of his sons, in view of the fact that he himself bore the title of imperial crown agent.

It was characteristic that when asking the emperor for a title he should mention the services rendered to the House of Taxis, and that when he applied for a favor to that house he should have based his claim on the fact that his services had been recognized by the emperor. Such promotions were necessarily of service to him, too, in his relations with his old patron the Landgrave of Hesse, who in spite of everything was still inclined to be suspicious.

William of Hesse was in every way a most important person to Meyer Amschel, for he was colossally rich, richer than the emperor himself, and—a much more important point in those days than now—he was close at hand. Moreover, he had family ties with England., where Nathan was living, and with chronically penurious Denmark, by lending money to which the firm of Riippell and Harnier, as well as that of Bethmann, had made great profits.

Meyer Amschel advised the landgrave to participate in this loan by buying stock. He did purchase a small amount, Rothschild being commissioned to carry through the transaction. This was done to the landgrave's satisfaction; but Meyer Amschel required a considerable sum of ready money in order to take advantage of a favorable opportunity for purchasing goods and bills of exchange. Knowing that the landgrave, whose investments in England as well as in Germany brought in very good returns, had spare cash available, he asked, and obtained from him on two occasions—in November, 1801, and July, 1802—160,000 thalers and 200,000 gulden as a guaranteed loan, the securities being Danish and Frankfort debentures.

Although the security offered was exceptionally good,

William of Hesse was persuaded to lend the money only after pressure had been brought to bear, and on the special recommendation of his principal financial administrator Buderus. The transaction certainly marked a distinct advance in Rothschild's confidential relations with the landgrave.

The second amount was wanted, not merely for Meyer Amschel himself, but also to assist his two eldest sons, who were already beginning to acquire the titles of court appointments wherever they could. As early as 1801 they were appointed official agents for making war payments on behalf of the State of Hesse.

Meyer Amschel had been enviously observing Ruppell and Harnier's financial transactions with Denmark. It was his ambition to do similar business with Denmark, with landgraviate moneys, on his own account, independently of any other firm. He still lacked any large capital sum, such as others had available, but he was accurately informed by Buderus of the large amount of ready money in the possession of the ruler of Hesse, which was seeking investment. He was determined to put his competitors out of the field by offering the prince better terms. The Frankfort firms were accustomed to wait until orders came to them, but he meant to get in and negotiate personally. He had put through the secured loans at Cassel personally; and he decided to go there again in order to secure the cooperation of William's counselors with Buderus at their head, so that they might make the landgrave disinclined to negotiate direct with Denmark. An important point was that Denmark was not to know where the money came from, because William did not with to be regarded as wealthy in his family circle, as he was afraid that some of them might ask for special favors, For this reason it was decided that a go-between who had relations with Buderus, and through him with Rothschild too, and who lived in Hamburg, which was conveniently near to Denmark, and far enough away from Hesse to allay suspicion, should be the first person to make approaches to that country. This was a Jewish banker called Lawaetz.

Moreover, on Rothschild's own suggestion, and contrary to the usual practice, the loan was to run over a long period. Notice for repayment was not to be given for ten years or more, and after that period payment could be demanded only in quite small instalments, over a period of twenty or thirty years. They did actually succeed in securing William of Hesse's consent to granting such a loan; and no sooner were the conditions agreed than Lawaetz showed his hand to the extent of making the interest payable to Meyer Amschel Rothschild at Frankfort.

"The lender," the Hamburg banker wrote to Denmark, "is an exceedingly rich capitalist, and exceptionally friendly to the Danish Court. It is possible that even greater sums and better conditions may be obtainable from him."[1] It is true that Lawaetz did not know Rothschild personally at this time.

The successful conclusion in September, 1803, of this, the first loan which he had carried through privately, not only brought Meyer Amschel financial profit, but also resulted in his obtaining the title of crown agent to the Court of Hesse. His rivals had been highly displeased to hear of this loan, and kept making representations of a nature calculated to damage Rothschild, to the landgrave. Ruppell and Harnier were particularly assiduous. They drew attention to the fact that the last Danish loan had been issued in the form of debentures, in the name of Rothschild; and in order to rouse Danish national vanity they stressed the idea that this suggested that "it was not the national credit of Denmark but merely the Jewish name of Rothschild that had got these obligations accepted in Hesse."[2]

Rothschild's fight with his rivals involved the officials entrusted with the financial administration of the land-graviate in the struggle. Buderus became increasingly a partizan of Rothschild, whereas Lennep of the War Office took the side of Riippell and Harnier. Rothschild and Buderus, however, had the upper hand for the time being, and by 1806 no less than seven landgraviate loans were issued. The profit realized from this transaction served to key up still further the hatred and enmity of the rival firms and of Lennep, and led to awkward developments.

Rothschild had shown the greatest energy in these undertakings. He did not even spare himself the journey to Hamburg, an exceedingly difficult one at that time, in order to get into personal touch with the banker, Lawaetz, and to see that the Danish business was carried on as energetically as possible.

A letter[3] from the Hamburg banker to Buderus contains the following statement: "The Crown Agent Rothschild is coming to see me tomorrow in order to settle up our remaining accounts, and he intends to return the day after. It has been a pleasure to me to make the acquaintance of this man, and I shall be glad to be able to do him any service in future."

The intrigues of the rivals, however, did not wholly fail of their effect upon William of Hesse. His attitude continued to be suspicious, and he several times refused to have anything to do with other business propositions suggested by Rothschild, agreeing to them only as the result of much pleading and persuasion. Besides the Danish loans, loans were issued for Hesse-Darmstadt and the Order of St. John, these also being subscribed by landgraviate funds through the intermediary of Rothschild. The sums involved were already considerable, running into hundreds of thousands.

The larger they were, the better pleased was Meyer Amschel, because his percentage profit rose in proportion, while the risk was borne, not by him but by the landgrave, whose favorite occupation had always been the careful administration and development of his property. The sums invested in England called for particular attention. Since the Peace of Basel, relations between Hesse and England had been rather strained, although they were not likely to become critical, as the landgrave had cleverly succeeded in enlisting the interests of responsible people on his side. He had lent the Prince of Wales, afterwards King George IV, about £200,000 in two instalments. The dukes of York and Clarence were guarantors of this loan, but they also borrowed money from the landgrave. In addition to this, William of Hesse had put out £640,000 at interest in London in various ways, a fact which was to prove exceedingly useful to him.

The example of their patron was a lesson to the House of Rothschild, and they soon learned to copy his wise practice of lending money by preference to persons in the highest position. Even though William of Hesse remained neutral in the second War of the Coalition, he secretly wished success to the enemies of Prance for he eagerly hoped for the resumption of his profitable subsidy contracts with England.

The Peace of Luneville, which extended France's boundaries to the Rhine, also conferred on William the dignity of elector, which he had so much desired, and which was duly proclaimed in 1803; but the meteoric rise of Bonaparte and revolutionary France's position in the world seemed to him to be unnatural and menacing. His friendship with Prussia was rather shattered, because that state had succeeded in annexing considerable territory, but had left the Hessian prince in the cold.

The peace between France and England did not last long. As early as May, 1803, the Island Kingdom again declared war upon the usurper in Paris. It was not long before William of Hesse was forced to take an attitude toward the new world situation. In October, 1803, the French, having invaded English Hanover, tried to get money from the elector in exchange for Hanoverian territory. His fear of offending England caused him to refuse this offer, and thus the elector first gave offense to the Corsican.

Ge had no true idea at the time how dangerous the Corsican might be. The quiet times for Frankfort and Hesse were now at an end. Stirred up by Napoleon's powerful genius Europe passed from one crisis to another, and in such circumstances it was exceedingly difficult for William of Hesse to administer his enormous property with foresight and wisdom. He felt the need more and more of Meyer Amschel's advice, so that Rothschild's journeys to Cassel became more and more frequent. His eldest son had for some months been residing permanently in that town.

The preference shown to the Frankfort family aroused the envy and hatred of the Cassel Jews against this outsider. They complained that not merely did he steal their best business, but he was not even subject to the night-rate and poll-tax which other Jews had to pay. Meyer Amschel did his utmost to evade such payments as far as possible, but in the end he was forced to pay some of these taxes.

In August, 1803, he found it necessary to apply to the elector for a letter of protection in Cassel for himself and his sons, so that, although resident in Frankfort, he should enjoy the same rights as the protected Jews of Cassel. This would certainly entail obligations as well. His request was granted on payment of 400 reichsthaler, but the document was not completed, possibly in accordance with Meyer Amschel's own wishes, for he would then have been liable to pay taxes in Cassel also.

The Cassel Jews, however, soon got wind of this maneuver, and in the end Meyer Amschel was required to state in whose name he wished the letter of protection made out, whereupon he wrote the following letter to the elector:[4]

Most gracious Elector, most excellent Prince and Lord!

Your Excellency has most graciously deigned to grant that in return for the payment of 100 florins I should be exempt from night-rate, and that on the payment of 400 florins one of my sons or I should be admitted to protection.

I am now required to state in whose name the letter of protection should be made out, and this is causing me great difficulty, since the son for whom I had intended taking it out has been settled for some time with another of my sons in London, and is engaged in doing business with him there.

I have therefore decided to take out the protection for myself, if I may be most graciously permitted to pay an annual amount similar to that paid by other Jews not residing in the town ... as I only do business here, and could do most of it quite as well from another place; as I have now held the office of Crown Agent for over forty years, your Electoral Highness having even in my youth shown me such gracious condescension, so I hope now, too, to receive your most gracious consent, and remain with deepest respect, your Electoral Highness

My most gracious Prince and Lord's most obedient servant,
MEYER AMSCHEL ROTHSCHILD.
Cassel, 21st April 1805.

This personal request, sent in by Meyer Rothschild in rather inferior German, provoked a certain amount of amusement at the electoral court. Meyer Amschel was informed that his request could not be granted unless he moved to Cassel with all his property; and that naturally he was not prepared to do. In the end the letter of protection was made out in the name of Amschel Meyer Rothschild, his eldest son.

Although Meyer Amschel had to fight for his position in Cassel, his prestige at Frankfort rose, on account of his connection with the Hessian ruler, which was now becoming generally known. This was made manifest in various ways. When shops were put up to auction in the electoral courtyard, to which Jews, even resident Jews, were not admitted, an exception was made in favor of Meyer Amschel. One of the shops was definitely excluded from the auction and reserved for Rothschild. It is possible that ready money was a factor, as well as his prestige in this matter.

This period saw the conclusion of the two last, and by far the most substantial Danish loans, of 700,000 and 600,000 thalers. In these transactions too, Lawaetz played a part of some importance. In spite of very friendly business relations, he was still somewhat reserved in his attitude toward the Rothschild family. Whilst in talking to his friends he often declared that he had found[5] "Herr Rothschild always to be exceedingly prompt and businesslike and worthy of the most complete confidence," yet he felt that where such large amounts were at stake, one ought to be very cautious, even in dealing with Rothschild. The atmosphere then was full of suspicion, all the more so because the political barometer in Europe pointed to stormy times, and the capitalists were exceedingly uneasy as to the possible fate of their wealth.

Bonaparte had already cast aside his mask and was boldly grasping at the imperial purple; toward the end of the summer of 1804 the whole of France was echoing with the shout "Vive l'Empereur!" The prestige of the German imperial system was suffering a corresponding decline, an obvious symptom of which was the proclamation on August 10, 1804, of Francis II as Emperor of Austria.

Moreover, September, 1804, already saw Napoleon touring the newly won Rhine provinces. He appeared in full splendor and magnificence at Aix-la-Chapelle and Mainz as if he were indeed the successor of Charles the Great. It was on this occasion that, with the assistance of the Mainz Electoral High Chancellor, Dalberg, he laid the foundations of that union of German princes which was to be known as the Confederation of the Rhine.

Napoleon was already adopting the role of their protector, and invited William of Hesse, too, to Mainz, an invitation which was exceedingly suggestive of a command to come and do homage. The elector pleaded a sudden attack, of gout. Napoleon replied coldly; he was still polite, but he swore that William should pay for having failed immediately to adhere to the confederation which was being formed under Napoleon's protection. The French ambassador at Cassel had uttered the menacing words, when he heard that the prince was not going to Mainz, "On n'oublie pas, on n'oublie rien!"[6]

The Elector of Hesse was left feeling rather uncomfortable, and he secretly threw out cautious feelers toward England and Austria—Austria was already showing a marked inclination to side against France. The occasion of the Emperor Francis' assuming the imperial title connected with his Austrian hereditary territories, afforded him an opportunity of expressing his most sincere and devoted good wishes to the "most excellent, puissant, and invincible Roman Emperor and most gracious Lord[7] for the continuous welfare of the sacred person of his Imperial Majesty and for the ever-increasing glory of the all-highest Imperial House."

His pen was jogged by the need he felt for powerful support, and incidentally the letter was to serve the purpose of reminding the emperor of a request which the writer had made on November 22, 1804, and which so far had not been granted. The elector's first favorite, the apothecary's daughter Ritter, whom the emperor had raised to the rank of Frau von Lindenthal, and who was ancestress of the Haynaus, was now out of favor, since she had preferred a young subaltern to the aged landgrave. For over a year her place had been occupied by Caroline von Schlotheim, the beautiful daughter of a Russian officer whom the emperor had been asked to create Countess von Hessenstein.

In May, 1805, Austria finally joined the coalition against Napoleon. Napoleon gave up his idea of landing in the British Isles, and concentrated on Austria. This resulted in great shortage of money, for the Austrian Treasury had heavy burdens to bear from former wars; coin was scarce and paper money much depreciated. It was herefore decided that the interest on loans should not, as had hitherto been the practice, be payable in hard cash in all the principal exchanges in Europe, but should be payable in paper in Vienna only. This was hard for the elector personally, as he had advanced a million and a half gulden to the Emperor Francis; and he at once begged that an exception might be made in his favor since "ill-disposed persons had suggested to him that the Austrian state was going to go bankrupt, as far as all external debts were concerned."[8]

The imperial ambassador Baron von Wessenberg, naturally wishing to turn the general situation to account, sent this request forward under cover of a private dispatch of his own in which he wrote: "Since avarice is the elector's great weakness, it might be possible, should you wish to do so, to obtain a still greater loan from him if you agreed that interest in future should be payable in cash. He would be more likely to fall in with such a suggestion if his Imperial Majesty would grant Frau von Schlotheim the title of Countess of Hessenstein, without payment. The granting of this request would particularly delight the elector."[9]

In the second particular his wishes were granted, but it was not possible to make an exception in the matter of the interest charges. However, both Vienna and London endeavored to secure the elector's accession to the confederation, and he replied to these overtures with demands for subsidies. Yet he was hard put to it to find investments for all the money that he had at his disposal, and as late as December 2, 1805, he had lent ten million thalers to Prussia. He had hoped that the Austro-Russo-English war against Napoleon would end in victory; but Austerlitz put a speedy end to such hopes.

During the war, England sent financial assistance to Austria in the shape of a monthly payment of a third of a million pounds in cash, which was sent to Austria by the most difficult and circuitous routes. The Rothschild method of transferring large sums of money was as yet unknown, and the only method in use was the dangerous one of sending actual bullion by road. A consignment of money was actually on the way when Austerlitz was being fought, and, in fear of a defeat, orders were issued from imperial headquarters instructing this consignment to be diverted in a wide circuit through Galicia and the Carpathians.

The war complications in which Europe was involved forced almost all states, whether they wished to or not, to take sides. The Elector of Hesse characteristically wished to attach himself to that party out of which he could make the greatest profit. As Prussia was now also being drawn into conflict with Napoleon, she attempted to draw the elector in on her side. On the other hand, the French Court gave him to understand that substantial advantages would be gained by the electorate if he kept himself completely free from Prussian influence. This suggestion was unpleasantly underlined by the gathering of bodies of French troops in the neighborhood of Hesse.

The elector bargained with everybody and secured from Paris accessions of territory and the incorporation of the town of Frankfort within his domains. The only awkward point was that Napoleon demanded that the British ambassador, through whom the subsidy arrangements were carried on, should be sent home; and when the elector delayed about doing this, Napoleon expressed his displeasure in no uncertain language, until the elector gave way, and sent the ambassador away.

Annoyed at France's threatening attitude the Hessian ruler again endeavored to attach himself to Prussia. Then, on July 12, 1806, the document regarding the Confederation of the Rhine was published, through which Napoleon, with the assistance of Prince Theodor von Dalberg, Electoral High Chancellor, won sixteen German states by promising them separation from the German Empire.

As a counterblast to this, Prussia attempted to bring ahout a union of the princes of Northern Germany, and to gain the support of the Elector of Hesse by offering him the prospect of an accession of territory and the dignity of kingship which he so much desired. These moves were followed by threats and promises on the side of France. The attitude of the elector remained undefined. He now thought it best to preserve the appearance of neutrality until the actual outbreak of war, and then simply to join the side which was winning, although a signed, if not ratified, treaty with Prussia was in existence.

He had, however, not reckoned sufficiently with the forceful personality of Napoleon. It was impossible to conduct a nebulous diplomacy with such a man. He had long been tired of the vacillating attitude of Hesse. A state of war was declared in early October, 1806. On the 14th of that month, Prussia was decisively beaten through Napoleon's lightning advance at Jena and Auerstedt. Napoleon now scorned Hessian "neutrality." He ordered that Cassel and Hesse should be occupied, and that unless the elector and the crown prince left they should be made prisoners of war as Prussian field-marshals. "You will," commanded Napoleon, "seal up all treasuries and stores and appoint General Lagrange as governor of the country. You will raise taxes and pronounce judgments in my name. Secrecy and speed will be the means through which you will insure complete success. My object is to remove the House of Hcsse-Cassel from rulership and to strike it out of the list of powers."[10]

At Frankfort, Meyer Amschel Rothschild had been watching the precipitate development of events with terror; and his son Amschel, at Cassel, as well as he himself at Frankfort, took all possible measures to prevent themselves and the elector from suffering too great financial loss. Business had just been going so exceedingly well. The firm of Bethmann, which had felt that it was being driven into the background, and had just been making strenuous efforts to get a share in the elector's loan business with Denmark, was forced to withdraw from the contest, on account of the political conditions and the resulting shortage of money, and thereby left the way open to Rothschild, who still had resources available.

In the meantime Lawaetz in Hamburg had definitely decided in Rothschild's favor. On July 2, 1806, he wrote himself to Buderus[11] to say that he would stand by their good friend Rothschild as far as he could, saying: "I hope that in the end people will realize that he is a good fellow who deserves to be respected; the envious may say what they like against him."

In spite of all that Rothschild had hitherto done in the service of the elector, he had not won his confidence to the extent of being called in in a matter which had become pressing on account of the developing military situation; for although the elector continued to hope that the notices naively posted on the roads leading to Hesse, bearing the words "Pays Neutre" would be respected, he was sufficiently concerned for the safety of his treasures to send away and conceal his more valuable possessions. But it was no light task to deal with the extensive banking accounts of the electoral loan office, and with his vast accumulations of treasure, and after several months the work was still far from complete.

There being no distinction between the treasury and the prince's private purse, it was necessary to get out of the way, not only his own valuables, but also the cabinet, war and chancery cash records, for a period covering several decades; for so the books of his financial administration were called, in order to make it impossible to examine into the state of his affairs. There were large volumes of these records, representing vast sums; in the war chest alone there was over twenty-one million thalers, sixteen millions of which were out on loan in various places, and bringing in interest to the tune of many thousands of thalers. All this had to be concealed as far as possible, and this business was done by trusty officials, under the guidance of Buderus. But there is nothing to show that any of the Rothschilds were employed in the long-continued work of transport and concealment.

Time was pressing; some of the things were sent to Denmark; but it was impossible to get everything out of the country, and to have done so would have attracted too much attention. So the elector, who gave the closest personal attention to the plans for insuring the safety of his possessions, decided that the most precious articles should be buried within the walls of three of his castles. Under the stairs of the castle of Wilhelmshohe were hidden twenty-four chests, containing silver and mortgage documents to the value of one and a half million gulden, amongst which were certain Rothschild debentures, while twenty-four chests with cash vouchers and certain valuable volumes from the library were concealed in the walls under the roof. A similar number of chests were concealed in the picturesque castle of Lowenburg, built in the Wilhelmshohe park, while further treasures were conveyed in forty-seven chests to the Sababurg, situated in a remote forest.

The elector had originally intended to send the last consignment down the Weser to England, but he and the shipowner disagreed over a matter of fifty thalers and so they were not sent away. It was impossible to carry through such measures in secrecy, as too many persons were involved in the transaction; and long before the French invaded the country, there was general alarm throughout the district, because the elector was said to be hiding all his treasures.

Meanwhile Napoleon's commands were being carried out. French troops, coming from Frankfort, were already encamped on the night of October 31 on the heights surrounding Cassel. The elector gazed anxiously from the windows of his castle at the enemy's camp-fires, and sent adjutant after adjutant to Mortier, the French marshal. In due course the French envoy was announced, and brought an ultimatum from Napoleon, significantly addressed: "To the Elector of Hesse-Cassel, Field-Marshal in the service of Prussia."

In short, biting sentences William's double game was exposed, and the occupation of the country and the disarmament of its inhabitants was proclaimed. The elector immediately decided to throw in his lot with Napoleon and to join the Confederation of the Rhine. But it was too late; Marshal Mortier would no longer listen to the elector's messengers. The elector realized that there was nothing for him but flight.

In the few hours before the French entered the country he would have to move as many of his remaining possessions as he could, and make the more urgent dispositions regarding outstanding accounts. William gave Buderus power of attorney to receive the interest payments due from the Emperor Francis in Vienna; and Buderus transferred this power of attorney to Rothschild, who proceeded to collect these payments for the elector, through a business friend in Vienna, the banker Frank.

Besides this, Buderus that night brought two chests containing securities and statements of accounts to the house of the Austrian ambassador at Cassel, Baron von Wessenberg, and begged him to take charge of them. In addition, a member of the elector's bodyguard roused the ambassador in the middle of the night[12] to give him five envelops containing one and a half million thalers in valid bills of exchange and coupons, as well as the elector's compromising correspondence with Prussia and England. He also gave him a casket of jewels, requesting that the ambassador deal with these things as he would for a friend.

Baron von Wessenberg felt extremely uncomfortable; his position as ambassador of a neutral power was being seriously compromised, but he was fortunately able to entrust the money to a chamberlain of his acquaintance, who was traveling to Hanover that night. The letters, however, were of such a compromising nature that he burned them in terror. He had dealt with everything excepting the jewels, when the trumpets and marching songs of the French invading troops were heard in the morning. A few minutes earlier the elector had left the town with his son in a traveling coach and six. After having been held up by French troops at one gate, he escaped by another, and drove without stopping through Hameln and Altona, to Rendsburg in Schleswig.

Having entered Cassel, Marshal Mortier immediately began to carry out all Napoleon's instructions, and also commandeered all the electoral moneys and possessions, even including the stables and the court furniture. He took over the electoral rooms in the castle for his own personal use, and the electoral flunkeys as his personal servants. He did not molest the elector's consort, and Wessenberg succeeded in sending her the jewels, which she sewed into her garments and those of her servants.

Buderus felt that things might get rather warm for him, and he left Cassel disguised as an apprentice, with a knapsack on his back, to follow his master into exile.[13] His despairing family stayed behind.

While these events were taking place, neither Meyer Amschel Rothschild nor either of his sons seems to have been at Cassel.[14] They had long realized that the attitude of the French toward the elector was critical, and that their relations with him might get them into trouble. Frankfort, too, had been occupied by the French, and the headquarters of the firm, their house and their whole property, were at the mercy of the enemy.

In his heart Meyer Amschel remained loyal to the elector, and saw that the position arising out of the French invasion and the flight of the elector was one in which he could still be of great service to him. He presumably came quite rightly to the conclusion, that it was in the elector's own interest that he should stay away at this critical period, so that he might, if possible, carry on the elector's business behind the backs of the French. In following his natural inclinations, and not compromising himself in the eyes of the French, and in keeping out of the way of these dangerous companions as far as possible, he was also following the course of the greatest practical utility.

Even if Meyer Amschel or one of his sons had actually been in Cassel, the moneys entrusted to Baron von Wessenberg would not have been placed in their keeping. They were, as yet, far from enjoying such a degree of confidence; indeed, the ambassador actually stated in his report to Vienna at the time that the elector had sent the things to him "because of lack of confidence in his business agents."

The French immediately instituted investigations to discover where the elector had hidden his wealth. Napoleon had received news at Berlin of the occurrences at Cassel. At four o'clock on the morning of November 5, 1806, he sent the following orders to Lagrange: "Have all the artillery, ordnance stores, furniture, statues and other articles in the palace of the court brought to Mainz. Proclaim that this prince may no longer rule. I shall not continue to suffer a hostile prince on my boundaries, especially one who is practically a Prussian, not to say an Englishman, and who sells his subjects. You must completely disarm the inhabitants, and authorize an intendant to seize the prince's revenue. In general you may treat the country mercifully, but if there is any sign of insurrection anywhere, you must make a terrible example. ... Let yourself be guided by the principle that I wish to see the House of Hesse, whose existence on the Rhine cannot be reconciled with the safety of France, permanently removed from power."[15]

Such were Napoleon's feelings toward the elector. The latter sent messenger after messenger, and letter upon letter to Napoleon, but the emperor refused to answer. On the 1st of November, 1806, William of Hesse arrived at his destination, the castle at Gottorp, near Schleswig, belonging to his brother, who had also married a Danish princess. A whole crowd of exile princelings from small German states was gathered there. They had all been suddenly wrenched from a comfortable and careless existence, and were suffering acutely, especially from financial distress.

"We are in the greatest misery here," wrote Buderus to London,[16] on November 17, 1806. "Please help us to get some money soon, because we do not know what we shall do otherwise, as we are not getting a farthing from Cassel. God, how things have changed!" Meanwhile the French occupied Hamburg and advanced unpleasantly close to the elector's place of refuge. He became exceedingly nervous and excited, and feared that he might yet fall into the hands of the French, with all the belongings that he had rescued; his possessions were all packed in chests, ready for further transport. He once got into such a state of panic that he wanted to send Buderus straight off into the blue with as many valuables and securities as possible, leaving it to him to make such provision as he could for their safe custody. However, the outlook became less menacing; the French did yet come to Schleswig for the time being, and the elector gradually recovered his composure.

Meanwhile Lagrange was ruthlessly executing Napoleon's severe commands at Cassel. Even Wessenberg, suspected of concealing electoral treasure, was placed temporarily under arrest. Gradually all the treasures that had been concealed in the castle, including the gold and silver plate, the antiques, the whole collection of coins and medals to which Rothschild had contributed so many valuable specimens, and also the innumerable chests containing deeds and securities, were discovered. The elector might well regret that for the sake of fifty thalers, he had failed to have the silver carried down the river. All his splendid silver was sent to Mainz to be melted down.

Dazzled by the vast extent of the riches that were being brought to light, Lagrange was moved to take steps to feather his own nest. Although his imperial master well knew that the elector was rich, he could hardly expect his wealth to be as extensive as actually proved to be the case.

Lagrange reported to Napoleon that the property discovered was only worth eleven million thalers, which of course was not remotely in accordance with the facts; and in return for a douceur of 260,000 francs in cash, he returned to the Hessian officials forty-two of the chests, including almost all those that contained securities and title-deeds. Running great dangers, a brave electoral captain brought the chests into safety, and conveyed nineteen of them to Frankfort, where they were stored, not with Meyer Amschel Rothschild, but in the warehouse of Preye and Jordis, in whose extensive vaults they could be concealed without attracting attention.

For an additional 800,000 livres* paid to himself and the intendant, the dishonest governor promised to return other papers too, and not to'carry out any further investigation. Thereby countless chests Were released, which were distributed amongst various trusted persons, for safekeeping. Four of these chests, containing papers of the Privy Council, found their way to Meyer Amschel Rothschild's house with the green shield in the Jewish quarter, during the Spring Fair of 1807. This was the only part played by the House of Rothschild in the actual saving of the electoral treasures.

* One livre equaled one franc; four francs were the equivalent of one thaler.

Meyer Amschel Rothschild hid these chests, having left one of them for a time with his son-in-law Moses Worms, in the cellar of his house. In case of emergency he could have recourse to a separate cellar behind the house and under the courtyard, the approach to this cellar from the house cellar being very easy to conceal. The courtyard cellar, too, was connected by a secret passage with the neighboring house. The persecution of the Frankfort Jews in earlier times, had led to many such secret refuges being constructed. In this case it was therefore reasonable to assume that if the house were searched by foreigners like the French, the cellar under the courtyard would not be discovered at all, and that even if it were discovered there was a good chance of getting its contents into the next house.

In the meantime political changes had occurred which put and end to the political independence of Frankfort. Karl von Dalberg, who had collaborated with Talleyrand in the creation of the Confederation of the Rhine, was nominated Primate of the Confederation on June 12, 1806, and by a decree of Napoleon was granted the city of Frankfort and the surrounding territory as his residence.

This was a fact of much importance, both to the elector and to his devoted servants the Rothschild family, for Dalberg was particularly well-disposed to the elector and to his administrator Buderus, on account of his business dealings with them in earlier times; and, although he was an archbishop and a strict Catholic, he was known to be tolerant in his religious views. The incorporation of Frankfort in the Confederation of the Rhine put an end to its constitution as a state of the empire; and the Jews, who had hitherto been subjected to oppression by the hostile patrician families who had controlled the senate, now hoped for the abolition of all those restrictions, prohibitions and special laws under which they had suffered for centuries.

Under the new regime life in the great commercial city took on an entirely different complexion. It had to be ordered in accordance with the wishes, or rather the commands, of the French. This was especially the case when Napoleon, in order to deal a deadly blow at the arch enemy England, declared the continental blockade whereby all commerce and communication by letter or otherwise with England was prohibited. As that country was practically the only emporium for such indispensable colonial produce as coffee, sugar, and tobacco. the prices of these articles rose enormously, and a clever merchant could make large profits through timely purchases or by smuggling goods through Holland and the harbors of North Germany.

In spite of the control exercised by France over the trade of Frankfort, Meyer Amschel and his son contrived, with the assistance of Nathan in England, to make a good deal of money in this way. There were certainly risks attached to this form of commerce, for under Article 5 of the continental blockade, all goods of English origin were declared lawful prize. With the passage of time this kind of business became more restricted, for as Napoleon's power increased he was able to make the control more effective.

Meyer Amschel well knew that in spite of his flight and the loss of property which he had suffered at the hands of the French, the elector was still in possession of very considerable resources. There was, moreover, always the possibility of a sudden change in Napoleon's fantastic career, and such an event would immediately alter the whole situation. He therefore adhered to his policy of ingratiating himself to the best of his ability with Napoleon's nominee, the new lord of Frankfort, whil he continued faithfully to serve the elector in secret. For his purpose it was necessary that he should remain in constant communication with him.

On the 15th of December, 1806, Meyer Amschel sent an account[17] to Schleswig of his earlier sales of London bills of exchange, and reported that the other bills which he held were unsalable at the moment. Although the "servile script" was full of protestations of groveling humility, and was composed in the illiterate style and full of the spelling mistakes of the old Meyer Amschel, it revealed a certain pride, for Father Rothschild made considerable play with the good relations which he had established with Dalberg.

Rothschild reported with pride that he had influenced Dalberg in favor of the elector, and had induced the new lord of Frankfort to intercede with the Emperor and Empress of France on the elector's behalf. He begged to state, however, that Dalberg advised that the elector should not stand so much upon his rights, but should adopt towards Napoleon the attitude of a "humble petitioner." Meyer Amschel concluded by assuring the elector of his unswerving loyalty and devotion, and declared that he hoped, through his influence with Dalberg, substantially to reduce the war contribution of one million, three hundred thousand thalers imposed by Napoleon upon the elector personally. He also asserted that Dalberg had commended him to all the French marshals and ministers.

Although this letter of Meyer Amschel's was written in a boastful vein, and although he exaggerated his influence, as in point of fact he did not succeed in getting the levy reduced (incidentally, the elector got the levy transferred to the estates of the realm of Hesse), yet the report contained an element of truth. It was certainly most remarkable that the Archbishop and Lord of the Confederation of the Rhine, who ruled over sixteen German princes, and stood so high in Napoleon's favor, should have shown so much good-will to the Jew Meyer Amschel Rothschild of Frankfort, who, although now a rich man, had no claim to move in high and influential circles. There appear to have been financial reasons for this relationship, and it no doubt originated in loans granted by Rothschild.

When the elector had come to feel reasonably secure in his new place of refuge in Schleswig, he devoted himself again to his favorite hobby, and tried to set in order his chaotic possessions. Buderus had control of this work at every point. He had left Schleswig some time before and returned to Hanau, where he was occupied in calling in debts due to the elector, before they could accrue to the French. There was, for instance, the claim on Prince von Zeil-Wurzach, which was in great danger of being lost. Buderus, however, succeeded in saving this item, and in his report he referred with emphasis to the assistance granted by Rothschild, mentioning his name repeatedly.

"I owe it entirely to the efforts of the Crown Agent Rothschild," he wrote to his master on March 8, 1807, "that I am still not entirely without hope; and he has undertaken to arrange an interview between myself and the Wurzach chancellor in a place which he will select." [18]

The eldest son of the princely debtor attended this conference himself, and it resulted in the repayment to Buderus of the outstanding amount, which Buderus ascribed to the fact that Rothschild had used his influence to such good effect with the advisers and officials of the prince. He added, as especially illustrating Rothschild's trustworthiness, that the French in Cassel had offered to pay Rothschild twenty to twenty-five per cent of the amount at issue, if he would assist in diverting this debt of nine thousand gulden in accordance with Napoleon's orders.

"Your Electoral Highness," the letter continued, "may certainly deign most graciously to realize, the labor involved in saving this amount in the most dangerous circumstances." Besides Buderus, Lennep at Cassel, Lawaetz at Hamburg, and the war commissioners, paymasters and crown agents such as Meyer Amschel and his sons were looking after the financial interests of the elector. "Frankfort is the center point of all my business," Buderus, who directed all the operations, wrote to the elector.[19]

To an ever-increasing degree Buderus was entrusting the elector's business to the Rothschild family; indeed he was now employing them almost exclusively. They looked fter the correspondence with Cassel, with the elector, and with Lawaetz at Hamburg, pseudonyms being employed for the more important persons and transactions. Thus the elector was known as "the principal" or "Herr von Goldstein." The stocks in England were known as "stockfish";[20] Rothschild himself was called "Arnoldi" in these letters. Meyer Amschel was often sent to the elector by Buderus to convey accounts or other information. These seven-day journeys in bad coaches over rough roads, with the constant risk of falling into the hands of the enemy, with the letters with which he had been entrusted, came to be felt as exceedingly burdensome by Meyer Amschel in the course of time. He was not more than sixty-four years old but his health had latterly suffered from the extraordinary demands made upon the chief of the extensive business house. Henceforward he generally left these jouneys s to the north to his son Kallmann (or Carl), as his two eldest sons, Amschel and Solomon, were fully occupied at the head office in Frankfort. These journeys had now to be very frequently undertaken, because Napoleon had entered upon a definite offensive against the elector's property; and this called for counter-measures of all kinds, from the elector's loyal adherents. In accordance with Napoleon's instructions, the French attempted, as they had already done in the case of Prince von Zeil-Wurzach, to divert the moneys lent by the elector in his own country to the French Treasury, by offering substantial discounts on the amount due.

It is true that Lagrange had valued these amounts at only four million thalers, the equivalent of sixteen million francs, but actually they amounted to about sixteen million thalers. One can therefore readily imagine the dismay which the action of the French occasioned the elector. A large number of princes belonging to the Confederation of the Rhine, who owed him money, took advantage of the opportunity of settling their debts at a reduction. On Rothschild's advice, the elector implored the Emperor Francis at Vienna on no account to pay to the French either the capital sum or the interest due in respect of the million and a half gulden which he had borrowed from the elector.

All the efforts to cause Napoleon to change his attitude failed; and meanwhile the situation at Gottorp had become impossible. The elector had arranged for his favorite mistress Schlotheim to join him, and his host's wife, who was a sister of the elector's consort, was afraid of causing pain to the latter if she associated with the Schlotheim. Also the collapse of a rising in Hesse deprived him of a last hope.

"Fools!" exclaimed Lagrange in a proclamation to the Hessians on the 18th of February, 1807. "Count no longer upon your prince; he and his house have ceased to rule. Whoever resists will be shot."

William in the meantime had migrated to Rendsburg, and later to Schloss Itzehoe. In moving language he wrote to the King of Prussia and to the Emperor of Austria.

To the former he wrote: "I have now been living here for four months, groaning under the weight of intolerable grief, and filled, with deep concern for the many bitter experiences through which your Majesty is passing, and which . . . affect me even more than my own misfortunes. I have had to watch the land of my fathers suffering an arbitrary rule, and my private property being squandered, and to see my loyal subjects suffering and being gradually reduced to beggary, if they are not speedily succored. It is indeed hard, your Royal Majesty, to have to endure such experiences, and doubly hard when one is conscious that one has always acted in a manner which one could justify before God and men." [21] His letter to the Emperor of Austria was written in exactly the same vein.[22] In the opening sentence the epithet "most invincible" was on this occasion, in view of the battle of Austerlitz, not added to those of "most excellent" and "most powerful." He begged in the strongest terms, for the emperor's help and support. These letters were written after the elector's efforts to conciliate Napoleon had merely resulted in the Emperor of France showing his personal contempt and aversion more clearly than ever. William of Hesse's attitude continued to be completely unreliable and vacillating as far as everybody was concerned. At the same time that he was overwhelming Napoleon with supplications, he was negotiating with England for landing on the coast for combined action against the French. But in England, his overtures to Napoleon were known. He was no longer trusted, and the electoral funds invested in that country were sequestrated, so that although he received the interest, he had no power to dispose of the capital. All these things had not helped to improve the elector's temper. Prince Wittgenstein, who frequently had occation to visit him in exile on behalf of the Prussian govermnent, wrote: "Personal association with him is indescribably unpleasant; the greatest patience is required in order to put up with his endless complaints and sudden outbursts." [23]

Buderus and Meyer Amschel Rothschild were soon to suffer in the same way. Rothschild had latterly been collecting and accounting for the interest on the English and Danish loans due to the elector. As this had not been settled by the elector personally, he complained of the arrangement. He again became suspicious, and suddenly required that Buderus should not allow this money to pass through Rothschild's hands, but that it should be paid direct into the reserve treasury at Itzehoe, an arrangement which was more difficult to carry out. This was galling, both for Buderus and for Meyer Amschel Rothschild, who was just endeavoring through Dalberg's good offices to buy back the elector's coin collection, containing so many gold and silver specimens of priceless value, which had been carried off to Paris. The following events did not improve the elector's temper.

By offering the tsar the prospect of sharing the work dominion with himself, Napoleon had in the Treaty of Tilsit reaped the fruits of his campaign against Prussia. The result was that Hesse was allotted to the newly created kingdom of Westphalia, and Napoleon's brother Jerome pitched his tent in William's residence at Cassel. The exiled elector was filled with rage and indignation, and his tendency to behave unjustly to those about him became more marked. When Buderus was again staying with his master at Itzehoe, and spoke of Rothschild and the services that he had rendered, the elector indicated that he noted the special favor shown to Rothschild with surprise, as after all, he was a Jew of very obscure antecedents, and expressed his concern to find Buderus employing him, as he had lately been doing, to the exclusion of almost everybody else, in the most important financial transactions. Buderus declared himself strongly in reply. He pointed out how promptly Rothschild had always paid, especially in the case of the moneys from London, and emphasized the skill with which Rothschild had succeeded in concealing from the French his English dealings on behalf of the elector. He related how French officials in Frankfort had recently been instructed to carry out investigations at Meyer Amschel Rothschild's, in order to ascertain whether he did not collect English moneys for the elector; and how Meyer Amschel had immediately produced his books, an inspection of which had revealed absolutely nothing of this matter.[24] This fact proved that even then Meyer Amschel was keeping two sets of books, one of which was suitable for inspection by the various authorities and tax collectors. the other containing the record of the more secret and profitable transactions. Buderus pointed out that Bethmann, in view of his standing as a Frankfort patrician, and as the head of a firm that was centuries old, could not so suitably be employed in transactions which in the difficult political conditions of the time could not bear the light of day. He added that Bethmann's financial resources had given out in connection with the Danish loan in 1806, and that Rothschild far surpassed him in determination and energy. He also suggested that Rothschild had given greater proof of loyalty, for they had hardly heard anything of Bethmann since the elector had gone into exile, whereas Meyer Amschel was constantly concerning himself with the elector's interests, and also, when necessary, coming personally to Schleswig, or sending one of his sons.

Buderus's representations succeeded finally in allaying this bout of suspicion against the Rothschild family, with whom he had now established very close personal relations. Through the efforts of the administrator of the elector's estates, all the other bankers were gradually forced into the background, Rothschild taking their place.[25] From this time onwards he enjoyed the elector's confidence as far as such a thing was possible, and we find Meyer Amschel becoming, not only William's principal banker, but also his confidential adviser in various difficult matters.

As his health no longer permitted him to do full justice to the strenuous requirements of the elector's service, he placed one of his sons at the elector's disposal when necessary. Up to this time the elector had turned down the various proposals regarding the collection of interest and the investment of capital that Nathan had made to him from London. As late as June, 1807, he actually instructcd his charge d'affaires in London to vouchsafe no reply whatever if Nathan should venture again to inquire as to the elector's financial affairs.[26] In this matter too, he was slowly and completely to change his attitude, without any disadvantage to himself. Everybody who possibly could was borrowing money from the elector, for the German sovereigns, and not least, the King of Prussia, were suffering from extreme shortage of money after Napoleon's victorious march through their country, owing to the heavy war expenses and the subsidies which he imposed.

Prince Wittgenstein repeatedly urged the King of Prussia to be very cordial to the elector, and as soon as it should be practicable to invite him to live in Berlin because it might then perhaps be possible to persuade him to grant a loan. The invitation was actually sent, but the king had then himself been obliged to flee from his capital, and was suffering the most grievous misfortunes, so that Berlin was out of the question. Meanwhile Denmark had also been forced by Napoleon to give up her neutrality. The French invaded the dukedoms and the Danish royal house found the presence of the elector, who was such a thorn in Napoleon's side, most embarrassing.

In these circumstances, the refugee was in constant danger of being discovered and taken prisoner. Jerome was ruling in Hesse, and it was of little use to the elector that Lagrange's double-dealing was brought to light, and the general dismissed. In spite of an invitation from the Prince of Wales, William did not wish to go to England, since that would have meant a final breach with the powerful usurper, for the elector continued to cherish an unreasonable hope of Napoleon's forgiveness. There was still Austria. In his last letter[27] the Emperor Francis had expressed his "most heartfelt sympathy in these sad circumstances," with the hope that he might be of assistance to him. The elector accordingly asked for asylum in Austrian territory, and decided to continue his flight to Bohemia, stopping first at Carlsbad.

He did not part with his treasures, but took with him all the valuables and papers which had been saved, including a chest full of deeds which Meyer Amschel had proposed to bring on afterwards from Hamburg. The travelers were carefully disguised on their journey. In one place where there were French troops they nearly lost their most valuable belongings, as the wheels of the carriage in which they were packed broke in the marketplace, and they were forced to transfer them to another vehicle. Fortunately nobody guessed what the bales contained; the journey proceeded without further mishap; and on July 28, 1808, the elector arrived at Carlsbad, where he awaited the emperor's decision as to his final place of abode.

Meanwhile Meyer Amschel and his son were carrying on their business at Frankfort and developing the trading as well as the purely financial side of it. All the members of the family were actively engaged in it, and Rothschild's unmarried daughter sat at the cash desk, assisted by the wives of Solomon and Amschel. Meanwhile the fifth son, Jacob, generally called James, had reached the age of sixteen, and like his elder brothers had begun to take an active part in the business. This had made it possible for the eldest son Amschel also to leave Frankfort fairly often, in order, like Carl, who was the firm's "traveler," to visit the elector in Bohemia.

Buderus in the meantime had arranged that the elector's cash income, which it was really his duty to administer, should be collected by Rothschild and remain in his hands at four per cent interest. Thus, during the summer of 1808[28] he received 223,800 gulden against bills at four per cent—a very respectable sum at a time when ready money was so scarce, and the elector was reluctant to leave it all with him. However he found in due course that Rothschild accounted with extreme accuracy for every penny of it.

In accordance with the wishes of Emperor Francis, the elector moved to Prague toward the end of August, 1808. That monarch knew well what he was doing in welcoming the elector to his territories. Austria was chronically in need of money; nevertheless plans were being made to avenge her defeat. Count Stadion especially was the prime mover in the idea of waging a new war against the insolent Emperor of the French.

Financial affairs in Austria were in a state of chaos, as revealed by the Vienna Bourse of the period. A confidential friend of Emperor Francis had sent him a report on the subject in which he did not mince his words. "I feel it my duty to observe," he wrote,[29] "that the Bourse at the present time seems more like a jumble sale than an Imperial Bourse. The dregs and scourings of the population invade it, and decent business men, capable of handling such matters, are pushed into the background and shouted down, so that reasonable discussion becomes impossible. Closer investigation will reveal the fact that many of these people are paid by stock-jobbers, systematically to create disorder at the Bourse." The collapse in the value of the paper currency, the violent fluctuations in all quotations, the fear of war and the general unrest all contributed to this state of affairs. It was in vain for Emperor Francis to "resolve that measures must be taken to prevent the Bourse from degenerating into a rowdy collection of persons of no position who sacrifice all considerations to the basest greed for profit." [30] The fundamental cause of these conditions remained unaltered.

The Austrian state hoped for some financial assistance from the elector at Prague. He was living a retired life at the Palace Liechtenstein, and Vienna set itself to discover the state of the elector's purse. All kinds of Gonfidential persons and secret agents of the police, some of them disguised under titles of nobility and wearing officers' uniforms, were sent to Prague. One of them reported[31] that the Elector of Hesse had large sums at his disposal, and was in communication with "particuliers" through middlemen, regarding the purchase of state obligations. He stated that it was not at all unlikely that a loan to the imperial court could be obtained under favorable conditions, and suggested that it might be worth while to make inquiries on this matter through confidential bankers and exchange merchants. Immediately on receipt of this report, the emperor with quite unwonted promptitude instructed the chancellor of the exchequer Count O'Donnell to let him have his opinion as speedily as possible on this report received "from a trustworthy source." [32]

We now for the first time find the name of Rothschild mentioned in connection with the Austrian court. Count O'Donnell reported that there was no doubt that the elector had rescued considerable sums and also had large amounts to his credit in England, and that it was therefore worth attempting to induce him to subscribe to a loan, either in "solid gold" or in "reliable bills of exchange on places abroad." The count emphasized that "in order to achieve this object the best method would probably be to approach the middlemen to whom the elector entrusts his financial affairs, and this can best be done through a reliable exchange office in Vienna or Prague."

O'Donnell recommended that such middlemen should receive one, two, or three per cent commission, this being in any case customary in such proceedings, and they would then have an interest in stimulating the elector to carry through the transaction. "The papers of the Credits Commission reveal," the count's report continued, "that the persons who appeared on behalf of the elector, then landgrave, in connection with the negotiation of the loan of one million, two hundred thousand gulden in 1796 were the Frankfort firm Ruppell and Harnier, and Privy Councilor Buderus. At that time the interest on these loans . . . was collected by the local firm Frank and Company, on behalf of the Jewish firm at Frankfort of Meyer Amschel Rothschild, who were authorized to collect them by a power of attorney executed by Privy Councilor Buderus, and it appears to me abundantly evident that this privy councilor is the principal person who should be moved, through some advantage, to smooth our path." :!:i

It was decided to put up to the intermediaries two proposals: either that they should obtain a five per cent loan on mortgage security, or that they should persuade the elector to invest a considerable sum, at least one or two million, in the lottery loan. Hereupon the following resolution was issued by his Imperial Majesty: "In view of the indubitable necessity for providing if possible for the collection in hard cash of an adequate supply of money I approve of an attempt being made to obtain a cash loan from the Elector of Hesse. . . . The important thing is to make use of a reliable and intelligent mediator who may be relied upon to carry through the negotiations cautiously and skilfully, so as to achieve the desired end on the most favorable terms possible."[34]

In accordance with these instructions Buderus and Rothschild were confidentially approached as mediators, and they promised that they would do their best, but they emphasized the fact that the ultimate decision lay solely with the elector. They at once duly informed the elector of the wishes of Austria, but he showed a reluctance to meet them, and then war broke out and the negotiations were postponed.

During the period which followed the elector, regarding whose avarice and enormous wealth the most varied stories were spread at Prague, was closely watched by secret police specially sent from Vienna. He took an active interest in current affairs, and closely followed the powerful movement which was developing in Germany, particularly in Prussia, its aim being to shake off the foreign yoke. This movement could not as yet come into the open, but in Konigsberg, where the king and the government of Prussia were residing, the "Tugendbund" was formed, a league which ostensibly pursued moral-scientific aims, but the ultimate object of which was deliverance of Germany.

The principal protector of the league was the minister Baron von Stein; and William of Hesse held an important position in it. Its membership was so wide that it also included Jews, and the Rothschilds appear to have become members. At any rate they acted as go-betweens for the elector's correspondence on this matter, and made payments in favor of the Tugendbund.

Through an intercepted letter from Stein which mentioned the elector,[35] Napoleon learned of the desire for a war of revenge, and of the plans for a rising in Hesse. Stein had to flee, and Napoleon's distrust of the elector and of his servants was very much increased. The emperor saw clearly that the elector was implicated, that is, was financing it. Further intercepted letters confirmed this view.[36] As a result several business men mentioned in them by the elector were arrested; it was desired through them to obtain further information regarding the apparently inexhaustible resources of the elector. Amongst these men of business Buderus was prominent, and it was particularly desired to ascertain his precise connection with the bankers. One of these was Meyer Amschel Rothschild, whose relations with Buderus had long been no secret to the French officials. The Frankfort banker was accordingly cited to appear before the Chancery of the Urban and District of Frankfort on August 13, 1808; but he could not obey his summons since he was confined to his bed.

He had fallen seriously ill in June, 1808, had been operated on by a professor from Mainz, and, fearing that his days were numbered, he had made his will. He therefore sent his son Solomon to appear in his place, telling him not to let himself be drawn, and to make only such statements as were not likely to furnish the French with any clue, or else to provide false clues. Solomon carried out his mission with great skill. The French were but little enlightened by the cross-examination, and in the end they dismissed the young Jew with the order that he should immediately hand over to the court any letter from Budcrus to the firm of Rothschild.[37]

Buderus and Lennep were themselves arrested in September, 1808, and minutely examined for several days at Mainz, this being only natural in view of the fact that these men, who were the elector's tools, were in the power of the French at Frankfort, whereas their chief was living in Prague, out of Napoleon's reach.

Napoleon's mistrust of William was fully justified, for in October, 1808, the elector was carrying on negotiations at Prague for promoting insurrections throughout the whole of the northwest of Germany, with the view that they should spread to the south as well. This matter was certainly carried on with great secrecy; even the Austrian secret police agents knew only in a general way that something was in the wind. It is amusing to note the naive manner in which they arrived at the conclusions contained in their reports.

"The Elector of Hesse," says one of these reports, "has forty-one natural sons, all of whom he has decently provided for, but as the fall of the elector has disappointed their hopes of a brilliant career, they are endeavoring to reinstate their father. As the defeat of Prussia has deprived them of all chance of achieving their object by force, they have had recourse to a secret association which is intended to extend its activities throughout the whole of Germany under the protection of the English Masonic Lodge at Hanover. This league will take a suitable opportunity to reveal itself in a public conspiracy in order to attain its final object. . . . The probability of another war has aroused fresh expectations of making proselytes. in small confidential circles something is occasionally said about the possibility of putting an end to the miseries of the country by putting Napoleon and his brothers out of the way." [38]

Vienna, however, was not merely interested in the elector's high politics. Further information was also desired as to his financial advisers, particularly as to Rothschild, mentioned by O'Donnell. Urgent instructions were therefore sent to the chief of police of the city of Prague to obtain as accurate information as possible regarding that man's activities. The chief of police reported:[39]

Amsel Mayer Rotschild, living under the registered number 184 in the third main district, is agent for war payments to the Elector of Hesse, and in that capacity he has achieved mention, together with his brother, Moses Mayer Rotschild, in the electoral almanac for the year 1806. The father of these two men appears in the almanac as a war paymaster. According to information supplied by Major von Thummel, Amsel Mayer Rotschild, has come here from Frankfort, where he has been living hitherto, in order to look after the elector's financial affairs, which were formerly entrusted to Ballabom, who seems to have shown a certain lack of diligence. Be that as it may, we may assume that Amsel Mayer Rotschild renders the elector important services in other matters too, and it is not entirely improbable that this Jew is at the head of an important propaganda system in favor of the elector, whose branches extend throughout the former Hessian territories.

I have reasons for this opinion. These suppositions are based on the following fact: whenever I enter the elector's quarters, I always find Rotschild there, and generally in the company of Army Councilor Schminke and War Secretary Knatz, and they go into their own rooms, and Rotschild generally has papers with him. We may assume that their aims are in no sense hostile to Austria, since the elector is exceedingly anxious to recover the possession of his electorate, so that it is scarcely open to question that the organizations and associations, whose guiding spirit Rotschild probably is, are entirely concerned with the popular reactions and the other measures to be adopted, if Austria should have the good fortune to make any progress against France and Germany. Owing to his extensive business connections it is probable that he can ascertain this more easily than anybody else, and can also conceal his machinations under the cloak of business.

This report was more or less in accordance with the facts; for Rothschild was the connecting link between Buderus, who lived in Hesse and could never come to fragile, and the elector. Rothschild was also constantly busy with the elector's financial affairs, and these were of a particularly wide scope at the beginning of 1809, since with the passage of time the accumulations of money in England, by way of interest and otherwise, had grown so large that their supervision required particular care. Buderus proposed that his master should acquire British securities at three per cent,[40] and suggested that Meyer Amschel should he commissioned to effect the purchase of them. Rothschild had naturally made this proposal to Buderus in the first instance, and Buderus had duly put it forward as his own suggestion.

The close relations between Buderus and Rothschild had at that time actually been embodied in a written agreement between them which virtually made the electoral official a secret partner in the firm of Rothschild, This highly important document runs as follows:

"The following confidential agreement has today been concluded between the Privy War Councilor Buderus von Carlshausen, and the business house of Meyer Amschel Rotschild at Frankfort: Whereas Buderus has handed over to the banking firm of Meyer Amschel Rothschild the capital sum of 20,000 gulden, 24 florins, and has promised to advise that firm in all business matters to the best of his ability and to advance its interests as far as he may find practicable, the firm of Meyer Amschel Rothschild promises to render Buderus a true account of the profits made in respect of the above-mentioned capital sum of 20,000 gulden, and to allow him access to all books at any time so that he may satisfy himself with regard to this provision." [41]

The agreement contained a provision for its termination on either side by giving six months' notice. Buderus now had a personal interest in securing for Meyer Amschel Rothschild a monopoly in the conduct of the elector's business. What he had done had been in the best interests of all concerned. His experience of a period of years had proved to him the reliability and the skill of the House of Rothschild; he harbored no prejudices against the Jews; and he was firmly convinced that the elector, his master, was bound to gain by placing his financial affairs in the hands of one firm, especially of such an able firm as the House of Rothschild.

The Rothschilds on the other hand needed the support of a man who could gain for them the confidence of the suspicious and avaricious elector, who was an exceedingly difficult person to handle. They had achieved this object through Buderus, but they wanted to secure the relationship for the future, and therefore gave him a personal interest in the continued prosperity of the business. Finally Buderus himself profited by this arrangement as he fully deserved to do after the persevering and self-sacrificing efforts that he had made; and he could never hope that he would be regarded in accordance with his deserts by the rapacious elector. Moreover, he was far too scrupulous and honorable spontaneously to appropriate money in the course of his administration of the elector's property; but he had a very large family, and by becoming a secret partner in the firm of Rothschild he was enabled to meet its requirements.

Buderus's efforts with his master were successful. The elector acted upon Rothschild's recommendations regarding British stocks, and he then actually ordered that £150,000 of the stocks should be purchased on his account, which in fact exceeded the amount that Buderus had suggested. The investment itself was entrusted to Rothschild.

Up to this time the financial transactions in England had been the most reliable as far as interest payments were concerned; but the payments in respect of interest due from members of the English royal house came in at most irregular intervals and were often outstanding for very long periods. The elector, however, did not agitate to get these payments in, for he regarded the money laid out in this direction less as an investment than as a means of putting the members of the ruling house under an obligation to himself.

The brothers Rothschild noted this practice of the elector with important personages; they had practical evidence, from the experience of their princely client, of the fact that transactions involving temporary loss may ultimately result in very good business. The debtors' uneasy feeling on failing to make payments at the date when they fell due sometimes led them to try to make amends in other ways, through furnishing valuable information or through political services, and such favors often produced cash results far exceeding the amount actually owing.

At this time the bond between the House of Rothschild and the elector had become a very close one; and this was not due to Buderus only, but also to their loyalty; although this quality resulted to their advantage, they incurred the risks that loyalty involved. The only really unpleasant circumstance in this connection was the fact that the frivolous heir to the elector, who was always in need of money, exploited the situation and at every possible opportunity borrowed from his father's faithful Jewish servant. In any case that could not be a very serious matter, as Rothschild was morally certain to get his money back, the prince being the heir to the enormous fortune which his father had amassed. These large financial transactions did not put an end to the dealings in small antiques between the elector and Rothschild, which had been the starting-point of their business relations. However, there was a difference: their roles were reversed; the elector now sold to Rothschild vases, jewels and antique boxes, etc. more often than he bought them. These dealings constituted a peculiar bond of sympathy between the elector and his Jewish crown agent, and the elector enjoyed showing his talent in this field, as far as was consistent with his high birth. Meanwhile the relations between Austria and France had become more acute. The Emperor Napoleon had returned from Spain, and a new war between Napoleon and the Emperor Francis was imminent. The elector offered the emperor a legion of four thousand men, this offer being coupled with a touching appeal that the emperor should secure his reinstatement in the rulership of his territories.[42] The offer was thankfully accepted. On April 9, 1809, the Austrians crossed the Inn; thereupon Napoleon ceased to be a factor in the treatment accorded to the elector at Prague. The elector was granted the honors due to a sovereign, and society was commanded to call on his favorite at Prague, who until then had been very much slighted. They wanted to "get on the right side of him" In order to get as much money and as many troops from him as possible. The elector, however, put only one half of the promised forces in the field. That cost him 600,000 gulden; and it was Rothschild who saw to the collection and distribution of this sum.

This work was full of danger for the Rothschilds as they were at the mercy of the French in Frankfort. In spite of the great scarcity of money at the time it was Rothschild who from his own resources advanced to the elector the cash amount of several hundred thousand gulden required on short loan. The elector already saw himself in possession of his states. "I come," he wrote somewhat prematurely in a proclamation of April, 1809, "to loose your bonds; Austria's exalted monarch protects me and protects you. Let us hail the brave Austrians; they are our true friends, and it is in their midst and with their assistance that I come to you."

It was with eloquence rather than with cash that he called upon his Hessians to rise. When one of the local leaders wanted to seize Cassel and take King Jerome prisoner, he applied to the elector in the first instance for financial support. All that he received, however, was a piece of paper, representing an order for 30,000 thalers, "payable only in the event of the rising being successful." When the attempt failed, the elector laid the blame, "upon the premature and unprepared nature of the attack."

The immediate result of the attempt was that the elector's servants in Hessian territory were subjected to more stringent regulations. Notwithstanding that Buderus and Rothschild were on such exceedingly good terms with the Primate of the Confederation at Frankfort, the fact that King Jerome's position in Westphalia had been seriously threatened caused the police at Cassel to watch the movements of Buderus and Rothschild with renewed assiduity, as they suspected them, not unjustly, of having financed the rising.

This favorable opportunity was exploited by jealous rivals at Cassel, who supplied the police and their notorious chief, Savagner, with information. Moreover, Baron Bacher, the accredited Westphalian ambassador to Dalberg at Frankfort, was a bitter enemy of Rothschild, and felt particular displeasure at the favor shown by Dalberg to the Jew, since he had long been convinced that Rothschild was in the elector's confidence in all the activities undertaken against the French. Savagner, who thought that a prosecution of the rich Jew might accrue to the benefit of his own pocket, concentrated all his efforts on inducing King Jerome of Westphalia to authorize the issue of a warrant against Meyer Amschel Rothschild on the ground that he had been a channel through whom the elector's money had passed to the rebels.
In this dangerous situation Rothschild appealed to Dalberg to intervene on his behalf; Dalberg did what he could, and it was only with great difficulty that the French police in Cassel managed to obtain the warrant.
A Certain Levy, the son-in-law of a rival of Rothschild, informed Savagner as to the lines on which Rothschild should be examined regarding his business dealings with the elector.
On May 9, 1809, Buderus was again arrested at Hanau, submitted to searching cross-examinations, and was let out onsubstantial bail only after an interval of several days. On May 10 Savagner set out for Frankfort with the warrant which he had at last succeeded in obtaining, but which authorized only a domiciliary search and a close examination of all members of the House of Rothschild.

They had been warned in good time; the prevailing sentiment amongst the local inhabitants, both at Cassel and at Frankfort, was one of solidarity against the foreign invader. It was only rarely that this feeling was subordinated to commercial rivalry. Meyer Amschel was also given a hint by Dalberg. He was particularly concerned about the elector's four chests containing account books which were under his care; they were in his house cellar, and he did not even know what they contained. As the cellar would naturally be searched, he would have to do his host to rescue the elector's property as speedily as possible in the general excitement arising out of the sudden menace.

Old Meyer Amschel and his wife, Solomon and James, and the wives of the two eldest sons were at home. Amschel, the eldest son, was staying with the elector at Prague, and Carl was traveling on other business. Those members of the family who were at home now tried to get the compromising chests through the connecting passage to the yard cellar at the back, but they found that the passage was too narrow for the chests. These were therefore emptied, and their contents placed in other cases, together with some coupons representing unrealized obligations due to the firm itself. The family then set about the work of hiding the compromising account books and the secret records of the elector's intimate affairs, as well as certain embarrassing correspondence.

When the Westphalian commissioner of police arrived on the 10th of May, 1809, furnished with his exceedingly limited warrant for summoning the Rothschild family and searching their house at Frankfort, the most important documents had already been well concealed, and the individual members of the family had arranged between themselves what they would say when they were examined, so that they would not get involved in contradictory statements.

Dalberg, the sovereign at Frankfort, had been watching the activities directed from Cassel with a certain resentment; they constituted an infringement of his sovereign rights, and they affected a valued financier to whom he would soon want to apply again for a personal loan; on the other hand he felt that it would be exceedingly unwise for him to oppose the wishes of King Jerome's great brother. At the same time, for financial reasons it was only with reluctance that the King of Westphalia himself had consented to the issue of the warrant. It was therefore a foregone conclusion that the Rothschild family would not suffer any serious harm. Dalberg also gave orders that one of his own police officials should accompany Savagner. The two commissioners accordingly betook themselves to Rothschild's business house in the Jewish quarter where the whole family were expecting them.

Old Meyer Amschel, who on this occasion too was unwell, was placed under arrest in his own room, while Solomon and James were placed under arrest in the office below, under the guard of police constables. In the meantime all cupboards containing papers and business correspondence were sealed, and a systematic search of the whole house was instituted. Simultaneously the home of Solomon, who also lived in the town, was submitted to a similar search. Thanks to the advance warnings and to the well-concealed duplicate books, not much incriminating matter was discovered.

The next step was to investigate the individual members of the family. Meyer Amschel had to answer the questions drafted by the Jew Levy on the instructions of his rival, the banker Simon, at Cassel—questions affecting the details of Rothschild's financial dealings with the elector. In many cases he replied that he had no recollection of the matters referred to, pointing out that he had suffered a severe illness and undergone an operation in 1808; he stated that this had had serious after-effects, and more particularly, that it had affected his memory. By this method of evasion he succeeded in avoiding making statements which the commissioner of police could have used as incriminating material.

In these circumstances recourse had to be had to an examination of the other members of the family, including Meyer Amschel's wife. The old mother replied[43] that she knew nothing at all, as she only concerned herself with the house, never went out from one year's end to another, and had nothing whatever to do with the business. The two sons made the statements which they had previously arranged with their father, and in general said as little as possible.

The examination of such books as were discovered yielded very slight result, as the incriminating documents had been removed. Meyer Amschel cleverly used an opportunity which proffered itself, of lending Savagner three hundred thalers, and this helped considerably to expedite the conclusion of the official investigation. In any case, Savagner's authority was of a limited kind, and Dalberg's commissioner, who was himself a Jew, was well-disposed toward Rothschild, and used his influence to bring the examination to an end. As sufficient material had been collected to show that the action which had been taken was justified and necessary in the circumstances, the authorities at Cassel, too, were satisfied. Fortunately for the accused, Rothschild's enemy, Ambassador Bacher, was not in Frankfort at this time; so that the whole painful business passed off well for the family of Rothschild.

French reports[44] on the matter reveal that the French officials found the Rothschild family to be "exceedingly wise and cunning," and to have managed to secure friends in all quarters. The only positive result of the inquiry was to establish the fact that Amschel Rothschild was staying at Prague and was directing the financial speculations of the Elector of Hesse; and that the firm of Rothschild had made small payments to individual leaders of the insurrection. The only circumstance noted which was regarded as of graver import was that the brothers Rothschild had regularly paid considerable sums to the elector's consort, who was staying at Gotha, and to her business manager Kunkel, who also acted as an agent of the elector in promoting the revolution of Hesse against France.

These facts in themselves furnished sufficient material for dealing ruthlessly with the family—if that had been seriously desired; but the Rothschilds benefited by the inhibitions of the rulers of Frankfort and Cassel, who at heart were pleased to have remained faithful to the elector, although they had maintained practical relations with the new French powers. Everything had resulted happily, and the Rothschilds could breathe freely, but it had been a warning to act with even greater precaution in the future. The most important thing was to get the chests belonging to the elector out of the house at once, for in the course of another search the yard cellar might perhaps be discovered. The chests were therefore sent successively through the mediation of a Jewish friend to a business acquaintance of the Rothschilds at Darmstadt - a certain Abraham Mayer—and they stayed with him until the elector returned to his country.

While these events were taking place at Frankfort, Napoleon's campaign against Austria was proceeding. Swift as lightning, Napoleon's genius was thrusting down the Danube to Vienna. He sustained a reverse at Aspern, but on July 6 he made good this defeat by the decisive victory at Wagram.

The elector at Prague had been anxiously watching the changing vicissitudes of the campaign. He had hoped that his tormentor would be speedily beaten and he now saw him coming ever closer to his place of refuge at Prague. When Napoleon was at the gates of Vienna, the elector was seized with terror. He would have to flee again, and in great concern he took counsel with his advisers, and with Amschel Rothschild, who was staying with him, and who was no less terrified than his electoral master, as to whether they should not take refuge in the fortress of Olmutz. At any rate the more valuable articles were sent on there. Seven chests containing securities, and one containing jewelry were actually sent off.

Then came Wagram; Napoleon advanced to Mahren, and Olmutz was seriously threatened. The boxes had to come back, and the elector set out for Berlin, as the king had already offered to shelter him there. But the king now rather regretted having made this offer; Napoleon was too powerful and might resent the elector's being granted asylum in Berlin. The king therefore wrote on January 29, 1810, to put him off, on the ground of "managements delicats" obtaining between himself and Napoleon at the time. Meanwhile peace was signed at Schonbrunn, no mention whatever of the elector being made in the treaty. Napoleon returned to Paris, whereupon William decided to remain at Prague.

The unsuccessful campaign of 1809 had resulted in the retirement of Count Stadion, the Austrian Minister for Foreign Affairs, and this brilliant man and bitter opponent of Napoleon withdrew for some years into private life. On October 8, 1809, he was succeeded by Prince Clemens Metternich, who was to play such a decisive role in the destinies of Europe during the following half-century.

Metternich had only just entered upon his duties when he received a letter from the Elector of Hesse, requesting the minister to support him, and "to restore to his orphaned subjects their native prince, whose presence they so ardently desired." He had great hopes that Metternich would use his influence with the emperor, and he was bitterly disappointed when he learned that he had not even been mentioned during the peace negotiations.

He wrote a bitter letter of complaint to Stadion:[45] "So many worthless people, relying on French protection, are enabled to sin against me with impunity, and nobody now feels that he has any duties toward me; everybody does as he pleases and is actuated by base and selfish motives. I have thus lost more than two-thirds of a fortune that was never very large. That is hard, but harder than everything else is my present condition."

It was highly typical of the elector to suggest that he was badly off; in spite of his losses he was still actually one of the wealthiest princes of his time; but if there were spoils to be divided, he did not want to be left out in the cold on the ground that he was rich enough already. The money motive was always the principal one with the elector, and in this matter he had a perfect understanding with his crown agent Rothschild. Rothschild always advised the elector to ask concessions at every possible oppurtunity—as, for instance, that claims on him in respect of the troops should be waived, etc.—and the elector got more and more accustomed to following Rothschild's advice, and scarcely took any important financial step without consulting him.

A sum of £150,000 had been invested as recently as December 18, 1809, in three per cent British Consols from interest received on behalf of the "poor" elector. The business in connection with this transaction naturally entailed voluminous correspondence, for the conveyance of which between Frankfort and Prague Meyer Amschel made himself personally responsible. He traveled in a private post-chaise which contained a secret drawer. The French were anxious to intercept if possible the correspondence between the elector and his Frankfort agents; once they did actually succeed in seizing a letter destined for England which clearly revealed the fact that the Rothschilds were responsible for the management of the elector's funds in that country.[46]

In the meantime an important change had taken place in general European politics. The new personality directing Austria's foreign affairs had brought about a complete reversal of the policy followed previously. Nothing could be achieved against Napoleon by the use of force, and therefore Metternich tried other means.

Napoleon's marriage with Josephine was childless. His union with an imperial princess would increase his prestige and might produce the heir he so much desired. The hitherto hostile states were thus reconciled by the prospect of a marriage, and in January, 1810, the imperial house of Austria gave Napoleon to understand that if he asked for the hand of Marie Louise, the eighteen-year-old daughter of the emperor, he would not be refused. The contract of marriage was signed as early as the 7th of February.

One of the first to be informed of this complete change in the situation was the Elector of Hesse. He immediately wrote again to Metternich to the following effect: "I am writing to your Excellency trusting to enlist your sympathy for my most cherished desires. The marriage which is to unite the two greatest monarchies causes me to hope that I may regain the Emperor Napoleon's goodwill, if our emperor . . . will but intercede in my favor. One word from him to the plenipotentiary of France will secure my happiness, and will at any rate establish me as ruler of one of the liberated states in Germany, even if I cannot regain my own Penates. . . . Surely that monarch will not be able to resist the intervention of his exalted father-in-law, and of an adored wife on behalf of a prince who has never yet understood how he has incurred his displeasure."[47]

The elector also repeatedly pressed Count Stadion to use his influence with the Austrian ruler in William's behalf. The minister had great difficulty in dissuading him from traveling to Vienna.

Although in these letters the elector gave such a woeful account of his condition, he was faring exceedingly well at Prague. He had bought a palace on the Kleinseite where he held court, and he maintained a household of thirty-six persons. He had also acquired the magnificent castle and grounds of Bubenetsch, which was finely furnished throughout, but with due regard to economy. The firm of Rothschild carried through the business matters connected with these purchases. The actual state of the elector's affairs was well known at Vienna. The financial affairs of the court and of the public departments were getting steadily worse, and the new friendship with France had done but little to lighten the burdens of debt incurred under the recent peace treaty. In the negotiations between France and Austria the Austrian Treasury official Nikolaus Barbier had been so vehement in his advocacy of Austria's interests that the French plenipotentiary on one occasion actually protested against his being present. This clever financial expert had played a considerable part in all the various loan operations which Austria had had to carry out during these wars.

At that time the imperial state had no business relations with the Rothschild banking firm. There were four more or less official discount houses at Vienna, through which the Austrian government arranged its loans and other monetary business. They were the banking firms, Geymuller and Company, Arnstein and Eskeles and Company, Graf Fries and Company, and Steiner and Company. The Austrian government also dealt with the banking firm of Parish at Hamburg in 1809, in matters relating to remittances and realizations—such were the technical terms used at the time—of English subsidy moneys.

The condition of the Austrian state finances was lamentable. The value of her bank notes had fallen steadily during the wars, and the amount of paper money in circulation had risen to the enormous figure of over a thousand million gulden; it was already necessary to pay five hundred paper gulden for one hundred gulden in coin of the realm, this amount soon rising to twelve hundred gulden. In June, 1810, the difficulties had become so acute that an attempt was made to raise a loan of from two to three million gulden on the contents of the Privy Purse, which were deposited in the Vienna Treasury, this loan to be carried out by the four discount firms mentioned above, on the security of mortgage deeds. The banker Eskeles made a journey to Paris and Holland in order to raise this money.

It was also suggested that the state lottery monopoly should he mortgaged, hut the four banking firms had not great resources themselves, and were not particularly successful in their attempts to raise credits. Eskeles was forced to report from Frankfort that he had no hope of success, "either in raising money or in mortgaging the state lottery."

In these depressing circumstances Vienna remembered the wealthy Elector of Hesse whom it had been treating so shabbily, and it was suggested that he might be persuaded through Rothschild to grant a loan to Austria. Barbier was entrusted with this mission, and discussed it personally with the elector, and also informed Rothschild of the matter. The elector replied evasively. He said that he must first discuss it with his advisers; and Buderus had pointed out to his master that so much money was already on loan with private persons that it was not desirable to make further investments.

Rothschild also advised against producing capital sums of the amount required by the Austrian court, although he felt "that it was not desirable to give the emperor a rebuff. The elector and Rothschild hit upon the idea of suggesting to the emperor that the elector should transfer to him all his individual outstanding claims, and that it should he the monarch's own business to bring the debtors to book. He suggested that the emperor might have more influence and power to effect this, and that he might be able to neutralize any opposition of the French to collecting the debts. The advantage for him would be that he would then have only one single debtor, the Emperor of Austria.

The elector accordingly wrote to Barbier[48] that he would be happier than he could say if his Royal and Imperial Majesty would take over the debts due to him, mentioned in the accompanying schedule. He stated that he was not in a position to grant a loan in any other way than that suggested, as eighteen months earlier he had purchased Austrian government stock of the value of over a million gulden, and funds in England had been sequestrated. If he recovered from his financial difficulties he would be delighted to be of service to his Majesty.

He enclosed a list of thirty-three different clients who owed him sums in varying amounts, ranging from 784,-848 reichsthalers down to 6,951 reichsthalers. Apart from several princely houses, the names of privy councilors and counselors of embassies figured in these lists, as well as ministers such as Hardenberg, who owed the elector 140,000 thalers. The total value of all the claims amounted to the sum of 5,832,532 reichsthalers.

This proposal, however, came to nothing. The scheme put forward by Rothschild, and approved by the elector, had been too subtle and complicated, and on the instructions of Emperor Francis a reply was sent to the elector[49] declining the offer, on the ground that the collection of the money would be a process too difficult and uncertain, and not consonant with the dignity of the Austrian state. It was also pointed out that the moneys had been attached by the French government, and that to accept a transfer of these obligations would therefore compromise Austria.

Although the proposal was rejected, it had the important result that for the first time a high Austrian Treasury official negotiated with a member of the Rothschild family.

In the meantime important political changes had taken place at Frankfort. Dalberg's Confederation of the Rhine had exchanged Hanau and Fulda for Regensburg, and the title of Grand Duke of Frankfort was conferred on the overlord. Dalberg's promotion furnished an opportunity to Meyer Amschel, who was in his favor, of proving his gratitude to Buderus for his good offices in the past, by services other than financial.

Buderus had been continually molested by the French police, and Rothschild decided to put an end to this by persuading Dalberg to recognize the electoral official as a deputy of the estates of the Grand Duchy of Frankfort on the occasion of the handing over of Hanau, and also to appoint him director of the finance committee of the diet. He hoped that when Buderus held this official position he would be left in peace.

Dalberg acceded to Rothschild's request. He steered his course very cleverly between the former powers who were now in exile and the new masters at Frankfort. It was very necessary that he should do so, for he could not uproot himself from the city of his birth. All his possessions were there, and the city was the principal commercial and financial center of the Continent. The Austrian ambassador Baron von Hugel reported enthusiastically regarding the increasing prosperity of Frankfort, which had conserved its wealth through all the difficulties of the war period, and had actually grown richer.

"Luxury," he wrote,[50] "has increased incredibly. Cash is turned over much more rapidly. Hospitals, libraries, museums, etc. are provided on the most generous scale; trade and industry flourish, and everyone is full of enterprise."

Hugel emphasized the fact that the city already gave the impression of being one of the pleasantest and most important towns of Germany. "The grand duke," he continued, "takes an active interest in everything. Since I have been here, I have not seen a beggar or been asked for alms. The roses in the gardens are never touched, and in spite of all difficulties the industry of the tradespeople and bankers is exemplary. In fact their difficulties seem to act as an incentive to further efforts. During the last twenty years there has been no bankruptcy of any note. The volume of goods passing through the city is inconceivably great. Plutocratic standards obtain at Frankfort, and persons are judged by the magnificence of their establishments or by the appearances that they manage to keep up."

Hugel pointed out that Frankfort was a focus for trade between northern and southern Germany, and the gateway to France and Austria; and that no less than eight hundred of its citizens had admitted to possessing unencumbered cash to the sum of 50,000 gulden or more, while some hundreds enjoyed annual incomes of this amount and upwards.

Although this description may have been painted rather rosily, it was, in essentials, in accordance with the facts. There were many people at Frankfort who had grown rich, and the rapidity of the rise of the House of Rothschild to wealth and influence had been particularly marked. In view of the progress of his business, Meyer Amschel now decided to define more clearly its internal constitution; and more particularly to regulate his sons' share with greater accuracy than had been done within the framework of the existing concern.

On September 27, 1810, a new deed of partnership was accordingly drawn up between the father and his sons.[51] The main principle of this contract was that Meyer Amschel gave all his sons a substantial share in the business in order to stimulate their industry. They became, not merely indirectly, but directly interested in its continued prosperity. To mark the change the name of the firm was altered to "Meyer Amschel Rothschild and Sons," and Rothschild conveyed this information to all his business friends in a printed letter, in which he emphasized the fact that he was now associating his three sons with him in the direction of the business, which had been established for forty years.

The contract assessed the capital value of the business at a total of 800,000 gulden, 370,000 gulden being allotted to the father, 185,000 gulden each to the sons Amschel and Solomon, and 30,000 each to Carl and James, who had not yet conic of age. These shares were allotted to them as their absolute property, and it is noteworthy that Jacob (James) Rothschild, who was barely eighteen years old, was allotted shares to the capital value of 30,000 gulden, as duly earned through the "conscientious carrying out of the business entrusted to him by the old concern."

For the purpose of dividing profit or loss, the business was divided into fifty shares; a multiple of five, having the convenience of facilitating the future division of the business equally between the five brothers, while the smaller fractions made it possible in the meantime to allot shares with due regard to the varying ages and capacities of the five sons. When the time came to divide up the inheritance, each son could acquire an equal fifth share.

On perusing the document, one is struck by the fact that Nathan, who was living in England, is not mentioned in the partnership deed and seems to have been left entirely to his own resources, although he was in close business association with the parent concern, and on the best terms with his family. Under the contract, twenty-four of the fifty shares were for the next ten years to belong to the father, twelve each to Amschel and Solomon, and one each to Carl and James. In point of fact, however, Meyer Amschel was holding the twelve-fiftieths destined for Nathan; but for the sake of public opinion, on account of the French domination, the connection with Nathan, who was living in England, had to be kept secret. We may assume that there was a secret subsidiary agreement with Nathan, accurately defining his relation to the company. Each partner of adult age was authorized to sign on behalf of the firm. The deed recited that "with the help of the Almighty, Meyer Amschel Rothschild has, through the industry which he has shown from his youth upwards, through his commercial capacity (i. e., business instinct) and through a tireless activity continued to an advanced age, alone laid the foundations of the present flourishing state of the business, and thereby provided for the worldly happiness of his children." It was therefore laid down that the decision in all transactions should remain with him, as being the head of the business. Moreover, he expressly retained for himself alone the right to withdraw money from the capital of the business as he might think fit, whereas the other partners could take out only their annual profits and what was necessary for their households.

It was also laid down that no daughters or children-in-law should have any right to see the company's books. Finally there were provisions against "vexatious litigation," and any partner who set the law in motion was made liable to a penalty for doing so. Before he could appear before the judge he was required to deposit this amount. This article was cleverly designed to lessen the possibilities of disputes between the five brothers; and although they might perhaps have rendered it invalid at law, they fully appreciated its wisdom, and all five solemnly agreed to abide by it.

The deed of partnership gives some insight into the varied nature of the business of the House of Rothschild, and the vicissitudes to which it was liable. As "bad and unrealizable" mortgages, debentures, and outstanding debts of all kinds are mentioned, it is clear that in its numerous undertakings the House of Rothschild sometimes suffered losses and made mistakes. These certainly always brought indirect advantages, as Meyer Amschel continually emphasized to his sons that mistakes have an educational value, and one must never lose courage.

Meyer Amschel was careful to nurse the old connections which the elector had facilitated for him through his relations in high quarters, and to exploit them for the benefit of his house. Whereas previously he had acted as the middleman between the electoral lender and Denmark, he offered as early as December, 1810,[52] a loan of 400,000 thalers to Count Schimmelmann, the Danish finance minister, which loan was to be advanced, not by the elector, but by Meyer Amschel Rothschild and his sons. It was another step towards his gradual financial emancipation from the elector, although, having now arrived at the point of doing business on his own account, he continued to apply in his own interests the business principles so well proved by William of Hesse.

Rothschild carefully watched the general political situation. Though by reason of his personality and origin, and his ignorance of language, he could not possess those qualities which are normally required in a diplomat, he had a sagacious understanding of human nature, entirely free of any preconceived ideas or prejudices. This was of particular advantage in a world which, at the time, was politically topsy-turvy. One really had to be a consummate diplomatist in order to carry on one's business without causing offense, either to the French or to the powers which they were oppressing.

As long as Napoleon's star was in the ascendant, the Rothschilds acted as if they were well disposed to France and her ruler; they lent money both to the French and to the native authorities, delivered flour to friend and foe alike, and hoped to be left entirely unmolested by Napoleon. They felt, as we know today, more secure than they really were. They were running great risks, for instance, in their commerce, or rather illicit trade, in merchandise with England.

It was not till some time after the proclamation of the continental blockade that Napoleon realized that it inflicted hardship not only upon England but upon France, as France thereby lost her best customer, and the cost of living in that country rose much higher. He accordingly issued various decrees modifying the strict provisions of the continental blockade, so as to permit of a kind of official smuggling under departmental supervision, and also to allow the import of colonial goods on the payment of a very heavy duty approximating fifty per cent of their value. In spite of these alleviations, smuggling was carried on on a large scale, and its direction was naturally concentrated in the commercial city of Frankfort. Napoleon had sent his own spies there, and on receiving their reports he decided to take more active measures against Frankfort.

Buderus had just decided to give to the young crown agent, Carl Rothschild, who was about to attempt to bring to Prague the property which the elector had left in Schleswig, the final account for the year 1807, which the elector required. The official stated[53] that he was not inclined to venture on the journey himself, because he was too closely watched, and feared a further arrest, and the possible confiscation of all his property.

His letter also contained news that would be welcome to his avaricious master. "After long arguments, and as the result of great efforts," he stated, "I have persuaded the crown agent, Rothschild, in effecting the third investment of £150,000 sterling, to charge one-quarter per cent less commission, so that he will deliver the stock for 73 3/4, involving a saving of £4,521. . . . The younger son of Crown Agent Rothschild will bring over the document relating to the first purchase of stock, as soon as means can be found for sending it safely."

But this could not be carried out so easily; Napoleon's anger because Frankfort did not respect his blockade regulations against England led to more stringent regulations, and Buderus was forced to change his plans completely. "The crown agent, Kallmann Rothschild," he wrote on November 2, 1810,[54] "should proceed to Prague at once, as several French regiments with artillery have come into the town, as well as a host of customs officials. All the gates have been occupied, and nobody is allowed to pass out without being closely inspected; all warehouses have been sealed, and an extensive search for English and colonial goods has been instituted, severe penalties being indicted when such goods have been discovered.

"The extent of the general confusion and distress which this has caused beggars descriptions. I myself have taken every conceivable precaution, and I feel justified in stating my absolute conviction that the sons of Crown Agent Rothschild deserve the highest praise for the tireless industry and zeal which they have shown in their devotion to your Electoral Highness. Fresh proclamations have been issued, promising a reward of fifteen per cent for information regarding the investment of your Electoral Highness's funds, and the number of spies and traitors under every guise is so great that it is impossible now to trust anyone. From this mild account of conditions here you may graciously be pleased to infer that it would be as impracticable for me to leave as it was formerly to transport the effects in custody at Gottorp. I shall arrange for Crown Agent Kallmann Rothschild to start as soon as it is possible to get a package out of Frankfort."

On instructions from Paris, a general domiciliary search for concealed English-manufactured goods had been ordered at Frankfort. The city which had just been described in such glowing colors by Hugel was now in a panic. Naturally the business House of Rothschild was also affected by this measure. A list was drawn up of two hundred and thirty-four tradesmen who had to pay the heavy duties prescribed for the colonial wares which were discovered.

Meyer Amschel Rothschild was the sixty-eighth name in this list,[55] and was made liable for a payment of 19,348 francs, which was certainly not a very large amount compared with the sums payable by other tradesmen. Hebenstreit, for instance, paid nearly a million francs, and Bethmann 363,000 francs. Altogether the French collected a total of nine and a quarter millions on the colonial stores discovered at Frankfort. Half the amount payable by Rothschild was for indigo. In view of Meyer Amschel's relations with the grand ducal government and his cleverness at concealment, we may assume that his actual stores of colonial goods were much greater, and that through his connections he substantially reduced the amount which he ought to have paid. Nevertheless this sudden incursion, personally ordered by Napoleon, had distinctly alarmed him.

Meanwhile the elector at Prague had received Buderus's letters, and sent the following reply to his trusty official:[56] "It is a special satisfaction to me that you have induced the firm of Rothschild, in view of the prospect of the further investment of £150,000, to reduce their commission by one-quarter per cent.

"In view of further representations made by the crown agent Rothschild, and having regard to the favorable price, I have decided to increase this investment by a further £100,000 . . . but on the understanding that I shall pay this amount in instalments, and that I am not to be worried about it in any way. At the same time you are to see that the document regarding the first investment reaches me as soon as possible, and that I receive the others shortly afterwards. I note with pleasure that the House of Rothschild has shown its traditional devotion to me even in the present catastrophe at Frankfort. You will kindly convey to them my satisfaction and gratitude."

Meanwhile the Emperor of France had just experienced one of the happiest hours of his life. On March 20, 1811, Marie Louise had presented him with the son and heir he so much desired. The baptism of the French heir, who had been created King of Rome while still in his cradle, was an occasion of unexampled splendor and magnificence. From all their domains, princely personages swarmed to the festivities, to take advantage of the opportunity of expressing their allegiance to the mighty monarch.

The Grand Duke Dalberg, in Frankfort, also desired to go to Paris to do obeisance, but there was a formidable obstacle in the way of his doing so. The journey was very expensive, and Dalberg could not visit Paris except with a retinue such as befitted his rank. But he had no retinue, and in the first instance he turned for assistance to the association of Frankfort merchants, requesting them to lend him eighty thousand gulden for the journey to Paris.

The merchants, who disliked the Napoleonic regime, and could not agree as to the proportions in which the money should be subscribed, declined the request. Dalberg had not applied to Rothschild in the first instance, because he thought the amount was too heavy for a single individual to advance. Meyer Amschel learned of the grand duke's wish, and voluntarily offered to advance him the sum at five per cent. Dalberg could now proceed to Paris.

While Rothschild had always enjoyed Dalberg's favor, this clever action gained for him the full confidence of the grand duke, as is indeed specifically stated in a later French police report regarding the Rothschild family:[57] "Through meeting him in this matter he was so successful in gaining the grand duke's confidence, and secured himself so thoroughly in his good graces, that henceforth the grand duke scarcely ever refused him any request."

He asked for instance for a passport for young James, who was then nineteen years old, and who was sent through Antwerp to Paris, straight into the lion's mouth. His presence was necessary there in connection with certain illicit business that Nathan was carrying out from England, which will be described in more detail later. For the present it will suffice to state that James actually arrived in Paris on the 24th of March, 1811, took up his quarters at 5 rue Napoleon without being hindered, and duly reported himself to the police.

At this time the Rothschild family were kept very much on the move. Apart from their own business, all the members of the family who were capable of traveling were constantly on the road, in order to transact personally the important business of the elector at various places. This is most clearly revealed in the correspondence between Buderus and the elector.

"Young Rothschild," he wrote from Hanau to his master on April 7, 1811,[58] "is actually on his way to London to fetch the certificates of title regarding your investment of capital. He can take the packet of letters with him. His father will gladly make an effort to get the things away from Gottorp . . . and is already making inquiries on this matter. On my advice Crown Agent Rothschild has called in the capital payment due at Copenhagen, and has received 159,600 gulden. Will your Electoral Highness graciously permit me to convey to Crown Agent Rothschild your Highness's satisfaction regarding his manifold activities on your behalf? I am informed by Crown Agent Rothschild that the Prague police have discovered the secret drawers in his carriage. I have therefore thought it advisable not to send my account for last month with the other documents, on this occasion, as it cannot be concealed under the clothes as letters can."

The elector rewarded such news with expressions of genuine satisfaction, and agreed that Rothschild should be acquainted with his satisfaction with him. He was, however, still concerned about the money which he had invested in English stock, in respect to which he had not yet received any document of title. "I feel a real longing, which I think is justified," he replied to Buderus,[59] "to see the documents regarding the investments. ... I had not been informed that the police here had discovered the secret hiding-place in the carriage. In any case there is no reason to expect anything untoward from that quarter."

Buderus was unceasing in his efforts to exalt the Rothschild family in the opinion of the elector, and to represent all other business houses as unreliable or less accommodating. This was shown in the case of a transaction of earlier origin. The elector had transferred to Meyer Amschel Rothschild and two other Jewish bankers from Cassel an amount of a million Dutch gulden due to him in Holland. In accomplishing this various technical difficulties arose which delayed the payment of the sum in Holland, while the transferees of the debt had already paid out the greater part of the sum involved. Before making further payments, they naturally asked the elector for a guarantee.

In righteous indignation Buderus reported this to his master:[60] "The worst of this business is that it was not entrusted to one single business firm. . . . The agents Stuben Hesse Goldschmidt and the heirs of Michel Simon are most ill-disposed toward your Electoral Highness. Levy, Simon's son-in-law, who manages the business, has gone to such extremes that, as I know for certain, he caused the recent arrest of myself and Rothschild, and furnished the police commissary with the questions on which we were cross-examined with extreme severity."

Buderus how proposed that the Cassel Jews should be made to retire from the business, and that the matter should be entrusted to Meyer Amschel Rothschild alone. The elector concurred in this proposal, and replied as follows:[61]

"I have read with great interest the reports regarding the Dutch loan of a million gulden. . . . You are quite right in holding that it is essential to keep the Cassel Jews out of this business (although I have always regarded Goldschmidt as an honorable man). ... I fear that these Jews will not trust the Frankfort agent (Rothschild) and will imagine that there are heavy profits at issue, and demand high compensation for retiring."

In the end the elector left the whole matter to Buderus, and he accordingly put it all in Rothschild's hands.

In general, however, the elector was again in an exceedingly bad mood, first, because Rothschild had still not succeeded in bringing his property from Holstein to Prague, and secondly, because he had received a report from Buderus regarding an electoral loan which had been made to a family called Plettenberg through the intermediary of Prince Wittgenstein, the recovery of which seemed highly doubtful. He was also annoyed by a suggestion made by Buderus that he should again take part in Frankfort loans, of which he had had such an unfortunate experience. It was in a highly nervous condition that he awaited the documents regarding his investment in English stocks, which had not yet come to hand. This mood found expression in an exceedingly angry letter, in which the elector notified the cessation of payments to Rothschild in respect to the English stocks, thereby causing a positive panic in the Rothschild-Buderus firm.

In the course of this letter he said:[62] "After all, my trunks and chests in Holstein contain something more than clothes; there are Hessian debentures, and accounts of various kinds, and a chest containing silver. I will arrange to have them brought to me here direct, for I am weary of giving instructions in this matter to the House of Rothschild year after year.

"I shall dispatch the draft letter to Prince von Wittgenstein, regarding the Plettenberg loan affair, but do not expect that it will have much result. The whole business is a network of intrigue, and I am absolutely determined to sacrifice everything rather than involve myself further with that prince. He has behaved in a shockingly irresponsible way toward me.

"I am not inclined to take part in the Frankfort subscription loan. I am sick of all loans, and I really prefer to have my money lying idle."

Nothing had yet arrived from London, a fact which particularly exasperated the elector. "I am exceedingly worried about this matter," he wrote, "and am most eagerly waiting to hear what you have to say. In the meantime you are to cease making any further payments with respect to these stocks, neither are you to invest in them any further English interest payments. I am still waiting in vain for the documents regarding the capital which I have invested; and in spite of all the confidence which I have in Rothschild, I cannot tolerate this delay any longer. Neither has the registration of the older stocks been effected yet. Lorentz is constantly and emphatically reminding you of this matter. You must see that he is kept fully informed of all my financial affairs in England, and especially of the investments effected through Rothschild, in order that he may keep an eye on them as it is his duty to do, as my charge d'affaires. You are to see to this without delay."

The elector's fears had been increased by letters from Lorentz, his plenipotentiary in London, who was offended because he had not been taken into the confidence of Buderus and Rothschild in the business which they were transacting for the elector in England. He had suggested to his master that England might conclude an unfavorable peace, which would cause a heavy fall in British stocks, and therefore advised the sale of the securities which had only just been purchased.

Buderus replied to his master in a very injured tone,[63] stating that in accordance with instructions he had stopped payments to Rothschild with respect to the new purchases of stock. He enclosed Rothschild's explanation, which set out the enormous difficulties in the way of undertaking journeys to and from England and safely conveying documents and letters in a time of war and blockade.

Buderus strongly indorsed the remarks of his Frankfort partner.[64] "In my opinion," he wrote, "his judgment is sound and his request is justified. ... I have not yet informed War Councilor Lorentz of the investments made by Crown Agent Rothschild. It is not desirable that such information should be too widely known." He added that if the elector's instructions in this matter were not countermanded he would forthwith carry them out. . . . "The bank of Riippell and Harnier," he continued, "is, not to put too fine a point upon it, filled with absolute rage against your Electoral Highness. Although they owe their fortune entirely to your Highness, they behave like madmen, instead of keeping quiet as they ought, and doing their duty by their customers, whom they serve for profit."

In a second letter Buderus wrote: "Rothschild is unjustly accused of having, from motives of secret advantage, delayed the Dutch business, which is probably to the great detriment of your Highness's interest; for it is Rothschild alone who has collected such sums as have reached your Electoral Highness, while the other bankers have made no effort whatever in the matter." [65]

Meanwhile one of the younger Rothschild brothers (probably Carl) arrived at Prague with a detailed report from Buderus, in which that official strongly urged his master not to jeopardize the business of the English investments, which was proceeding so well. Young Rothschild employed all his powers of eloquence to persuade the elector to revoke his veto regarding further payments. He thought that he had gained his object, and wrote to Buderus from Prague, stating that the elector had graciously agreed to continue to invest in British stocks the interest received in England. Buderus thereupon immediately resumed his payments to Rothschild on the elector's account, until he received an instruction from his master, dated December 9, 1811, which did not confirm Rothschild's premature conclusion. Thereupon Buderus made a further effort to impress upon his master that it was in his highest interest finally to cancel the veto on further payments, since otherwise the Rothschild banking firm would be faced with a severe crisis.

"It is my duty," he wrote,[66] "to bear witness to the fact that the Rothschild bankers have not failed to make every possible effort to obtain the certificates of the investments, and your Electoral Highness can have no conception how difficult it is to send important documents between here and London. If your Highness will consider the dangers that would arise if such a document were to fall into the wrong hands you will surely realize that all precautions which human ingenuity can devise must be taken in order to reduce to a minimum the chances of such an occurrence.

"The withholding of further payments to the Rothschild bankers has not increased their efforts to obtain the documents, as these efforts could not be increased. Directly after his return from Prague, the young crown agent Rothschild traveled to the seacoast in order to seek an opportunity for bringing over these documents. He did not feel secure in a Dutch village where he was staying, and went across to Dunkirk, where he has to furnish daily to the police department a satisfactory reason for his living there. According to his last letter, he expects the documents to arrive at any moment and he will then hasten here without any loss of time.

"The power of attorney sent to the bankers Van Notten, under date October 28, 1810, authorizing the transfer of the old stock (under another pseudonym) has been recovered. After leaving Amsterdam, the ship was driven back to the coast, and my letter was delivered in a Dutch village, where a reliable acquaintance of the banker Rothschild has kept it until now. The young crown agent Rothschild has now taken advantage of a favorable opportunity to forward it, and has received an assurance that it has safely reached the other side of the Channel."

Finally, young Rothschild, who had traveled to London, succeeded in smuggling over to the Continent a certificate for £189,500 sterling, and this was immediately forwarded to the elector. William now again consented to the interest on his capital being used for effecting further investments, after noting with satisfaction that the House of Rothschild, which had been highly nervous about retaining this business, had reduced its terms, and declared that it was now willing to deliver the stock for 70 per cent commission. The elector expressed his pleasure in conveying this information to Buderus, and concluded his letter by saying:[67] "I do not fail to realize the difficulties involved in communicating with London, and am therefore exceedingly happy to be in possession of the certificates for £189,500 sterling."

The elector also expressed the wish that one of the brothers Rothschild should reside permanently at Prague, but this Buderus had to refuse. The operations of the family were already so extensive that, with the best will in the world, it was impossible to accede to this request. Buderus wrote to his master:

"Flattering though the suggestion is that one of the Rothschild sons should be allowed to reside permanently in the neighborhood of your Electoral Highness, it is no less impossible than flattering. Their father is old and sick. His eldest son, Amschel Meyer, and his second son, Solomon, who is also delicate, are indispensable to him in his extensive operations. The third son, Carl, is almost continually engaged in traveling in the service of your Electoral Highness, while the fourth son, Nathan, is very usefully established in London, and the youngest, James, spends his time between London and Paris. They have declared to me that they will spare no effort to carry out your Highness's commands."

The continental blockade was naturally the chief cause of the great difficulties in the way of communications with England. This question had indeed become the crucial problem in general European politics. At Erfurt the opinion had obtained for a time in 1808 that Napoleon and Alexander of Russia would be able to share the dominion of Europe between them. The Emperor of France had particularly in view that he might finally be enabled to subdue England with the assistance of Russia.

For this purpose it was essential that Russia should unconditionally adopt the continental blockade; but the tsar never contemplated sacrificing all his trade with England for the sake of Napoleon. On the contrary, he facilitated the import of goods by sea, and goods of English origin could now easily find their way to other continental states via Russia. Thus the effectiveness of Napoleon's measures was endangered, and as early as the summer of 1811 it was obvious to the whole of Europe that a complete breach between the two most powerful continental states was inevitable, and that war was now only a question of time.

The Napoleonic police consequently applied a much more rigid censorship to all correspondence and secret agreements in territories subject to French rule. Anything addressed tb the ruling family of Hesse was subjected to a particularly close scrutiny. A letter dated Frankfort, November 1, 1811,[68] which carelessly mentioned Meyer Amschel's name in two places, and was addressed to the elector's brother, Landgrave Karl, fell into the hands of the French. In one passage the unknown writer acknowledged the receipt of a letter from the landgrave, through the good offices of Meyer Amschel, while another passage read as follows:[69]

"I deliberately read to Rothschild, in his sons' presence, the passage in which your Highness speaks of them so kindly and graciously. They were all delighted."

It was clear from the context that the letter referred to the Tugendbund of which the landgrave was a member, and it was a question of payments which Rothschild had to make on the landgrave's behalf. This letter was immediately forwarded from Hamburg, where it had been intercepted, to General Savary, the commissioner of police at Paris, who instructed Baron Bacher, the French ambassador at Frankfort, to furnish any light he could as to the implication of the letter and the parts played by the persons mentioned in it.

Baron Bacher suggested[70] that they should not proceed against the family Rothschild by domiciliary search and arrest as in 1809, but should act with greater cunning. The House of Rothschild and the other agents of the elector should be lulled into a complete sense of security; their letters should be skilfully opened, copied, and then forwarded. In this way Bacher hoped in a very short lime to familiarize himself with their network of intrigue in all its complicated ramifications.

The chief commissioner of police also asked for a report from his commissioner at Mainz, and the letter informed him[71] that the House of Rothschild had formerly been exceedingly active in the trade of colonial goods and English manufactures. But since they had been subjected to a domiciliary search and had had their English goods sequestrated, they had occupied themselves principally with banking business, and commerce in goods confined to the Continent. The Mainz commissioner added that the head of the House was not friendly toward France, although he pretended that he was sincerely attached to that country.

Bacher's advice was taken. The brothers Rothschild were most carefully watched by agents of the French Imperial State Police, both in Frankfort and in France, where they were amongst those who carried on illicit trade with England subject to departmental authorizations; at the same time they were on the best of terms with Dalberg's Frankfort police, although this force was also subject to Napoleon. Dalberg's police commissioner, von Itzstein, who although a Jew, was director of the police of the grand duchy, was a particular patron of Meyer Amschel and of all the Frankfort Jews.

Meyer Amschel Rothschild had long cherished the idea of exploiting Dalberg's friendly feelings for the Jews in the interests of the fellow members of his faith who had formerly been so oppressed, and incidentally of his own family. It is true that a new "status" proclaimed by Dalberg had somewhat improved their condition, but it involved no essential change. For example, the number of Jewish families tolerated remained at five hundred. "Five hundred, only five," indignantly wrote a certain Israel Jakobsohn. "Why not more, and why not less?"[72]

Dalberg, seeing that he could exploit this situation and do a good business deal, allowed Meyer Amschel and his partner Gumprecht to persuade him to commute the annual amount of 22,000 gulden payable by the Jews, into a lump sum, and to grant them the rights of citizenship in Frankfort, thereby making them the political equals of the Christians. At the same time, the Jews were granted their own governing body, known as the "Governing Body of the Israelite Religious Community." Police Director von Itzstein was nominated president, while the other members of the committee were chosen from amongst the most prominent Jews in the town.

In the course of his efforts Meyer Amschel let Dalberg infer that the Jews were prepared to make financial sacrifices, and in the end Dalberg demanded that they should commute the annual payment of 22,000 gulden by a single payment of twenty times that amount. This was a substantial amount of money, but one that the Frankfort Jews could produce, especially as Meyer Amschel alone advanced 100,000 gulden, or almost a quarter of the total sum. He also managed to arrange that only 150,000 of the 440,000 gulden should immediately be paid in cash, and that for the balance twenty-four bearer debentures would be accepted. Jewish circles awaited with considerable suspense, the conclusion of these arrangements, which were so important for their future. If the proposal went through, Meyer Amschel wanted to be the first to bring the good news to the fellow members of his faith.

As he was constantly being begged for information by members of the Jewish community, he requested a recorder of the province, who was friendly to him, to let him have the earliest possible information: "I should be most pleased," he wrote to him in his peculiar German,[73] "if I could be the first messenger of the good news, as soon as it has been signed by his Royal Highness, our most excellent Lord and great Duke, in our favor and that I can inform my nation of their great joy, will you graciously inform me of it through the post, I confess I abuse your goodness and grace, but I do not doubt that your Highness and your honored family have to await great heavenly rewards and will receive much happiness and blessing . . . because in truth our whole Jewry, if they have the happiness to obtain equal rights, will gladly pay with great pleasure all dues that the citizens have to pay."

After some time the matter was put through, and aroused as much enthusiasm amongst the Jews as indignation in the senate and amongst the patrician families, who were hostile to them. It was at once suggested everywhere that Dalberg had received money personally, in addition to the sum publicly mentioned. In this connection pointed remarks were made about the fact that Meyer Amschel and his sons had been appointed official bankers to the grand duchy and that Meyer Amschel had been made a member of the Electoral College of Frankfort. A member of the Austrian Secret Police actually claimed that he knew the amount of the sum, namely 33,000 karolins, which Dalberg had received for his good offices.[74]

The Jewish community certainly had every reason to be grateful to the aged and infirm Meyer Amschel, who had never completely recovered since his operation, and yet still had the energy to apply all his influence and money to secure this improvement in their status. The debentures, to the value of 290,000 gulden, were immediately brought into circulation. One of them, of the value of fifty thousand, was acquired by Dalberg's finance minister, Count Christian von Benzel-Sternau; eight debentures of ten thousand gulden each were taken over by Herr von Bethmann, while the greater part of the amount paid by the Jews in cash went direct to Paris as a payment on account of the electoral domains in Fulda and Hanau, which had been seized by the French, and which Dalberg had repurchased on taking over these two principalities.

The grand duke immediately sold the domains again to private persons for earnest money of three and one-half million francs, payable by instalments, a transaction which, when concluded, would yield 190,000 francs more than France had received for the domains.

When the bargain was concluded Dalberg declared, with somewhat premature joy, "A transaction concluded in so masterly a manner deserves a reward," and rewarded the ministers who had been principally employed in the transaction, and their wives, with presents of 40,000 francs each. In the letter regarding this matter[75] he stated:

"Since I am determined to gain nothing by this business except the welfare of the state, there are still 70,000 francs available out of the 190,000 realized. Of this amount I give 10,000 francs to Privy Councilor von Itzstein as a reward for services rendered in converting into cash the debts of the Jews to the state. I give 10,000 francs to the House of Rothschild for their excellent cooperation. I shall leave the remaining 50,000 francs with the House of Rothschild, as a part payment of what I owe them." [76]

The senate of the city of Frankfort, and the exiles who had formerly been in power, observed these events with concern and ill-will, and were firmly determined, if matters should take a different turn, to do everything possible to undo what had been done. Meyer Amschel's conduct had made him by no means popular with the former authorities of the city; but for the time being they had to look on in impotence, and allow him and his protector Dalberg to have their way.

It was with the greatest suspense that they watched the course of general European politics. The points at issue between Napoleon and Russia had already almost resulted in war. Napoleon collected the Grande Armee, the greatest host that Europe had ever seen, in order to subdue the last independent monarch on the Continent. At Dresden he gathered his dependent princes about him at a great court ceremony, and his imperial father-in-law Francis of Austria was also present on that occasion. The elector in Prague had again begged Francis to avail himself of the favorable opportunity for pleading his cause with the Emperor of France. Emperor Francis was used to such appeals, and paid no further attention to the letter. While the great drama of the Russian campaign was being enacted, the elector remained at Prague, and awaited the outcome of events in a state extreme anxiety.

Napoleon's army was advancing steadily toward the heart of the Russian Empire, although it was certainly suffering enormous losses. Out of an army of four hundred thousand men, scarcely one hundred thousand entered Moscow. But all that Europe saw was the victorious advance. Owing to the prevailing conditions it was weeks, even months, before further news reached Frankfort. The merchants of that time could not adjust their affairs to events as speedily as scientific discoveries have now enabled them to do.

Meyer Amschel Rothschild's attitude was entirely determined by his sense of the overwhelming power of the Corsican, who was now at Moscow, when the reopening of his old wound quite unexpectedly brought him back to his sick-bed. He did not live to see Napoleon's complete failure in Russia, to be followed a year later by his defeat in Germany, which was followed by the return to his Hessian domains of Rothschild's lord and master the elector.

On September 16, 1812, a high Jewish Feast Day, the so-called "long day" which is set apart for the pardoning of the penitent sinner, Meyer Amschel had been fasting, in accordance with his strict religious principles, and spent many hours standing in the synagogue, sunk in prayer. The same evening he felt severe pains in the region of his wound. He was immediately put to bed, but his condition grew worse. He had violent attacks of fever, and he felt that death was approaching. Thereupon he determined, while he still had the strength in him, to order his affairs, and to make a new will adapted to the most recent developments, to take the place of the earlier will which he had made.

In doing so he was giving effect to an agreement which he had made with all his children, and in accordance with which he sold to his five sons all his shares in the business, his securities and other possessions, as well as his large stocks of wine, for the sum of 190,000 gulden, which of course was far below their real value. His sons were henceforth to be the exclusive owners of the business, and it was clear, although not definitely stated, that after their father's death any inequality in their shares ceased, and each of the five sons henceforth possessed ten-fiftieths, that is, a fifth share, in the business.

The will completely excluded the daughters and their husbands and heirs from the business, and even from all knowledge of it. Meyer Amschel applied the purchase price of 190,000 gulden as follows: he granted his wife Gutle a life interest in 70,000 gulden; the remainder he divided amongst his five daughters. This arrangement served a double object. First, it made it unnecessary on his death to declare to the officials the enormous value, for those times, of the business that was divided between the five sons, and to put the capital bequeathed at the modest figure of 190,000 gulden. Secondly, the business was secured absolutely to the five sons, safe from the possibility of any interference from the sisters and their relations.

The will concluded[77] by enjoining unity, love and friendship upon the children, and any undutiful child that showed an intention of rebelling was threatened with the penalty of inheriting no more than the legal minimum, which was only to be reckoned on the basis of the 190,000 gulden, from which would have to be deducted anything that the child in question had received during his life.

When Meyer Amschel drew up his last will there cannot have been more than two of his five sons, namely Amschel and Carl, at Frankfort, for Solomon was living in Paris, and James, who was maintaining communication between Solomon and Nathan in England, was living at Gravelines on the Channel coast in the Department Pas-de-Calais. These facts, proved as they are by French police records, and the records of vises issued, are fatal to the well-known legend, according to which Meyer Amschel gathered his five sons about his deathbed and divided Europe amongst them. Moreover, his illness had come on quite suddenly and developed so rapidly that the idea of recalling the sons who were abroad could never have been considered.

When Meyer Amschel had thus done everything that lay in his power to secure the future prosperity of his House—which, it is true, he considered in terms only of financial gain—and by clear and simple provision to maintain unity and peace amongst his numerous family, he could look death calmly in the face. Two days after he had completed his will, on the evening of September 19, 1812, his old complaint took a marked turn for the worse. The alpha and omega of medical practice of the time was to let blood, a procedure which simply served to weaken old people who were very ill, instead of giving them relief. At a quarter past eight on the evening of the same day, Meyer Amschel Rothschild, the tireless, cunning, simple, and religious Jew, and founder of the banking firm M. A. Rothschild and Sons, was no longer to be counted amongst the living.

In his last hours he was fully aware that he was leaving a fine inheritance to his sons, but he certainly could not have guessed that he had laid the foundation of a world power which during the first half of the nineteenth century was to exercise an unparalleled influence throughout Europe, and was to maintain this influence almost unimpaired throughout the changing conditions of the second half of the century.

CHAPTER III

The Great Napoleonic Crisis and Its Exploitation by the House of Rothschild

SINCE the French Revolution, the Continent of Europe had been continuously suffering from the turmoil of war, while large territories were subjected to the horrors of the actual battles between the opposing armies. On the other hand, sea-girt England, although she exerted a powerful political influence upon the continental groups, was able to devote her principal attention, practically undisturbed, to the development of her commerce and the prosperity of her citizens.

Through his financial reforms which had assisted the capitalistic development of the state, the younger Pitt had brought order into Britain's internal affairs and thereby made it possible for England, out of her growing wealth, to advance very considerable sums of money to her allies, who were waging war on the Continent with the wealth and the blood of their citizens. Towards the close of the eighteenth century England was indisputably the most important commercial power in Europe, and the House of Rothschild had made an exceedingly clever move in arranging that one of its sons, and the most talented one at that, should take up his residence in that kingdom.

Nathan had first settled in Manchester, the center for the manufacture of all kinds of cloth, as he had long had business connections with that city. In view of the numerous armies that had to be clothed, the cloth trade offered opportunities of making exceptional profits. The sum of money he brought with him—£20,000, which constituted a very respectable capital sum in those days—gave the stranger an assured position from the start, although he could not speak a word of English. Nathan, therefore, came to Manchester, not as a small tradesman, but as a fairly important representative of an established commercial firm on the Continent, with money at his command.

He entered upon his commercial activities with all the enthusiasm of youth, at the same time showing a business acumen remarkable in one so young. He first carefully studied his environment, and his neighbor's methods of making money, and ascertained that profits were made on the purchase of the raw materials necessary for the manufacture of cloth and on the issue of these materials for dyeing purposes, as well as on the sale of the finished article, each of these activities in England being the province of a separate merchant.

Nathan determined to secured for himself the profit at each stage in the process.[1] He bought the raw materials on his own account, had them dyed, and then gave them out to undergo the further processes of manufacture, and finally himself handed them over to the trade. Nathan did not confine himself exclusively to cloth. He bought everywhere, and anything that he thought was good and cheap. Thus he bought all kinds of fancy goods, as well as colonial produce such as indigo, wine, sugar, and coffee. He was not troubled about finding a market, as the parent firm at home required all these things.

The capital which he brought with him was soon doubled and trebled, while his father and brothers derived the greatest benefit from Nathan's presence in England. He enjoyed the life in that country, which struck him as extraordinarily free and unfettered, compared with the oppressive conditions in Frankfort.

As his business grew, Nathan naturally began to establish contact with the capital, which is the heart of Great Britain, and in which all the financial interests of an extensive empire are concentrated. Determined to settle in England for good, he left Manchester in 1804 for London, where he would be in closer touch with those political developments which were producing such profound effect upon commercial life. He realized at once that the fact that he was a foreigner was a great handicap in business, and therefore, as early as the summer of the year 1806, he applied for naturalization as a British subject. His wish was readily granted, as the applicant had resided for six years in the country, and even if he had not yet attained a very prominent position in the business world, he was already honored and respected. Favored by the keen demand for goods on the Continent, Nathan carried on his business in London with great success, until the year 1806. His intimate experience of English life and character, and his sympathy with the spirit of resistance to Napoleon's plans of world domination which inspired the whole country, soon caused him to adhere completely to English modes of thought. But he avoided publicly identifying himself with any political cause which might have damaged his family Frankfort, and all his actions were guided first and foremost by business considerations.

Nathan was now twenty-nine years old, and was contemplating marriage. He had made the acquaintance of the daughter of a rich Jewish family. Her father, who had emigrated from Amsterdam, had several small business dealings with Nathan, but their relations had not been sufficiently intimate to enable him to form an accurate estimate regarding the suitor's financial position and general business qualities. The fact that Nathan was living abroad made investigations of this nature more difficult. Nathan, however, with skill and directness, managed to set his future father-in-law's doubts at rest, while the information which the latter obtained from Frankfort confirmed the fact that the Rothschild family were prosperous and respected. Nathan gained his object, and through his marriage was enabled to increase his own fortune by the amount of his wife's substantial dowry; his position was also strengthened by the influence of a father-in-law who was a wealthy and respected merchant in the City of London.

Moreover, his wife's sister Judith Cohen shortly afterwards married the rich and well-known Moses Montefiore, who was thus brought into close association with Nathan, and whose energy, foresight, and sound business sense in regard to all the vicissitudes of the continental wars, which so intimately affected financial operations, Nathan had constant occasion to admire.

Nathan had as yet nothing to do with the elector's investments in England, although his father at Frankfort was endeavoring to get him this business, and had repeatedly urged him to cultivate relations with the elector's plenipotentiary in London. The intimations of the elector's wishes, hitherto received by Count Lorentz, had not been favorable to such an arrangement, but this in no way discouraged Meyer Amschel at Frankfort, or Nathan in London, from continuing their efforts. As has already been stated, the elector soon changed his opinion, and we are now entering upon the period of the investment of large sums in English stocks, as recommended by Nathan. In view of his intimate relations with Meyer Amschel, the elector could not continue to object to the employment of his son Nathan in transacting the business in London.

Another factor in Nathan's favor was the difficulty of getting possession of the documents certifying the purchases of stock, this being not so difficult for Nathan to arrange, in view of his numerous Jewish and non-Jewish connections. Thus Nathan came to be interested in the enormous financial operations of the elector, and as considerable periods of time could be made to intervene between the purchase and the payment of the securities, he sometimes had temporary control of very substantial sums of money, which he could employ in safe, short-term transactions, such as, for instance, the purchase of bullion, which was constantly rising in value at that time. It was not known in England how Nathan came to have such sums of money temporarily at his disposal, for the purchases of English stocks on the elector's account were officially made in the name of Rothschild, and apparently for the benefit of that firm, as the elector's funds in England had already been sequestered once.

The credit of the House of Rothschild and of Nathan certainly gained greatly from these enormous purchases, and he came to be entrusted with transactions which, even if he could not immediately meet his obligations in cash, he did not like to lose, as they offered good prospects for the future. Nathan was particularly skilful at exploiting the abnormal conditions of the period, conditions such as always give those with a gift for speculation an opportunity of enriching themselves, while those who stand by passively are reduced to poverty. Through his continental blockade, Napoleon had revolutionized the whole commercial outlook of England; then, recognizing that his measures had a boomerang effect, he modified them, and actually negotiated with the smugglers, whom the English government encouraged with prizes for breaking through the Napoleonic blockade. The decree of June 15, 1810, practically officially regularized this illicit trade. Certain goods that were required in France, and then gold and silver, were allowed to be brought to France in limited quantities, French products being sent to England in exchange. In order to prevent the smuggling of undesirable articles, there was a special railed-off enclosure at Gravelines for the officially recognized smuggling, the captains of smuggling vessels being required to remain exclusively within this enclosure, and to load and unload their goods under police control.

Nathan took advantage of this officially sanctioned commerce between England and hostile France, to do business on an extensive scale, both on his own account and on account of the parent firm at Frankfort. But it soon became apparent that it was essential to have an absolutely reliable man at Paris too, to deal with this business. Nathan had written to Frankfort to this effect, and old Meyer Amschel had decided to profit by his good relations with Dalberg's French regime at Frankfort to obtain a Paris passport vise from the French officials for one of his sons, to whom alone he was prepared to entrust so important a position, and also to obtain a letter of recommendation for him to one of the higher French Treasury officials.

A particularly favorable opportunity for this occurred when Dalberg set out for Paris in March, 1811, with the money advanced by Rothschild. It is certainly no mere coincidence that, according to the French police records,[2] James, who was then nineteen years old, started to Paris via Antwerp, and took up his residence in a private house there. It is particularly worthy of note that Count Mollien, Napoleon's finance minister at the time, had been informed of young Rothschild's arrival, and knew of his intention to receive and forward large sums of ready money that were expected from England.

"A Frankforter," the minister wrote to Napoleon on March 26, 1811, "who is now staying in Paris with a Frankfort passport, and goes by the name of Rothschild, is principally occupied in bringing British ready money from the English coast to Dunkirk, and has in this way brought over 100,000 guineas in one month. He is in touch with bankers of the highest standing at Paris, such as the firms of Mallet, of Charles Davillier, and Hottinguer, who give him bills on London in exchange for the cash. He states that he has just received letters from London dated the 20th of this month, according to which the English intend, in order to check the export of gold and silver coins, to raise the value of the crown from five to five and a half shillings, and the value of the guinea from twenty-one to thirty shillings. . . . Such operations would be on a par with the practices of the Austrians or the Russians. I sincerely hope that the Frankforter Rothschild is well informed of these matters, and that ministers in London will be sufficiently foolish to act in this way."[3]

This letter reveals much; it shows that while James Rothschild may have been in Paris before the 24th of March, 1811, without the permission of the police, as soon as he officially arrived, that is, as soon as he reported to the Paris police, he must have had an interview with the minister or with one of the officials of the treasury, this being no doubt due to Dalberg's introduction. Although in sending the guineas to Frankfort Nathan was generally acting in accordance with quite definite plans that suited the British government, James, in order to gain the support of the French departments for these operations, pretended to the ministry at Paris that the English authorities viewed the export of cash with extreme displeasure, and did everything possible to prevent it. He succeeded only too well in hoodwinking Mollien, and through him, Napoleon.

"The French government," says Marion,[4] "viewed with satisfaction the arrival of English guineas at the Channel ports, because they regarded this both as a proof and as a cause of the progressive decay of England." It is true that in his memoirs Mollien afterward tried to suggest that he did not share this view, and that Napoleon derived it from others, but the letter quoted above clearly shows that the finance minister also believed Rothschild. Nathan wanted just at this time to send exceptionally large sums of ready money to France, having the secret intention that these should ultimately be destined for Wellington's armies, who were fighting the French in Spain. That general had suffered great financial embarrassment since the beginning of the English campaign in Portugal and Spain. It was not only that the blockade made it difficult to transport large sums by sea, but the devastating storms in the Bay of Biscay were a serious menace to the cumbrous sailing ships of those times. Such consignments were therefore liable to grave risks, and the insurance charges were exceedingly heavy.

As early as 1809 Wellington had had occasion to write to his government in the following terms: "We are terribly in need of funds. . . . The army pay is two months in arrears. I feel that the Ministry in England is utterly indifferent to our operations here.[5] ... It would be much better for the Governments," he added some time later,[6] "entirely to give up our operations in Portugal and Spain if the country cannot afford to continue them."

This state of affairs continued for two years, and Wellington had to have recourse to highly dubious bankers and money-lenders in Malta, Sicily, and Spain, from whom he had to borrow money at the most usurious rates, giving them bills of exchange which had to be cashed by the British Treasury at great loss. The measures taken by the treasury for satisfying the requirements of Wellington's army were always quite inadequate; finally the British commander wrote indignantly to London[7] that if matters continued thus, his army would have to leave the Peninsula, which would relieve France of important military commitments on the Continent, and expose England to the danger of having a hostile force landed on the island itself. Then his exalted monarch and his subjects would experience in their own country something of the horrors of war, from which they had hitherto had the good fortune to be spared.

A year later things were not much better, and on being reproached for having too casually drawn bills on the English government, Wellington replied with some heat, writing that he was sorry to have to state that sick and wounded British officers at Salamanca had been forced to sell their clothes in order to keep body and soul together.[8]

Such were the conditions under which the British army was fighting in Spain, when an energetic movement in its support was started in London, which at first was directed by Nathan Rothschild on his own account. He had acquired very cheaply a large proportion of the bills issued by Wellington, and proceeded to cash them at the British Treasury. The cash which he thus received—generally in the form of guineas—he sent across the Channel to France, where it was received by one of his brothers, generally by James, but in 1812 sometimes by Carl or Solomon, and then paid in to various Paris banking firms. The brothers obtained from the Paris bankers bills on Spanish, Sicilian, or Maltese bankers, and they contrived, through their business connections, to get these papers to Wellington, who duly received the cash from the bankers. Thus the cash sent from London actually only had to make the short journey from London to Paris, and thence through the intricate network of business firms, who were mostly Jewish, it finally reached the English commander in Spain, through the heart of the enemy's country.

As time passed, however, the supply of cash and precious metal began to be scarce, even in England. Nathan, who had concentrated his attention principally upon business in specie and bills of exchange since the blockade had made ordinary commerce so difficult, closely watched[4] for favorable opportunities of acquiring any consignments of specie that might be available. When the East India Company once offered a considerable mount of bullion for sale, Nathan Rothschild was one of the first customers in the field; and he was able, through having recently received large sums of money for investment from the elector, and through mobilizing his whole credit, which stood very high, to acquire the whole of this stock of gold for himself.[9]

At that time, John Charles Herries was commissary-in-chief, an office that had been created in order to supply both the British army at home and the troops fighting on the Continent with the necessary funds. He was not able alone to meet the demands made upon him. A sailing ship carrying money had again been held up somewhere for weeks, and another consignment which had arrived safely at Lisbon encountered extraordinary difficulties in its further transportation. The British government, and especially Herries, were in the greatest distress.

They then heard of Nathan Rothschild's purchase of gold from the East India Company, and the almost unknown man who had acquired it was sent for by the treasury. Nathan sold the gold to the government at a heavy profit, and, at the same time requested that he should be commissioned to convey the money through France to Wellington in Spain, as he had already been doing to a limited extent at his own expense, asking that he should now do it on a large scale on account of the British government.

Very substantial sums of money indeed were involved, which were sent across the Channel from England to France, as is shown by a letter from James in Paris to Nathan in London, dated April 6, 1812, which was intercepted by the Paris police. Nathan had at that time sent 27,300 English guineas and 2,002 Portuguese gold ounces in six separate instalments through six different firms, to James at Gravelines. James acknowledged the receipt of these amounts, and of bills on the firms of Hottinguer, Davillier, Morel and Faber, to the amount of £65,798. He added that he was glad that it had been possible to send him this money without affecting the rate of exchange, and urged his brother to let him have any commercial news at the earliest possible moment. Both brothers naturally watched the rate of exchange very closely, ceased buying bills when it rose, and acquired them when it fell.[10]

All these transactions were carried through in agreement with the chief French department, and Finance Minister Mollien. He was flattering himself that England was in great difficulties, that the rate of exchange was against her, and was constantly getting worse through the drainage of gold, while the Bank of France was consolidating its position, and France's currency stood highest in the world. Meanwhile gold pieces were trickling through in complete security, under the eyes and indeed under the protection of the French government, across France itself, into the pockets of France's arch-enemy, Wellington.

But though Mollien was deceived, the activities of the Jewish emigrants from Frankfort were being watched with great suspicion in other quarters. Letters from a local merchant to one of the Rothschilds at Dunkirk, which were intercepted by the French police, revealed the nature of their activities. A police official sent a detailed report on the matter[11] to Marshal Davoust, who was (hen military governor of Hamburg. After carefully examining the letters he fully appreciated the nature of the Rothschild transactions in France. As the marshal considered the matter to be exceedingly grave, he decided to report on it direct to Emperor Napoleon. He pointed out incidentally[12] that "the arguments in favor of withdrawing money from England, under which the plotters concealed their maneuvers, lose their force when one considers that the English do everything possible to facilitate its export."

The emperor took note of the report, but did not pay any further attention to it. He no doubt said to himself that Davoust was a splendid soldier, but that this did not imply an understanding of financial matters, in which Mollien's opinion must be more reliable. The chief commissioner of police, however, continued to concern himself with the Rothschild family, of whose relations with Hesse he had long known, and he determined to get to the bottom of their activities (couler a fond). He forwarded Davoust's report to Police Prefect Desmarets, instructing him to furnish accurate dates regarding the family, and at the same time wrote in similar terms to Gravelines.

This was in February, 1812, when Carl and James were both in Paris. Desmarets had them watched, and asked the French commissioner of police at Mainz to report regarding the political sympathies of the House of Rothschild, its commercial relations abroad, and its speculative transactions, as well as the extent, if any, to which it was involved in contraband trade.

The police commissioner at Mainz sent a detailed report in reply, in which he emphasized the confidential relations between the Rothschild House at Frankfort and Dalberg, stating that these were so intimate that Dalberg refused practically no favor that a Rothschild asked of him. He added that Dalberg's entourage had certainly given the Rothschild family previous warning of the domiciliary search which was conducted in 1809, and concluded with the words:[13] "As regards Rothschild's political leanings, they are far from being all that they should be. He does not like us French at all, although he pretends to be devoted to the French government."

At the same time the report from Gravelines came in, which confirmed the constant presence, amounting practically to the "etablissement" of a Rothschild at Dunkirk, and referred to his brother and partner in London.[14] The prefect of police, Count Real, pointed out that the mere fact that Rothschild was a foreigner was sufficient reason for not allowing him to stay on the coast.

"How could this man be anything but suspect?" he continued indignantly. "What could have been in his Majesty's mind when he permitted the smugglers to trade? Surely it must have been with the intention that this trade should benefit French industry, an object which will not be achieved if London firms can maintain correspondents, not to mention branch offices, in Paris. What are we to think of this Rothschild's sojourn on our coast? A man who has established his brother in London, with whom he actually has common interests?" Real therefore recommended that Rothschild should immediately be asked to leave the coast.

The Paris prefect of police reported the result of all these inquiries to the chief commissioner, and at the same time proposed that the Rothschild who was living in Paris mould be arrested. But the protection of the French finance minister prevented this. Indeed, how could the government suddenly allow persons to be arrested whom it needed for carrying out its own business operations, and from whom the French Treasury accepted reports and advice, while it also entrusted them with commissions? The brothers Rothschild had cleverly made their position absolutely secure before they ventured to Paris into the lions' den, and in spite of all the suspicions of the military and the police, they remained entirely unmolested.

Nevertheless, the position was certainly not without its dangers. Sentiment in high quarters might suddenly change, in which case a Napoleon would have made short work of the brothers Rothschild. A further incident occurred to alarm the French police, and it caused General Savary to institute a further investigation.

A letter which was being forwarded to James Rothschild by a business firm at a special charge independently of the post-bag, which was controlled by the Boulogne police, was intercepted in the course of its journey. The inferece was drawn that the brothers Rothschild frequently attempted to evade the censorship, but the writer of the letter, and the responsible police commissioner of the department asserted that the letter had merely been sent by special messenger after the regular post, as it was urgent. The matter was not further pursued, but the police commissioner for Pas-de-Calais was severely reprimanded, his chief giving him to understand that the luxury of his household and his general extravagance were highly suspicious circumstances.

The business of the two brothers Rothschild a cheval the warring powers of England and France was so important that it was absolutely essential for the brothers to be continuously on the spot, and even after the death of their father on September 19, 1812, only one of the two brothers who were in France at the time, namely Solomon, returned to Frankfort, whilst James remained in France and was constantly oscillating between Paris and the coast.

James had won the esteem of the Paris business world, through the enormous transactions which he always carried through punctually and accurately. It was at once noted whether he was buying bills or not, and the exchange was immediately affected when there was a rumor that he was going to buy. He set great store by his personal reputation; when a business man once slandered him to one of Nathan's employees, accusing him of an action unworthy of a man of integrity, he never mentioned the matter to the person concerned, since, as he wrote to Nathan, he considered it far beneath his dignity to discuss such a matter.[15]

Great events were now brewing on the Continent; Napoleon had not been able to keep up the myth for long regarding his victorious march to Moscow. The historic burning of that city robbed him of his only resources. Winter was already approaching when Napoleon was forced to decide upon retreat, which meant that the remnants of his army would have to traverse hundreds of miles through ice and snow, pursued by the enemy across country most of which had been laid desolate.

The crossing of the Beresina completed the disintegration of the Grande Armee, and on December 3, two days before Napoleon left it in order to return as quickly as possible to Paris, the famous twenty-ninth bulletin was issued, which, while generally admitting the destruction of the army, laconically reported that the emperor's health had never been better. The whole world received this news with great emotion, and new hopes sprang up in the European states which were under French dominion. But it was not possible to estimate what the future consequences of the catastrophe would be,.

The reports from Russia made a particularly profound impression at Frankfort. The unexpected news was so disconcerting that at first there was a tendency to regard it all as highly exaggerated—the newspapers had been allowed to report only what the French censorship passed. But soon stray survivors arrived, who told of the inconceivable hardships suffered by the army.

Frankfort was particularly interested in the complete collapse of Napoleon's schemes on the practical side. It is true, contents of the secret report of the paymaster general of the Grande Armee were still unknown. He had set out for the campaign with fifty-five cartloads of cash, drawn by four horses apiece, and seventy-eight clerks. He had been able to rescue only one cartload, containing two millions in gold, which he hoped to get safely to Konigsberg, but he was not even prepared to guarantee that.

"My staff," he reported,[16] "no longer exists; they have all perished from cold and hunger. Some of them whose hands and feet have been frozen have been left at Vilna. All the account books have been taken by the enemy. Nobody thinks of anything except saving his own skin, and it is quite impossible to stem the panic. . . ."

Amschel Rothschild, the eldest son, and now head of the Frankfort firm, was just engaged in building a new banking house in the Bornheimerstrasse at Frankfort. He was enormously excited by the news of Napoleon's collapse; in view of the firm's extensive operations, which, ranging from Spain to Denmark and from Prague to London, already embraced the half of Europe, such sudden changes affecting the distribution of power on the Continent of Europe were bound to have most far-reaching consequences. It is true that his firm had friends in both camps, but it was important that, if either of the political structures collapsed, or showed serious signs of instability, the center of gravity of the firm's business should be rapidly shifted to the victorious side.

However, things had not yet reached this point. Through his enormous energy, Napoleon succeeded in rapidly improvising a new army, with which he meant to turn the tide of events. Frankfort continued to be occupied by the French, and Rothschild had to go very warily.

It is true that everywhere in Germany people smelled freedom in the air. In the public streets of Hesse the cry was heard, "Long live the elector, long live Russia!" Napoleon's so-called allies in the Russian campaign fell away, one after the other. Prussia allied herself with Russia and declared war on France, and Napoleon felt exceedingly uncertain even about the attitude of Austria. In April Napoleon was again campaigning in Saxony, and in the operations of the year 1813 he won one or two brilliant victories, but could not drive his enemies completely out of the field.

The bond between these became closer as time went on. England again offered Prussia and Russia her all-powerful financial support. In the Treaty of Reichenbach of June 14, 1813, she offered Prussia £666,666 as a subsidy, if that kingdom would put eighty thousand men in the field. Russia received twice the amount for twice the amount of men. On August 10, after Metternich's world-famous interview with Napoleon, Austria's attitude was also decided. The minister, who had completely changed his policy, left the Emperor of France, whom he had once made the son-in-law of his emperor, in the lurch, and Austria joined the coalition against Napoleon.

The Elector of Hesse also watched the course of events with satisfaction from his exile at Prague. He again requested the Emperor of Austria to reinstate him as speedily as possible in his dominions. He felt that the end of his sufferings and persecutions was at hand.[17] He who had so often begged the emperor and Marie Louise to intercede with Napoleon on his behalf, now spoke of himself as the German prince who had remained true to the cause, and as the protagonist of the German nation (Verfechter des teutschen Reichs) ; he certainly did not forget to remind the emperor of the undertaking that he was to be "guaranteed against any loss." He was, however, glad to contribute temporarily to the common war-chest and to send troops to reinforce the allies. Buderus was instructed, in spite of the general shortage of money, to obtain the sums necessary for this purpose. He applied to the House of Rothschild, and received one hundred thousand thalers, which enabled the elector to make several payments to the allies.

The unity of front which had thus been established led to some success in the further course of the campaign. In spite of her constant financial embarrassments, Austria played an important military part in the war. England also came to her assistance, and under the Treaty Alliance of Teplitz of October 3, 1813, she contracted to pay after October of that year, a million pounds in monthly instalments, in return for which Austria undertook to place 150,000 men in the field.

The day of Leipzig, October 18, 1813, was the final turning-point in Napoleon's career. The great general was forced to yield to the powerful coalition. At one blow the whole of Germany was liberated up to the Rhine, the Confederation of the Rhine fell to pieces, the King of Westphalia fled, and Dalberg voluntarily resigned his grand ducal dignity at Frankfort. The exiled princes now returned to their states, and on November 11, the Elector of Hesse also left Prague and reached Cassel soon afterwards, where the populace received him with acclamations.

These events were propitious to the business policy of the House of Rothschild. The prince to whose riches they owed their prosperity, and with whom they stood on such a unique footing, thanks to the assistance of Buderus, had now been reinstated. He immediately set about making good his financial losses, and reestablishing his position amongst the princes of Germany. This naturally reacted favorably upon his court banker.

In other respects the position at Frankfort left much to be desired; the fall of Dalberg did not mean merely the loss of a personal patron; the Jews lost the man who had sold them rights which had placed them on an equality with other citizens. The final payment was not yet due, and there was the risk that the senate, which consisted of members of the old patrician families, would on getting into power again revoke all the concessions that had been so dearly bought. The old municipal constitution was reestablished, but without regularizing the legal position of the Jews; and it was a bad sign that the redemption of the debentures which were falling due under the contract for the purchase of their freedom was refused.[18]

There was only one way of dealing with the situation: the House of Rothschild would have to prove itself so useful through its financial services, to the most important powers of the victorious coalition, that the victors would call the citizens of Frankfort to order if they should really proceed to act with hostility against the Jews.

While the first principle of the House of Rothschild was to amass wealth, the liberation of the race from oppressive restrictions contributed indirectly to this end, since it would facilitate intercourse with the rest of the world, and thereby increase the possibility of financial gain, which in turn would serve to increase its power. At this critical time the most important services were rendered to the Frankfort firm, not by its new chief, but by his incomparably more talented brother Nathan, in England, whose flair for finance amounted to positive genius. He now enjoyed the elector's full confidence. When in 1812 the Prince Regent of England seemed to be inclined to repay £100,000, Nathan was instructed to receive this amount, and to invest it in consols. This transaction brought him into immediate touch with the private finances of the royal family.

As Great Britain was the financier of the powers which were fighting on the Continent, and was also maintaining armies of her own abroad, enormous demands were made on the British Treasury in 1813. The officials were not equal to the task of raising the money or of sending it to the Continent. It had already been necessary for a naturalized foreigner to demonstrate that there were other ways of raising and sending money than for Englishmen abroad to draw bills on England. That method had a very bad effect on the English rate of exchange, which at the end of 1813 had already fallen by one-third. Herries, who was charged with the sole responsibility for sending money to the Continent, again called in Nathan Rothschild to his assistance. While his principal problem was to supply the enormous sums that England had to provide under the subsidy contracts that she had just concluded, it was even more urgent and more important for the final overthrow of Napoleon to afford every possible support to Wellington, who was still pressing for money, but who was now free to advance into French territory, as Napoleon had transferred his best troops and generals to Germany.

Herries invited Nathan, whose name was still almost always wrongly spelled by the British Treasury, to a conference regarding the measures to be taken. The English official was completely convinced by the clarity and logic of the scheme for sending money which Nathan submitted, and requested him to draw up a memorandum for the chancellor of the exchequer, explaining the methods to be adopted for rendering prompt financial assistance to the Duke of Wellington. The technical problem was now somewhat different, since Wellington attached most importance to being supplied with French currency.

In the interests of England, as well as of his own pocket, Nathan had hitherto worked almost consistently against Napoleon; but he had done it as inconspicuously as possible for fear of compromising his brothers on the Continent. Even now that Napoleon was retreating, and was soon to be fighting within the former frontiers of France itself, he still kept well in the background, although he adopted the anti-Napoleonic cause with all the more enthusiasm, since the Russian disaster and the defeat at Leipzig seemed to imply the end of Napoleon's power. Lord Liverpool, first lord of the treasury and prime minister, and Vansittart, chancellor of the exchequer, approved the scheme submitted by Herries, and in a secret letter entrusted its execution to Nathan's experience and discretion.

Nathan Rothschild thereupon proceeded personally to Holland and collected, in close cooperation with his brothers, the French metal currency with which the Continent was flooded, but which, owing to the blockade, was naturally unobtainable in England.[19] James also acquired French cash on the spot in Paris, and managed to smuggle it across to his brothers in Holland. The sums thus collected were then shipped from the Dutch coast to Wellington's headquarters, this transaction becoming easier as his troops advanced from the west coast of France. In this way, a constant stream of gold and silver in current French coin flowed to the British army, which was thus enabled to pay in French money, whilst the allies, advancing from the east, were deprived of any such cash resources.

In the interests of the brothers Rothschild the secret was exceedingly well kept; Herries had every reason to be satisfied with his, and his country's relations with the foreign Jew, and did not grudge him the enormous profits which he was making. In later years Nathan himself stated that this was the best business he had ever done.[20]

Meanwhile the victorious allies had advanced beyond Frankfort, and had established their general headquarters in that city. The Emperor Alexander of Russia, the King of Prussia, and the Emperor Francis met in the ancient city where the Holy Roman Emperors were crowned. Metternich came with them, rejoicing in the triumph of his policy. The outward signs of the great change in the political situation were therefore particularly apparent at Frankfort, the home of the Rothschilds.

It is not surprising that the family regulated their future conduct accordingly. As yet they had had no relations with Austrian statesmen, but the brothers Rothschild now proceeded to sound members of the imperial entourage with a view to getting an opening. Accompanying Metternich was a previous acquaintance of theirs, Barbier, vice-president of the Austrian Treasury, who was responsible for the financial arrangements of the Austrian army. It was with him that the unsuccessful negotiations regarding the electoral loan had been carried on. Amschel accordingly called on him, and attempted although at first with little success to secure his interest and that of his powerful master Count von Metternich.

The name of Metternich was now on everybody's lips. The success of his policy had enormously strengthened the minister's position. It was a fair assumption that in the future he would exercise a very decisive influence in all matters affecting Austria, even in financial matters, although they did not come strictly within his province. In spite of his other outstanding qualities, Metternich had not a sound economic sense, either in public matters or in his private affairs. He spent money rather thoughtlessly and extravagantly on his private account, and his natural inclination was to make finance secondary to foreign policy, rather than the reverse.[21]

The Emperor Francis had repeatedly come to the rescue of his minister with personal loans, and had waived their repayment later.[22] Metternich had also frequently had recourse to various bankers, including such Frankfort bankers as Bethmann and the brothers Miihlen. As far as can be ascertained, he had had neither official nor personal relations with the Rothschild family before the year 1813.

Metternich was conscious of his own uncertainty in financial matters, and therefore relied largely on the advice of his indispensable secretary and counselor, the brilliant publicist Frederick von Gentz. This man had got to know the count intimately during the years 1802-1803, while he was still in the Prussian civil service and Metternich, who recognized his distinguished literary talent, was ambassador at Dresden; and it was Metternich who induced him to transfer to the Austrian civil service.

Gentz was even worse than Metternich at managing his private affairs, and unlike the count, was completely unscrupulous in getting money from anybody he could, from his own or from foreign states, from persons who desired orders or titles, and wherever opportunity offered. In spite of this, and of the fact that he often managed to earn considerable sums of money with his pen, he was in a constant state of financial embarrassment owing to his extravagant manner of life, and was repeatedly on the verge of complete ruin. This, however, did not prevent him from being always on the most intimate terms with all the great men of his day, with poets and statesmen, with princes and the higher nobility, as well as with Jewish bankers and merchants.

Humboldt knew him well, and Goethe was interested in him too. Humboldt wrote to Goethe on one occasion:[23] "You have perhaps heard that a few weeks ago poor Gentz went completely bankrupt. It is weakness, and not extravagance that has brought him to this pass." Later events were to give the lie to this statement of Humboldt's; it would scarcely have been possible for anyone to dissipate money more thoughtlessly and extravagantly than Gentz.

In spite of these personal characteristics, Gentz had a bent for political economy, and had taken a very good course in that subject in England, where he stayed for some time. While studying in that country he had made the personal acquaintance of Herries, who translated several of his writings into English, and maintained a correspondence with him. He also told him of the firm of Rothschild. Gentz did not stay with Metternich at general headquarters, but he corresponded with him constantly on financial matters.

The Austrian state was again urgently in need of funds for continuing hostilities, as it had been decided to carry the war into the enemy's country across the Rhine. The immediate problem was to convert into cash the remaining instalments of the subsidies from England. This had been done hitherto by the four Viennese banking firms, but the government was not very satisfied with their services, and Gentz, for personal reasons apparently, was not on good terms with them. He therefore wrote to Metternich to say that as far as he was aware, the four Viennese firms had no exclusive right to conduct the financial affairs of the state, and recommended the Frankfort banker von Herz. But he too proved to be very disappointing; he succeeded in making several hundred thousand for himself, but got rid of the bills at absurdly low rates, thereby also damaging English credit. The problem as to who should carry through these transactions still remained to be solved.

A letter from Count Ugarte to Metternich indicated how much they were exercised as to the best means of getting the English money over.[24] Ugarte observed that in the past the English government had generally sent the subsidies in cash, and in gold and silver bars, while only a small portion of them had been realized through "mercantile" channels. Now, however, that the precious metals were scarce in England too, this was difficult to arrange.

"We have to reckon," he wrote, "that on the average at least a third of the subsidies will be lost on the rate of exchange, and this is another reason for trying to get the amount of the subsidies increased to as high a figure as possible, since, if for example six millions are sent over, we shall only be able to realize four millions at the outside." This remark of one of the highest Austrian government officials clearly reveals how governments were taken advantage of in such transactions, and what huge profits were derived in the course of remitting these sums from England to the Continent.

Now there were several cogent reasons for the employment of Frankfort firms. They naturally did what they could to bring influence to bear in this direction, on Metternich and his advisers, and Ambassador Baron von Hugel pleaded the cause of the Frankfort bankers. He had already on a previous occasion written to Count Stadion to say that of all the cities in Germany, Frankfort ought to be specially considered in connection with the financial measures of the imperial court. He said that there was no commercial center in Europe that would collaborate as readily as Frankfort in efforts to improve Austria's credit.

To crown all, Metternich simultaneously received a dispatch from the ambassador in London, Baron von Wessenberg, stating that the four Vienna firms had hopelessly mismanaged the realization of the English bills of exchange.[25] They had made the mistake of instructing no less than four firms on the same day and in the same market, to obtain bills on Paris and Amsterdam, so that their joint action naturally forced up the rate of exchange.

The imperial treasury had thereby incurred a loss of thousands of pounds, which would have been avoided if the business had been carried through by a single firm which would not have feared the competition of its rivals. In accordance with a memorandum of Metternich's, the Emperor Francis issued a letter[26] in which he strongly enjoined the persons concerned to expedite the realization of the English subsidies as far as this could be done without incurring substantial loss. He also commanded that careful investigations were to be made as to the most advantageous method of procedure, adding that since he understood from a trustworthy source that the four firms had not handled the matter in a practical way, and the business could be carried through much more profitably from Frankfort, no further contracts should be made with those firms unless it could be shown that that was the best and most certain method of achieving the desired object.

Ugarte had requested the four banking firms to send in a written reply to the statement contained in Wessenberg's report, since he himself was inclined to support them, as they charged a commission of only one-quarter per cent; and he instructed Barbier at Frankfort to report as to whether the bills could really have been cashed at a much higher figure in that city. At this point Metternich intervened, also urging that Frankfort should be considered. Thereupon Ugarte summoned a secret commission at Vienna, and this commission naturally pronounced in favor of the four well-established local banking firms, whose credit stood high and who could be controlled more effectively, as they were on the spot.[27]

Meanwhile imperial headquarters had been shifted to Freiburg in Switzerland, where Gentz joined Metternich. In view of the conflict of opinion the emperor Francis dealt with the matter by instructing Ugarte to do nothing for the present.[28] But as in the early months of 1814 the allied armies advanced into France from all directions and the statesmen of the allied powers were busily engaged alternately in fighting and negotiating with Napoleon, it was all that they could do to raise the money necessary for the further conduct of the war.

The firm of Rothschild at Frankfort made every effort to get into touch with the Austrian government which was so sadly in need of funds, and they knew through Nathan that it received large sums from England. Nathan did all he could to achieve this object, and had already secured the support of Herries. At the beginning of 1814 Amschel Rothschild at Frankfort succeeded in obtaining the order to issue the pay of the imperial officers who were passing through or stationed in Frankfort, the accounts to be settled by the Austrian paymasters. That was at any rate a start.

Meantime the shortage of money at army headquarters in Freiburg had become acute. The army needed as much as two million gulden a month, so that further English subsidies, which the English government had agreed to under the Treaty of Chaumont, were exceedingly welcome. Austria was to receive £1,666,666 2/3 or a monthly payment of £138,888 2/3. In point of fact there was never occasion to pay out this sum, for the allies soon gained a decisive victory over Napoleon, and entered Paris on March 31; whereupon, after Napoleon's abdication, the first Peace of Paris was signed.

The elector immediately sent his sincerest congratulations to the emperor as the liberator of Europe, as usual accompanying this expression of feeling with a request that he should be compensated for his losses.[29] The elector had been a profitable example to the Rothschild family. He was always importuning the authorities to protect his interests, but he did so in rather an aggressive manner, whereas the Rothschild brothers, though no less persevering, always contrived so to frame their requests that they seemed to be concerned only for the interests of the state or the person with whom the decision lay.

Austria had already received the English payments due to her for the first three months of the year. The instalments for April and May were still due, as well as two payments for the return of the army, a total of £555,-555 1/3, the remittance of which amount had to be arranged. The firm of Rothschild put in for this business, and in order to support it, Herries had proposed to Vienna that Austria should arrange for the money to be sent through Frankfort. In agreement with Nathan Rothschild, the Englishman, who regarded Frankfort as the most important financial center in Germany, had appointed his own plenipotentiary in that city, a certain Chevalier von Limburger, who was to conduct any negotiations regarding subsidies. He was a German Jew, and the proprietor of an important tobacco factory in Leipzig, but he enjoyed the confidence of the English commissary-general Herries.

Meanwhile the Rothschild brothers had been ceaselessly urging Barbier, who was still staying at Frankfort, to avail himself of the services of their firm for the financial affairs of the Austrian imperial government. They now decided, with the assistance of Herries and Limburger, on launching a final attack. On July 28, 1814,[30] two of the Rothschilds called on Barbier on behalf of the firm in general, and informed him that they had received instructions from the Chevalier von Limburger, the plenipotentiary of the English commissary-general, to ask whether Herries's proposals regarding the settlement of the balance due to Austria of the English subsidies for 1814 had been accepted at Vienna or not. At the same time the brothers Rothschild handed him a letter in which they offered their services in that connection. The letter was:[31]

Your Excellency:

In accordance with the permission graciously granted to us, we have the honor to offer your Highness our most obedient service and most humbly beg your Excellency to honor us with your high confidence, and to commission us to realize your claims on London. As our brother is himself established in London, we can easily make use of bills on that city, and enjoy many advantages which enable us always to obtain the best price. Your Excellency has had occasion to observe that we have acquired large sums from London and Vienna, with the intention of ourselves profiting by such exceptional circumstances. If your Excellency will lend a favorable ear to our petition we shall undertake most faithfully to serve your interests and to prove the high value that we attach to your Excellency's gracious goodwill, and, in return for our efforts and our services we shall be absolutely satisfied with the customary trade commission. . . . Comforting ourselves that you will favorably accede to our request, we beg to remain with all due respect,

Your Excellency's most obedient servants,
MEYER AMSCHEL ROTHSCHILD AND SONS.

Not long afterwards they wrote again, more succinctly: "We beg most submissively to inform your Excellency that today we are paying at the rate of 132 to the pound (on July 28 it would only have been 127) and that we are appropriating £200,000 for this purpose, and beg your confirmation of our action."[32]
Barbier forwarded the two communications to Ugarte at Vienna, and felt it his duty to add that in his opinion the offer should not be accepted, as Viennese firms and Austrian subjects were entitled to be considered. He suggested, however, that the proposals of Herries and Limburger should be considered, even if the Rothschilds' were not.[33] Barbier did not know at the time that the motive behind their proposals, although hitherto they had only recommended Frankfort in general and had not specifically mentioned the firm of Rothschild, was to secure that the whole business should be taken over by the House of Rothschild.

He was soon to be enlightened on this point; Carl Rothschild left him no peace. On August 5 he had another interview with Barbier, and gave it as his opinion that the English rate of exchange was then very favorable. He stated that he had received a communication from Limburger on the previous day and, in accordance therewith, he desired to make a definite and advantageous offer in writing regarding the realization of the further subsidies due to Austria.

Barbier reported this offer to Vienna, adding that he had taken no steps to conclude the arrangement, and ended by saying: "The House of Rothschild now does more business in English paper than all other firms put together, and this may be largely due to the fact that one member of the firm is established in London and another in Paris, and that the firm has to carry through several substantial remittances of money on account of the English government itself."[34]

The fundamental idea at the back of Herries's mind, a plan that Nathan had inspired, was that in view of the English government's unfortunate experience of the methods of middlemen, it should itself control the realization of the subsidies, and thereby prevent the frustration of its efforts for improving the English rate of exchange. Whilst Nathan supported Herries in these efforts, he profited by the occasion to get his firm established with the continental powers, and to induce Herries to entrust him with the remittance of the English subsidies to the three greatest powers, mindful that the connections thereby resulting would enable the firm in the course of time to secure other important business with the financial administrations of those powers. In this way he hoped gradually to secure for his firm a privileged position as state bankers to the four principal powers that were engaged in defeating Napoleon. A letter from the firm of Rothschild to Barbier, dated Frankfort, August 8, 1814,[35] while making constant refences to Herries and Limburger, already entered into details concerning the remittance of the remaining £500,-000, this serving as an introduction to the following proposal, which concluded the letter: "If your Excellency should be prepared to regard this unofficial proposal as acceptable, we would not fail to inform Herr von Limburger of your views, after which we may be in a position most dutifully to submit a formal offer."

Whereas Barbier and the treasury official Schwinner, who was on his staff, had hitherto dealt only with such firms as Bethmann, Metzler, Wertheimber, etc., the firm of Rothschild had now entered the field with the determination to drive all rivals out of it. The offer was duly sent in and forwarded to Vienna by Barbier. At the same time he observed to Rothschild that it was too vague to be accepted, and that this was not an ordinary banking transaction subject to the usual business risks, but was based on the proposal of the English commissary-general, and was therefore of an official nature.

Rothschild replied that Limburger was shortly coming to Paris, and that he had therefore not been able to frame his proposals more definitely. The Austrian Treasury would not have to pay any commission in respect to such transactions, although in all similar business which his firm had had to carry through for the English government, it had received a commission of two per cent. All he wanted was an opportunity to demonstrate his zeal on behalf of the imperial court.

Rothschild proceeded to enter into details as to the method by which he proposed to carry through the transaction, as he was hereby able incidentally to relate that the firm of Rothschild had already carried through similar business on an enormous scale for Russia and Prussia. At that time England had to pay ten million thalers to Russia and five million to Prussia. She agreed that this payment should not be immediately effected by bills of exchange, but should be made in monthly instalments of a million thalers.

It was further indicated that if the two states required the money at an earlier date, bankers could temporarily advance the amount. Knowing of this term in the contract, Nathan had told his brothers at Frankfort immediately to advance money to Prussia and Russia. These advances were actually made, so that at his interview with Barbier, Rothschild was able proudly to inform him that his firm had advanced to the Russian court four million gulden in cash and that his elder brother Solomon had gone to Berlin to carry through this important business.

A few days later Rothschild further informed Barbier,[36] with the object of impressing him, that his firm had received payments of the value of 750,000 francs in English crowns, and that this amount could also be applied to a settlement of the subsidies.

In the meantime, Count Ugarte's reply to Barbier's communications of July 28 and August 1, in which Barbier had first informed him of Rothschild's offers, was received. "As your Excellency . . . quite rightly observes," wrote the count, "it will be more profitable and safe for Austria in realizing the English subsidies to use native firms that enjoy the protection of her government, than to have recourse to foreign firms, over which her government has no control, and in which one cannot have the confidence . . . necessary for such extensive operations, as one would have no control over their activities, and they would not be able to offer security for the very considerable sums entrusted to them." Ugarte also expressed the view that in any case it would appear more advantageous to discount the English bills at Vienna, as the pound in that city was dealt in at nine gulden, three kreutzers, whereas, according to the latest report, it was only worth nine gulden at Frankfort. "There can therefore be no question," he continued, "of accepting the firm of Rothschild's offer to take over twenty thousand pounds sterling at the price they have suggested, of 8.48 gulden." [37]

The Rothschild proposal was therefore declined for the time being. Ugarte had failed to be convinced, and even Barbier had not been won over by the Brothers Rothschild. However, they did not lie down under this refusal. As they knew that the English government was working through Commissary-General Herries, on whom Nathan was bringing all his influence to bear, to get these financial transactions entrusted to them, they never thought of relaxing their efforts in that direction.

Limburger had just arrived at Frankfort with new instructions from England, and Amschel thereupon wrote personally to Barbier:

Most honored sir, gracious vice-president!
We have the honor most dutifully to inform your Excellency, in accordance with instructions, that the Chevalier von Limburg has arrived here with the purpose of negotiating with the three ministers or comishairs (sic) of the high powers, regarding the outstanding subsidy, we repeat our request for your high commands, and are with great respect and devotion
Your Excellency's most obedient servants
MEYER AMSCHEL ROTHSCHILD & SONS.
Frankfort, August 22, 1814.[38]

The uneducated style of this letter, written by a member of the second generation of the family, since it had risen into prominence, contrasted strongly with other communications from the firm, which were only signed by one of the chiefs. Such communications indeed, in contrast with the practice of most bankers of that time, were always models of style and calligraphy, and therefore very easily read and understood—a fact which made a good impression on the government departments, who appreciated them as being above the usual standard. When, however, a Rothschild unexpectedly took the pen into his own hands, his style and spelling immediately revealed the low standard of education obtaining in their father's house. This did not, however, prove to be the slightest obstacle to the development of their commercial gifts. It merely provoked understanding smiles from the diplomats and highly placed persons with whom they had to deal.

As Austria was not inclined to accept the Rothschild offers, greater pressure had to be brought to bear by England, and it was decided accordingly to send Limburger to Vienna.[39] The statement that Carl Rothschild had made to Barbier, regarding his firm's financial dealings with Prussia and Russia, was in accordance with the facts. Herries had gone to Paris to carry through the subsidy negotiations with the representatives of the powers personally, and to convert them to Nathan's system under which the subsidy payments would not be effected by drawing bills on London at considerable loss to both parties, but through payments quietly carried through by the brothers Rothschild on the Continent.

In Paris, James Rothschild, who was most familiar in that city, had placed himself at the disposal of the commissary-general, and he was in turn introduced by Herries to the representatives of the victorious powers who were staying there. As a negotiator was required for the discussions at Berlin, Solomon was instructed to travel from Frankfort to the Prussian capital, and carry on the detailed negotiations there. In this way the five brothers played cleverly into each other's hands, and just as their father had contemplated, gave one another complementary support in all undertakings.

France had undertaken, under a convention dated May 28, 1814, to pay the allied powers twenty-five million francs as a lump sum, representing contributions that had not been levied and stores that had been left behind. Austria's share of this money was eight and two-thirds million francs. France deposited as securities for this amount, papers known as bons royaux, and the firm of Rothschild immediately applied for the business of cashing these in Paris at a commission of one-half per cent.

Rothschild again called on Barbier, and attempted to secure this business for his firm, as far as Austria was concerned, too. He was careful to mention that he had already been entrusted with a similar transaction by Russia, and that 250,000 new Dutch Rand ducats which were destined for Russia had already been deposited with his firm.

He brought a written application in support of his suggestion, and submitted to Barbier letters from the most important business firms in Paris,[40] from which it appeared that monetary conditions were so easy that the bonds could be negotiated at a very desirable rate at that time.

"If you should be graciously pleased," the letter ran, "to take advantage of these favorable circumstances, and to entrust us with the discounting of the bons royaux belonging to the royal and imperial government, you shall have no cause to complain of the industry and care with which our brother who is living in Paris will carry through this business. We would always duly pay over to your Excellency exactly what we received for the securities, subject to the customary commission of one-half per cent, with which we should be fully satisfied."

Without replying to the brothers Rothschild, Barbier submitted this letter, with some relevant observations of his own, to Ugarte, adding that certain other firms, including Bethmann, had also applied for the business.[41]

The Rothschilds were endeavoring at the same time to secure a third piece of business which was just then offered. An agreement had been arrived at between the Prussian finance minister and the Austrian Governor-General of Belgium, under which a sum of 9,500,000 francs was to be paid by the Belgian Treasury to the three eastern powers in equal proportions, on account of the expenses of occupation. Knowing of this arrangement, one of the brothers dropped the remark casually, in the presence of Barbier, that the firm of Rothschild had recently sent eighty thousand gold napoleons to Brussels, and would shortly have to transmit to that city further large sums of money on England's account.[42]

Barbier recollected the fact that Austria was to receive this payment in Belgium, and in view of what he had just heard, he thought it would be well for the firm of Rothschild to deal with this matter and asked whether they would undertake the business. Rothschild immediately pledged himself to pay out any amount which he received in Brussels in francs, in thalers or good bills of exchange at Frankfort, after deducting one-half per cent commission.

Barbier was entirely dependent on Vienna in such matters; he had first to report to Count Ugarte, and wait for his decision. At that time, quite an interval had to elapse before a reply could be received to a letter, and government departments were also exceedingly slow in dealing with correspondence. The brothers Rothschild submitted a detailed plan to Barbier, regarding the remittance of the money from Brussels on July 29, concluding with the words:[43] "We shall request your Excellency one-half per cent commission for our expenses and trouble, beyond which you will not have to bear any further expense whatever. If, on the arrival of the money here, we can secure more favorable terms for your Excellency, we shall certainly not fail to furnish you with such proofs of our disinterestedness."

The use of the word "disinterested" is not entirely to be sneered at. Often, especially when as in this instance they desired to gain a new customer, the firm of Rothschild was wont to emphasize that it was particularly concerned with the interests of the other party to the transaction, and business was often undertaken at a quite modest profit, sometimes even at a loss, with a view to securing much more important business at a future date, whereby any such loss would be made good. It was exactly the same principle that old Rothschild had applied in his dealings with the Elector of Hesse, when at the beginning of their connection he sold him coins and antiques far under their real value. This principle had paid, for by 1814 the Rothschilds were doing business that ran into millions.

Barbier faithfully transmitted to Vienna all the offers that were made to him, and received Ugarte's reply a month later.[44] This was not favorable to the foreign Jews, and showed a preference for relying on native bankers. He could not, however, entirely ignore Barbier's suggestion regarding the transfer of the money from Brussels. He therefore wrote to say that he considered Rothschild's offer to be generally acceptable, but limited the amount which they were to handle to about one-half of the total; and in order to avoid all risk he instructed Barbier to arrange with the firm of Rothschild that the receipt for payment at the treasury in Brussels should not be handed to them until the sum had been paid in cash or in good Augsburg bills, or appropriate security had been furnished.

Barbier hastened to arrange an interview with the firm of Rothschild, and with the firm of Gontard, who were collaborating with them, but he could not persuade them to agree to carry through the business on such terms. In spite of their desire to enter into relations with Austria, they wanted at least to have the advantage of being able to dispose of such a large sum for a short space of time, during which they could have employed it very profitably within the scope of their numerous activities. They were also somewhat offended at such a demonstration of lack of faith.

"The heads of these firms observed to me on this point," wrote Barbier to Ugarte, "that these conditions were not at all customary in such transactions, and might indeed be prejudicial to their credit; that certainly no other firm would accept such conditions, and that in a business in which they were charging only an exceedingly modest commission, they could not make advances in cash . . . especially at a time when they had so many other opportunities of employing their funds much more profitably. Rothschild further remarked that much greater sums were entrusted to him by the English government, and that other governments also did not fail to accord him similar confidence, while several millions of gulden that belonged to the Elector of Hesse-Cassel and were invested in government loans in London, Vienna, etc. were simply inscribed in his name."

Barbier admitted the general justice of the Rothschilds' contention, but said he could not take bills that had not been accepted or indorsed by a substantial firm as in that case he would have no security except the property of the drawer, "although," as he wrote, "the firm of Rothschild, as well as that of Gontard, are known to have very solid resources, and, together with several other firms in the 'second class' as regards their resources . . . enjoy a very good reputation and a no less extensive credit."

Bethmann, with whom Barbier next negotiated, stated that he would be doing the business at a loss, and that he must ask for a higher commission. On Barbier pointing out that Rothschild had only asked for one-half per cent, and that Bethmann must therefore realize that it would be difficult to get a higher commission approved, Bethmann replied that Rothschild could carry through the business much more easily than he could, because he had to make considerable payments to the English troops in the Netherlands, on account of the English government, Limburger also, to whom Barbier applied, refused to handle the business, since his authority extended only to the payment to the three allied courts of the English subsidy still outstanding. At the same time he remarked that in accordance with the instructions which he had received, he was leaving the subsidy business to the direction and personal supervision of the firm of Rothschild, since these transactions required the cooperation of an active banker with very good connections; and that that firm had actually to make considerable payments for the English troops and would therefore be able more easily than any other to deal with the remittances in question.

In spite of this new offensive in favor of the House of Rothschild, the business was entrusted to Bethmann, on the ground that the property of that house was "well known to be so great as to require no other security than a duly binding contract or a debenture." This was a triumph of Bethmann over Rothschild, and it was due to the fact that the importance and financial greatness of the firm of Rothschild, which at that time was still of very recent date, was not appreciated at Vienna, and even Barbier had more faith in the old Christian firm of Bethmann than in the upstart Jewish firm.

Nathan was annoyed at this failure, but was all the more obstinately determined to gain his object. However, before this could happen, Ugarte would have to make way for a new man at Vienna, Count Stadion, and Barbier would have to be won over, which was not accomplished until 1815, in Paris. For the moment, the assiduous attempts of the firm of Rothschild to obtain big business with Austria had failed, and it had to content itself with the modest duties of handling the Austrian war-commissariat account at Frankfort, which indeed served to maintain its connection with the financial departments of the Austrian government.

From the foregoing description of the nature of the business transactions of the Rothschild family, it is evident that they were mainly concerned with overcoming the tremendous difficulties to which international monetary dealings were subject, owing to the political conditions of those days and the backward state of communications.

Baron von Hugel's elaborate report[45] as to the way in which a sum of 8,353 gulden and 74 kreutzers could most safely and cheaply be sent from Frankfort to Vienna, makes strange reading today. At first he wanted to entrust the amount to a non-commissioned officer who was leaving for the imperial city with a consignment of official documents; but on reflection he thought it was too dangerous to entrust such a large sum to a soldier, as one could never tell what chance accidents might befall him on the way, and endanger the property confided to him.

After such pondering Hugel finally had recourse to the Rothschilds, and asked them whether they could not issue a bill on Vienna for the amount. The firm replied that they were prepared to issue such a document, and to make it a bill payable at sight, but that they would have to charge a commission of one per cent, a sum of 83.30 gulden, which sum was certainly less than the cost of sending the remittance by post-chaise. Such special circumstances yielded opportunities of profit which the Rothschild family most skilfully exploited by establishing a kind of clearing-house between the three brothers in London, Paris, and Frankfort; and this system was soon extended to Vienna.

Nathan was the father of this idea. Although the third son, he was more and more tending to become the directing brain of the firm. His association with Herries, who relied upon him to an increasing extent, although concealed from the public became increasingly intimate and more profitable both politically and financially. The services rendered by Nathan, not only covered an extensive field, but were also most varied in their nature. After the fall of Napoleon, to which Nathan's financial measures in support of the Allies and of Wellington had contributed not a little, his business expanded in a quite unprecedented manner. Thereupon he immediately availed himself of every opportunity of rendering services to the Bourbons, who had returned to France with the support of the Allies, thus smoothing the path for his brother James in Paris.

The exiled Bourbon heir, who was later King Louis XVIII, had been living at Hartwell in Buckinghamshire since 1807. When the Allies invaded France in 1814, he appealed to his divine right to the throne, and decided to go to Paris immediately after the fall of Napoleon. However, he lacked the money necessary to undertake the journey and make his appearance in France with the magnificence proper to a king. The king applied to the English Treasury, requesting it to advance the necessary capital. As French currency and bills on Paris were required, the application was sent to Herries to deal with, and he called in Nathan.

Nathan was delighted to have such an early opportunity of proving himself useful to Louis XVIII, and with the assistance of his brother James in Paris he acquired bills payable in that city, to the value of 200,000 English pounds.[46] He placed them speedily at the disposal of the new king, and thus made it possible for him to land at Calais on April 26, 1814, and to enter Paris on May 3.

Although to Herries's considerable satisfaction, Nathan carefully preserved the close veil of secrecy covering his activities, and let Herries get most of the credit, whilst he contented himself with the commercial profit and the fact that the transactions served to introduce him to other governments, on this occasion Nathan was careful to see that the newly established monarch learned of his share in the transaction. For this seemed to him to be of great importance for the future position of the firm of Rothschild in France.

The development of this branch business was to be entrusted to James, who had already made himself at home in Paris, and who was widely traveled, although he was only twenty-two years old at the time. His appearance, it is true, was not exactly prepossessing. He looked very Jewish; he had red hair and deep-set eyes, and a good complexion, but he had a wide mouth, a prominent hooked nose, and pursed-up lips. During his earlier years in Paris, he showed an almost servile politeness to everyone. He had obviously acquired the habit at Frankfort, where the status of the Jews was very low, but as he grew more successful and his position improved he gradually lost it. Moreover, James was an exceedingly acute, honorable, and clever banker, whose talents can be rated only a little below those of his brother Nathan. Above all, he had a fair share of the other's abundant energy.

In the life of feverish activity which developed in Paris after the conquest of that city, when officers, diplomats, bankers, and business men flocked to it from all sides, James was absolutely in his element. He was seen everywhere, in government offices as well as on the Bourse and in diplomatic circles,[47] and made great efforts to establish himself in society. He actively supported Herries and his brother Nathan in their efforts to cash the English subsidies without depressing the rate of exchange, and Nathan was able to show in a report to the English Treasury that hundreds of thousands were saved by the new method.[48]

Under the Paris Treaty of May 10, 1814, the French government had undertaken to meet certain obligations incurred by responsible officials, either in France itself or in the conquered territories. To collect these amounts the creditors found it necessary to employ middlemen. James was appointed as the agent of numerous banks and organizations that had claims of this nature, and he was also engaged in the interests of the Elector of Hesse and other minor German princes.

His personal mode of life was exceedingly modest. He lived above a small courtyard, although his business dealings had not only won him the respect of commercial circles but had also brought him substantial profit. He had already decided ultimately to settle in Paris, just as Nathan had taken up permanent residence in England. He was, however, not in such a hurry as his brother to get naturalized, partly because he wanted to watch the course of developments in France after the stormy time of the revolution and the Napoleonic period; and since France could not at that time place any obstacles in the way of a subject of the victorious powers, he wanted to register his own firm in Paris. If occasion should arise the powers were always ready to exert diplomatic pressure in favor of their subjects. James did in fact register his business without getting naturalized, his name appearing in the Paris trade almanac for 1814 as resident in the rue de Pelletier.

Whilst the House of Rothschild was getting well established in Western Europe through the activities of the two brothers, in its native town it had to fight for recognition, owing to the aversion of the citizens to the Jews. The growing wealth of the Rothschild family at the expense of Christian firms was viewed with displeasure at Frankfort. Buderus had completely succeeded in eliminating their rivals. The firm of Van Notten at Amsterdam had put up a fight longest, but that firm, also. failed to survive Buderus's systematic propaganda with the elector.

In a letter dated May 13, 1814, Buderus had written to the electoral plenipotentiary Lorentz, at London, expressing his dislike of that firm in the following words:[49] "The worthy bankers Van Notten must be small-minded people. On one occasion, when I was very hard-pressed because I was waiting for assistance from England, I drew £35,000 on them. They showed the most extraordinary anxiety about the repayment of this sum. I hope they are now easy in their minds. The Rothschild bankers at Frankfort, on the other hand, have advanced over half a million, and have rendered services of every kind in a cheerful spirit." Buderus did not fail to express similar views to the elector, so that the rivals of the brothers Rothschild had the ground completely cut from under their feet as far as the Hessian prince was concerned.

The Frankfort Jews had nothing to fear from Austria and Prussia. When Grand Duke Dalberg left Frankfort, the firm of Rothschild was a creditor of his for considerable sums, including the following items: 22,900 gulden for supplying flour to France; 71,181 gulden advanced in connection with the transactions affecting the Fulda property; and 50,000 gulden advanced to Dalberg On account of the Jewish tax commutation payment, which was not yet due.[50] Baron von Hugel, who after the occupation of Frankfort took part in its civil administration, charged all these claims to the city budget, on Amschel's application, to the great indignation of the senate. The city finances were in a state of confusion, but the claims of the House of Rothschild seem to have been satisfied.

The inhabitants of Frankfort particularly grudged the Jews the equal political rights, which they had obtained, it was held, by methods of indirect bribery. The threatened attitude of their native town caused the brothers Rothschild to be seriously concerned about the future of the parent company on which their power was founded. They decided to make every effort to prevent the Jews of Frankfort from losing any of those rights which they had bought during Dalberg's regime.

The new constitution of Frankfort, and therefore the decision regarding the future status of the Jews, was one of the questions to be settled by the Vienna Congress, which was to meet on October 1, 1814. The choice of Vienna was not very acceptable to the Rothschilds, for Austria was the state which had hitherto so obstinately refused to enter into close business relations with them, and her statesmen, such as Ugarte, still did not really trust the upstart Jewish firm at Frankfort. Moreover, the Rothschilds well knew the strict police control to which foreign Jews were subjected at Vienna, and how greatly all Jews were restricted in their freedom to do business in Austria. As they were determined, however, to secure the desired business connections with the Austrian state, they were not tempted to make the realization of their plan more difficult through possible conflicts with the police authorities at Vienna.

Such considerations caused the House of Rothschild to refrain from sending a member of the family there. The Frankfort Israelites sent old Bornes, Jacob Baruch, and J. J. Gumprecht, as their representatives. They were closely watched by the Viennese police; indeed their expulsion was ordered and sanctioned by the emperor himself; but Metternich intervened, and prevented this from being carried out. Metternich's intervention was probably due to the fact that he had known Baruch when he was ambassador at Frankfort. There is no proof that Rothschild had any particular influence with the minister at that time.

The Jewish representatives at Vienna adopted the method of giving presents; thus they offered Humboldt three magnificent emerald rings, or four thousand ducats. —presents which he refused, whereas Gentz gladly allowed himself to be bribed. The brothers Rothschild had of course contributed to these funds; but they still kept quite in the background.

The general discussions of the proud assemblage of princes and diplomats at Vienna took their course, and sometimes went through critical phases. At one time, indeed, it seemed as though two main groups of powers would form, the differences between which threatened war. This seemed to Napoleon, who was fully informed at Elba of all developments, to be a suitable moment for putting into execution his plans of returning and regaining the throne.

On March 1, he landed on French soil with a handful of faithful adherents. Three weeks later the magic of his name had reinstated him in the palace of the Tuileries in Paris. Louis XVIII and his court had fled from the capital. Napoleon hoped, not only that the Congress of Vienna would collapse, but that some of the powers represented there would adopt his cause. Actually nothing of the kind occurred. While negotiations at Vienna had hitherto hung fire, it was now clear to everybody that delay was dangerous and that quick action was essential. The powers unanimously turned against the disturber of the peace, and determined on concerted action.

The other matters were settled hastily; and half-measures were sanctioned, such as the constitution of the German Confederation. This formed thirty-nine communities into a confederation of states, each one of which was to remain independent, while having a common governing body, with Austria presiding over the Federal Diet, whose seat was to be Frankfort-on-the-Main. It was in Metternich's interest to keep Germany disunited. Controversial matters such as the Jewish problem were to be discussed later by the Federal Diet, while in the meantime existing arrangements were to remain unaltered in the individual states. Metternich informed the plenipotentiaries of the Israelite communities in Germany of this decision,[51] assuring them that the Federal Diet would respect the welfare of the Israelites and that he himself would urge that full rights of citizenship be conferred on the Jews. This was good news, and the delegates hastened to send a copy of Metternich's statement to the House of Rothschild, anxiously waiting tidings at Frankfort. However, the time had not yet come to raise this question. It was far more important to overthrow Napoleon, who was again collecting his military resources in France. On March 25, 1815, the four principal powers had renewed their alliance. Each of them undertook to provide one hundred and fifty thousand men, except England, which undertook to send subsidies instead of the full amount of troops.

Napoleon was to be finally destroyed by a joint effort. It was therefore again necessary to arrange to transfer the subsidy payments from England to the various continental powers, and substantial sums would have to be paid to Prussia and Austria. Prussia particularly was again in great financial embarrassment, and unless this were immediately relieved, her future military action would suffer. Herries and Nathan now redoubled their feverish activities. Toward the end of April, Nathan sent in one instalment the sum of £200,000 to the Prussian government. It was conveyed by Solomon, who traveled to Berlin for this purpose. When this amount proved inadequate, Solomon without previously consulting Nathan, granted a further advance of £150,000 on the security of the English subsidy, at a rate which was certainly very profitable to himself.

Herries retrospectively sanctioned this operation. Not only did he make no objection, but he also allowed England to assume the considerable loss on exchange which Solomon's high rate of profit had meant for the Prussian government.[52] His profit was not Solomon's only gain on this transaction; in return for his ready willingness to advance such a heavy sum on his own responsibility, the Prussian government conferred on him the title of commercial adviser, a distinction that raised him above the majority of his rivals.

Meanwhile in Austria a change had taken place in the direction of the government's finances. Count Ugarte had retired, his place being taken by Count Stadion, the gifted and eminent statesman who was such a bitter opponent of Napoleon. Having hitherto been engaged exclusively in diplomatic matters, he had not as yet made himself familiar with finance. He therefore entered upon his new office with some misgivings. Grillparzer, who thought so highly of Stadion that he described him as having more character[53] than any other person he had ever met, noted in his diary [54] that Stadion had himself admitted to possessing very little knowledge of finance.[55] In spite of his greatness in other directions, a finance minister such as this would naturally seem an easy mark for clever bankers and financiers who were out to get business. In view of the change of atmosphere at Vienna and the added prospect of new English subsidies, the brothers Rothschild immediately made themselves felt again, both indirectly through Herries and Limburger, and by direct applications to the Austrian government.

However, Stadion as yet knew little about them, and as Nathan's heavy transactions were still purposely kept in the background, he had no information about these either, so that his whole knowledge regarding the origin and business of the House of Rothschild was exceedingly vague. He suddenly noticed that Meyer Amschel and Sons described themselves as "I. and R. Crown Agents" in a letter, and signed themselves as such. Stadion inquired at the Foreign Office about this from Metternich - who had been advanced to the rank of prince after the battle of Leipzig—stating that he could not understand their signing in this way, since the treasury had no knowledge as to when and in what connection the Rothschilds had acquired this title from the Austrian court. In view of the inferences that might be drawn from its use, he felt it his duty to ask Metternich for further information on the matter.[56]

The following reply to this note was received: "With reference to your inquiry . . . regarding the title of imperial-royal crown agents assumed by the Frankfort business firm of Rothschild, the secretary of state has the honor to inform you that there is no record in his department of that title having been granted to the said firm, and that he has no information whatever on the matter." [57]

The fact was that the Rothschilds had not signed as imperial-royal, as Stadion thought, but as imperial crown agents, as they were entitled to do in accordance with the decree of January 29, 1800, issued by Emperor Francis in his then capacity of Roman-German Emperor.[58] In any case the incident showed the extent to which the Rothschild family were distrusted in Austria.

In Frankfort, also, they met with every kind of opposition. In order to hinder them in the development of their constantly increasing business, an attempt was made to force the two brothers who were living at Frankfort into the army, in view of the special efforts being made to raise men to resist the return of Napoleon. They turned anxiously to Nathan for help, and he determined to use this opportunity of intervention for addressing a homily to Austria, as he realized that very definite pressure would have to be brought to bear from England, if Austria were at last to be roped in as a customer. The House of Rothschild had already established a virtual monopoly in carrying out the subsidy arrangements of the Island Kingdom.

Nathan went to Herries and acquainted him with the situation; and Herries induced the Foreign Office to make representations to Herr von Neumann, Austrian counselor of embassy in London, in accordance with which Neumann commended the House of Rothschild to Baron von Hugel, the Austrian plenipotentiary at Frankfort. His letter ran as follows:[59]

Sir:

The English Government has requested me most particularly to commend to your Excellency's consideration the House of Rothschild at Frankfort, which carries out the transfer of our subsidies. This firm is represented by several brothers, one of whom is established here, and is employed by the British government in connection with all their principal financial operations on the Continent. By reason of the confidence which he enjoys, and the extensive nature of his operations, both he and his brothers have incurred the envy of the Frankfort bankers to such an extent that an attempt has been made to torment [tourmenter] them by forcing them to do military service. As the English government appears to be most anxious that this firm should not be annoyed in any way, and as this appears to be a matter that directly concerns our service, I felt that I ought not to fail to transmit this request. I therefore ask your Excellency to grant that firm every help and protection that lies in your power.

Baron von Hugel immediately forwarded this letter to Vienna, where it was submitted to Metternich and Stadion, and it did not fail of its effect. No further opposition was offered to the Rothschild brothers' undertaking the transfer of the subsidies; and in general the interstate financial transactions were all carried through more easily, since Stadion allowed his officials abroad much greater scope than had Ugarte. The new finance minister was inclined to leave more to their personal initiative and judgment, as he realized that they being on the spot were in a better position to know what conditions were, and as the cumbrous methods of communication made it impracticable to correspond on matters requiring an immediate decision.

At this time Hemes himself visited Frankfort, where his commissioner, Limburger, was negotiating with the treasury commissioner Schwinner in regard to the amounts to be paid to Austria, which Stadion would have liked to receive in coin or bullion. Herries emphatically demanded that in this matter the House of Rothschild should be granted as free a hand as possible, Napoleon's return had suddenly upset their plans and made new measures necessary, and the commissary-general and Nathan were kept exceedingly busy. In the campaign against the bold adventurer the most important thing was to raise cash and especially French currency. As they could not obtain French coins anywhere, Herries on Nathan's advice had gold louis minted, in order to supply the armies.

In the middle of June, Napoleon resumed the campaign. France was supporting him only half-heartedly, for after all these wars everyone was longing for peace, and was willing even to put up with foreign invasion. Now, however, the French were faced again with a demand for new sacrifices and blood and treasure, and with a struggle against superior forces. For a short time the fortune of war seemed again to smile upon Napoleon, but as early as June 18, 1815, the Emperor of France met his fate at Waterloo. He was completely and decisively beaten—abdication, captivity, and banishment to St. Helena were the result.

On the resumption of hostilities in France, Herries and Nathan had returned to London, and were anxiously awaiting news of the result of the conflict. Nathan and his brothers had always made a particular point of letting one another have news as speedily as possible, either directly or through their business friends, of any important event that might influence their business, or be a determining factor in new undertakings. Nathan had promised prizes for the most speedy supply of news to boats sailing between England and the Continent. He also instructed his agents throughout the world to give him the earliest possible report regarding the outcome of the expected conflict. Such measures were of particular importance at that time, because none of the modern methods of conveying news had been invented—the stage post, that is a series of messengers, being the usual way of obtaining it quickly.

Nathan's arrangements worked perfectly for the battle of Waterloo. One of his agents, whose name was Rothworth, waited at Ostend for news of the result. He succeeded in obtaining the first newspaper account of the successful issue of the battle, and with a copy of the Dutch Gazette fresh from the printers, he caught a boat just sailing for London. He entered the British capital very early in the morning of June 20, and immediately reported to Nathan, who conveyed the news of victory to Herries, and through him to the British government.

The government were at first skeptical, as they had not received any direct information, and Wellington's envoy Major Henry Percy did not arrive with the field-marshal's report until the 21st of June.[60] The members of the British government were tremendously impressed by Nathan's advance knowledge of such an important event; and when this became generally known, the public, who were just beginning to learn of the extent to which Nathan was employed by the English Treasury, began to invent all manner of legends regarding the method by which Nathan had acquired this knowledge and the manner in which he had exploited it.

Some said that he had a private service of carrier-pigeons; others that he had been personally present at the battle of Waterloo and had ridden to the coast at top speed. In order to make the story more romantic, he was said to have found heavy storms raging when he reached the Channel and to have crossed at the risk of his life. Nathan was also alleged to have exploited the news on the stock exchange, thus at one stroke creating the enormous fortunes of the Rothschilds.

Nathan naturally applied the early information that he had obtained to his own profit in his business dealings; but the substantial part of the fortune of the Rothschilds had been amassed through the profits realized in the financial transactions which have already been described; the successful issue of the battle of Waterloo merely served to increase it, and to open up wider fields for profitable business in the future. This was all the more so as England had been victorious and Nathan had transferred the center of gravity of the Rothschild business to her side.

In spite of the fortunate issue of the campaign, which had lasted barely six days, England continued to pay the subsidies to the continental powers. The House of Rothschild was, for instance, instructed by the English Treasury—that is, by Hemes and Nathan—to pay Austria £277,777 on demand, for the months of August and September, this amount not to be subject to any discount, so that Austria should receive it in full.[61] The commission due to the brothers Rothschild was paid by England herself. The payments were continued up to and including December.

Stadion had expressed the wish that as much coin as possible be sent. This made the transfer more difficult and produced a fall in the exchange; it was due to the continuing distrust, which even Schwinner, Austria's representative at Frankfort, was not able to dissipate. The English alone emphatically countered this attitude, and the resulting correspondence clearly shows how highly the wealth and position of the young firm of Rothschild were already rated in England, or at any rate in the authoritative circles of Commissary-General Herries, as compared to their standing in Austria.

"The . . . exchange value [of the pound]," wrote Schwinner to the Austrian embassy in London in November, 1815, "was constantly rising during the early part of November; after the 9th it weakened because Rothschild, having reason to believe that Austria would insist on receiving her considerable payments in cash, refrained from purchasing bills offered by foreigners. This circumstance would appear to justify the view of the English commissioner Baron von Limburger, in which Commissary-General Herr von Herries, who was here a few months ago, concurred, that the more the House of Rothschild were granted a free hand . . . the more certainly would the exchange value of English bills be maintained.

"In this connection the firm of Rothschild have offered bills with respect to the November and December instalments . . . similar to those that have already been accepted and fully cashed in previous payments to the extent of several millions. Nevertheless, in spite of the fact that the generally recognized standing of the firm of Rothschild should be sufficient guarantee for these instruments, I felt that I must adhere to those rules which must always be strictly observed, lest unexpected difficulties should be met in cashing bills of exchange. I considered that this condition was met when Baron von Limburger gave a written undertaking on behalf of the English government that that government would in any case indemnify the imperial and royal treasury if any loss whatever were suffered in realizing the bills accepted by Rothschild."[62]

Schwinner had on a previous occasion expressed his misgivings to Limburger regarding his responsibility for any loss "resulting from the lack of solidity of the firm of Rothschild." Limburger had on that occasion replied to him in the following terms:

"I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your valued communication of even date. I cannot possibly give the slightest credence to the rumors which you have communicated to me, and which I regard as malicious slanders deserving of severe punishment. In order, however, completely to set your mind at rest I have to repeat to you on behalf of my government the verbal statement made to you by the commissary-in-chief, Mr. Herries, that even if the accepted bills are not met, the Imperial and Royal Austrian government shall in no wise suffer loss, but that they will be indemnified if there should unexpectedly be any loss in cashing the said bills. I have to point out first that in the case of the considerable amounts which you have already received in such bills, no such occasion has occurred and secondly, that the House of Rothschild is itself too rich and too powerful not immediately to make good any such loss without requiring the intervention of my government." [63]

Schwinner transmitted the whole of this correspondence to Vienna, where it was brought to the attention of Metternich and Stadion. As they were both hearing such completely satisfactory accounts of the firm of Rothschild from all quarters, and more particularly were learning of the enormous credit which that firm enjoyed, confidence was completely established at Vienna. From now onwards the firm of Rothschild was most extensively employed by Austria, even in business which had nothing whatever to do with the English subsidy.

Thus Nathan had succeeded, while remaining behind the scenes himself, in establishing his brothers on the Continent in the confidence of the Austrian Treasury. This was to be the starting-point of an even more intimate association with governing circles in the imperial state, which was to develop within the next few years.

While the position of the Rothschild family abroad became more and more important and their wealth attained prodigious dimensions by reason of the great interstate financial transactions which were entrusted to them, they had to fight in their native town of Frankfort to secure the equal political rights of the Jews which had been granted during the period of French dominion. In spite of the decisions of the Congress of Vienna and in spite of Metternich and Hardenberg, this equality was threatened by a hostile senate. Now, however, emboldened by the position which they had won with the great powers, the brothers Rothschild felt in a position to make more definite efforts on behalf of their fellows.

The newly created Federal Diet which met at Frankfort had an important voice in this matter, and the Rothschilds determined to gain the responsible representatives of the powers for their cause. From the first, they had a true friend in the representative of the Elector of Hesse, who had already reestablished everything in his own territory, including the soldiers' pigtails, just as it was before, and who was again at loggerheads with his estates regarding financial matters and the question of the separation of the state treasury from the prince's privy purse.

On October 17, 1816, he had nominated, as his envoy to the German Federal Diet, the administrator of his financial affairs, the old supporter of the Rothschild family, Buderus von Carlshausen—who in the meantime had advanced to the dignity of privy councilor and president of the Chamber. Von Carlshausen had recently been in Paris, on business in connection with his master's claims for compensation, and had specially commended the elector's interests to James. He was now to serve as a kind of liaison officer between the elector and the House of Rothschild, as indeed he had always been. Only positions were now somewhat changed; hitherto it had been the Rothschilds who had asked favors; now it was the elector and Buderus who tried to maintain a close connection. The brothers Rothschild certainly did not forget what they owed them, and endeavored as far as possible to meet all their wishes. But the elector's business had fallen very much into the background since the family had got accustomed to transacting business running into millions with the states of Europe.

In any case, the first important relationship of the Rothschild family had worked out to the benefit of all concerned. The elector had had his scattered resources most ably shepherded during the confusions of the Napoleonic war; Buderus had been made an exceedingly wealthy man; and the extensive operations of the Rothschilds themselves had been made possible through the moneys originally entrusted to them by the elector. They naturally urged Carlshausen to make strong representations in favor of Jewish interests at the Federal Diet. Solomon and Carl Rothschild next turned to the Prussian chancellor Prince Hardenberg and transmitted to him a copy of the letter that Metternich had sent to the Jewish representatives at the Vienna Congress, adding the following covering letter: [64]

In humble confidence we beg to submit to your Highness the enclosed document which is of such fateful import for the destinies of the Israelite community.
After all that your Highness has done for our community in recent years we cannot but hope that your Highness will not withdraw your powerful support at this decisive moment. That, and that alone, can secure a tolerable existence to the Frankfort Jews. Everything depends upon the Commission nominated by the Federal Diet proceeding according to just and reasonable principles in dealing with this matter; and any influence exerted by your Highness in that direction cannot but have the most satisfactory result. We therefore beg to submit our most humble and relevent request that you will most graciously convey to the royal Prussian Ambassador at Frankfort, as speedily as possible, those general instructions which are indicated in the enclosed letter. This is the only means of salvation left to us.

This letter was necessary because there were definite signs that the senate was not likely to pay much attention to the decisions of the Congress of Vienna. This fact had financial consequences; for some of the debentures issued by the Jewish community in connection with their liberation had not yet been met. The Jews did not wish to pay the money until it was certain that the rights which they were thus purchasing would be secured to them. The firm Meyer Amschel Rothschild and Sons wrote in similar terms to Hardenberg and Metternich, saying that they had been informed that all the duly acquired rights of each class of the inhabitants at Frankfort would be maintained, and that there was therefore no further obstacle to the debentures being redeemed.

"As none of the principal magistrates at Frankfort," the letter continued, "have as yet taken any action in this matter, and the holders of these debentures are pressing more and more for their payment, we humbly request you to take the necessary steps, so that these obligations may be paid without further delay.

"We venture to hope that our most humble request will be graciously granted, since the necessary money has long been available, and it will be paid as soon as the necessary action in this matter has been taken." [65]

Before this money was paid, the Rothschilds wanted to receive an assurance from the city of Frankfort that it would not attempt to dispute the agreement with Dalberg of December 28, 1811, regarding the equal rights of the Jews. Both the persons appealed to agreed; and Hardenberg wrote to Metternich that he considered the request to be right and just, that the city of Frankfort could not legally raise any objection, and that it would be advisable for the two courts jointly and emphatically to enjoin Frankfort to recognize the agreement as binding and to fulfil it.[66]

Count Buol-Schauenstein, Austria's plenipotentiary, and therefore president of the Federal Diet, was, in contrast to his superior Metternich, no friend of the Jews, and had reported his views to Metternich at Vienna. He held that Grand Duke Dalberg had sold the rights of citizenship to a crowd of Jewish families for a song.

"Trade," wrote the ambassador from Frankfort, "is still the only means of livelihood which the Jews adopt. This nation, which never amalgamates with any other, but always hangs together to pursue its own ends, will soon overshadow Christian firms; and with their terribly rapid increase of population they will soon spread over the whole city, so that a Jewish trading city will gradually arise beside our venerable cathedral."[67]

Buol's attitude was bound eventually to result in a conflict of opinion with Metternich, but for the time being no decision was made in the Jewish question, and the question of the status at Frankfort remained in the balance.

Paris offered opportunities of important new business, and all the members of the Rothschild family were kept fully occupied exploiting them as far as possible. The victorious powers inflicted a heavy war indemnity on France, appointing four commissioners of the principal powers to settle the precise terms and receive the money. They met at Paris under the presidency of the Austrian, Baron von Barbier. The amount of the indemnity was fixed at seven hundred million francs, to be paid within five years in fifteen instalments of 46,666,-666 francs, commencing on December 1, 1815.

At once the difficulty arose of arranging for these payments to be transmitted to the powers. James, perceiving the great possibilities of profit that the situation offered, advised his brothers and urged them to do everything possible to get the order for remitting this French tribute.

The brothers had to meet heavy competition. Austria still employed her four banking firms, which were represented in Paris; while Baring and other big firms in England endeavored, in connection with the Paris banking firm of Ouvrard, to get the business. All the firms were eager to exploit the opportunity to the utmost, and all the financial and banking world was considering the methods by which the great indemnity could be settled.

Barbier received a proposal from the Baring-Ouvrard Company which was unacceptable because, as Barbier reported,[68] "the bankers insist on enormous advantages being assured to them, without guaranteeing our principal objects, namely, complete security and advances before instalments fall due." Austria intended, among other things, to divert large sums to Colmar for various purposes, mainly of a military nature. The four Viennese firms had very poor connections in Germany, and it was not practicable to make use of them.

The question therefore was whether the Messageries —the overland postal services—could be entrusted with this task, or whether recourse should be had to bankers as an intermediary. Barbier felt anxious about the first method, the roads being exceedingly unsafe so soon after the confusion of the war. This was indicated by the fact that the postal company refused to accept liability for "les vols a main armee," after a mail-bag had been rifled on another journey.

Barbier reported as follows to Stadion:[69] "I am informed that the Frankfort bankers Rothschild and Gontard have undertaken entirely at their own risk to transfer certain sums of money required for the Wurttemberg regiments that are remaining in France, and that they have been granted a commission of one and a half per cent for their services. This amounts to exactly double the transport costs demanded by the Messageries. I have also heard that they have demanded one and a quarter per cent for sending money to the Russian regiments. I suggested to them that they should remit our money at their own risk for a commission of one per cent, to cover all expenses; but they definitely stated that the expense and the danger were too great for this commission to cover them. I had therefore no alternative, after lengthy negotiations with them, except either to grant the collimission they asked or to adopt the cheaper but somewhat unsafe method of sending the money by the Messageries." The Messageries were certainly cheaper, but an accident to a single remittance might make this manner of transport exceedingly expensive. Barbier therefore closed with the firms of Rothschild and Gontard, and on January 6, 1816, they dispatched the final letter regarding the transfer of the first amount of 2,200,000 francs to Colmar.

"Allow us," they wrote,[70] "to add the assurance that we shall apply our united efforts to carrying out this to your complete satisfaction. . . . We could not offer a lower commission because we cannot yet accurately estimate the expenses involved. We shall, however, make it our duty to reduce this commission in the case of future remittances if circumstances permit. We venture to trust that your Excellency will be disposed to let us know when future payments have to be made, in order that we may be able to quote you the cheapest terms."

Accepting responsibility for all risks of carriage, the two firms undertook the transfer of these moneys from Paris to Colmar for a commission of one and a quarter per cent on the payments made. This was not so serious for them as it might appear, since they did not really transfer any money at all, but through their extensive connections acquired the equivalent sum at the place of payment itself. Thus without incurring any risk, they were able to book the high commission as pure profit.

After this system had been in force for some time, the general commanding at Colmar, Baron Frimont, who regarded the commission as excessive, intervened, and attempted to get the money over by military couriers. However, after trying to do this for two months, he admitted himself beaten, and himself requested[71] that these remittances and the issue of officers' pay should again be carried out by the firms of Rothschild and Gontard, "as has already been found to be the most reliable method in connection with military payments at Frankfort."

They did not confine themselves to this business. Soon payments running into millions[72] were carried through by Rothschild and Gontard on account of the French indemnity to Vienna, the most important part of which was entrusted to Eskeles and Geymuller. Nevertheless, the Austrian government continued to give considerable orders to the four Austrian firms; and in their competition with them, Rothschild and Gontard had to make exceptional efforts to be allotted even a small proportion of the French indemnity to Hamburg. Competition was exceedingly keen.

At last the brothers Rothschild succeeded in winning over Barbier, Austria's financial representative in Paris, whose attitude toward them had hitherto been neutral. As time went on he became an ardent supporter of the Rothschild family and of the Frankfort bankers who were working in conjunction with them. This is revealed by the correspondence which passed between him and Count Stadion, who dealt with the matter in a thoroughly businesslike and impartial manner.

Stadion recognized the conscientious services rendered by the Rothschilds in remitting the subsidies; and Nathan saw that the minister was fully informed from England of the part which they had played. With Napoleon a captive at St. Helena, the period of subsidy payments was completely at an end, so it was no longer necessary to keep this business a strict secret. Nor did Nathan consider it desirable to do so, since their credit and reputation would gain if it were widely known that those enormous sums had been handled by the House of Rothschild.

We must bear in mind that during the period between October, 1811, and October, 1816, no less than £42,500,000[73] had passed through Herries's hands. Almost half of this had been forwarded to the various continental recipients through the intermediary of Nathan and his brothers. In Herries's memoirs, published by his son, are extracts from a memorandum[74] prepared for competent authorities, which speaks of Rothschild in the highest terms. Of course in praising Rothschild, Herries was indirectly taking credit for himself, since he after all was responsible, and would have had to bear the blame for any mistakes.

Herries wrote that it was possibly solely due to the banking firm of Mr. Rothschild and his brothers that he had been enabled to carry through the exchange operations so successfully. He said that the greatest gratitude was owing to these gentlemen, who had devoted themselves entirely to the public service, and that the reward which they would receive would have been fairly and honorably won.

Herries certainly emphasized[75] the fact that he had always kept Nathan strictly under his control, had never allowed him to take any steps without his express consent, and had had him almost constantly with him in his room; but he also stated in a private letter to the chancellor of the exchequer that he owed it to Mr. Rothschild not to miss this opportunity of bearing witness to the skill and energy with which he had carried out this service, quite unobtrusively and in such a manner that the rate of exchange had not been unfavorably affected. Even if we regard Herries's testimony as biased, there can be no doubt that Nathan rendered magnificent financial services, from which, it is true, he personally reaped substantial profits.

The Austrian finance minister Count Stadion was just about to undertake the task of putting his country's finances thoroughly in order, reducing the amount of paper money in circulation, and as far as possible reducing Austria's public debt. He required a large amount of ready money for these purposes. This he had the prospect of obtaining through the Austrian share of the French indemnity, but as the payments were distributed in instalments over a period of years, and as he required money urgently, he decided that he would try to obtain an advance on the amount due.

He therefore wrote from Milan[76] to Barbier in Paris: "If your Excellency should receive any offers of an advance on the security of the contributions due in the next few years, I am of opinion that they should be considered, for they would assure us the advantage of obtaining a certain sum for the treasury at an early date."

Barbier replied to his minister as follows:

As such an offer could be expected to be made only by a very substantial banking company, I contrived to introduce the subject in the course of conversation with the firm of Rothschild. But it awakened no response. Yet a short time ago young Rothschild stated to me that it might now perhaps be possible to arrange the settlement of the Austrian share of the indemnity for the four last years at one stroke, saying that if I had the necessary authority to undertake such an operation it might be possible to enter into negotiations. I asked him to put his suggestion in writing; but he replied that he was unable to do so until a commissioner had been definitely instructed by Austria to enter into such negotiations.
This is as far as matters have gone at present; and I am led to infer that the proposal is at present merely a tentative suggestion on the part of Rothschild, who would try to find partners for the scheme if our court would express an opinion in favor of it. . . . Rothschild spoke of the enormous discount of forty per cent.

Barbier emphasized the fact that the entrepreneurs were speculating on an enormous profit and that Rothschild was paving the way thereto by mentioning this heavy discount. Barbier estimated the loss involved through such advance payments at "only" about twenty percent. He stated that it would require special considerations to make it desirable to incur a loss exceeding twenty percent.
It is true that the demands put forward by the Rothschilds were extremely high, and the benefit to be derived from such a transaction was positively enormous. But the very offer, implying as it did that the brothers Rothschild and their business friends were in a position immediately to supply cash to the tune of countless millions of francs, shows how strong the financial position of the Rothschilds had now become. There was nobody else in the field in financial transactions on this scale, and the Rothschilds meant to turn their privileged position to account.

Austria's urgent need of money, and the hope of getting better terms for the advances from the brothers Rothschild inspired Stadion to a clever move. He would put the family, who, handicapped by their origin, were making every effort to improve their social position, under a special obligation. After the conclusion of the subsidy transactions, the Rothschilds had repeatedly appealed to Baron von Handel and to Schwinner at Frankfort to recommend to the emperor recognition of their services; and Schwinner had forwarded this request to Count Stadion, the minister of finance. Stadion gladly availed himself of the opportunity thus offered.

Of the subsidies amounting to approximately £1,800,000 (15,000,000 gulden)[77] which were made available in the year 1815, the four Viennese discount houses first discounted an amount of about 2,750,000 gulden, for which the Austrian government paid a commission of one percent. The money, however, was not forthcoming as speedily as had been hoped, and the Austrian government was compelled to ask the four banking firms for advances on the payments. On these they had to pay interest at the rate of six percent. They were therefore exceedingly pleased when the English government consented to make the moneys payable in large amounts and even to pay several months' instalments in advance through the firm of Rothschild. Thus Austria no longer had to pay any commission, and thereby saved one percent in that respect, as well as saving six percent on any advances.

In the finance minister's report to Emperor Francis the following passage occurred:[78]

> Count Stadion flatters himself that his Majesty will approve of the manner in which this business was carried through. In this connection he feels it to be his duty to recommend that the services of the Frankfort banking firm Meyer Amschel Rothschild and Sons should be recognized, since the efforts of that firm contributed in a special degree to securing the prompt payment of the English subsidy moneys, and in the present circumstances it may be necessary to have further recourse to the good offices of that firm. . . . The firm has very large resources and enjoys an even larger credit. It can carry through transactions that appear vast to a private person on the Continent, because the British government employs it in the most extensive operations and therefore supports it with the necessary funds.

An examination of the subsidy transactions reveals the fact that the House of Rothschild alone paid out 12,203,822.43 florins with respect to £1,442,000. The report of the former high commissioner, who was in charge of the subsidy payments at Frankfort at the time, shows that Rothschild always paid most punctually, and that on various occasions, such as in changing foreign coin and bills, he showed the greatest desire to help without taking any undue advantage.

After the subsidy transactions had been carried through, the head of the firm expressed a wish that the services which he rendered might be publicly recognized by your Majesty. High Commissioner Schwinner was asked for his opinion as to the form which such recognition should take. He discussed the matter with the director of the Gratz police, Gohausen, who was then at Frankfort. . . . Gohausen suggested that the head of the house should be granted the honorary title of imperial and royal councilor, a like title having been granted for similar reasons to the brothers Kaula, in Hanau and Stuttgart, and to other Israelites. The grant of a title of nobility, on the other hand, would excite the envy of Christian banking firms and would create a particular sensation at the present time, as the rights of citizenship of the Jewish community at Frankfort are the subject of negotiations.

High Commissioner Schwinner does not recommend that the title of I. and R. councilor be granted, as it is customary to confer this distinction upon eminent public servants. He favors the granting of an imperial title of nobility, believing the apprehensions of the director of police to be unfounded. Since then Rothschild has repeatedly asked for some recognition as an encouragement both to himself and to others.

Count Stadion begs to state by way of recapitulation: The services rendered by Rothschild are not of a kind that may be suitably rewarded by conferring an order; but the civilian medal would hardly come up to his expectations. In view of his own wealth, a reward in money or money's worth would be even less appropriate. And such in any case would have to bear some relation to the high dignity of the donor and would therefore have to be very considerable. In the opinion of Count Stadion orders are more suitable as a reward for officials, but as Rothschild has already many officials under his direction, an order is not likely to impress him. Count Stadion therefore requests that as a public mark of your Majesty's satisfaction with the services rendered by the Frankfort firm Meyer Amschel Rothschild and Sons, your Majesty will graciously confer on the two brothers of this firm resident here, the German hereditary title of nobility, free of all dues, and will authorize him, Count Stadion, to convey to the firm in a special letter your Majesty's satisfaction.

This report was sent to Privy Councilor Barton von Lederer. He was the right-hand man of Count Zichy, the secretary of state and lord of the privy seal, and had accompanied the emperor when he fled from Napoleon in 1809. On that occasion he had won his confidence and affection. When the reorganization of Austria was undertaken after the Congress of Vienna, Count Zichy was placed at the head of the central office for dealing with all matters affecting the reorganization; and it became his duty to consider the suggestions that were made from various quarters and to express his opinion upon them. Although Stadion was so enthusiastic about the services rendered by the Rothschilds, Lederer remained comparatively unmoved. He regarded them simply as a calculating family of money-makers who were only concerned with their own interests, and he accordingly sent in a detailed report in which he argued against granting them a title of nobility. At the beginning of his statement Lederer gave a short synopsis[79] of the movements of the pound sterling before and after the battle of Waterloo, based upon the payments actually made by the Rothschilds.

In the year 1814, it was as follows: the pound sterling was worth on the average .....8 fl 11 1/8 x
In 1815, before the battle of Waterloo. .7 " 42 3/5 "
In 1815 after the battle of Waterloo.. .8 " 50 3/4 "
Taking the whole year 1815.....8 " 23 1/2 "
Taking the two years 1814 and 1815... .8 " 21 3/4 "

Lederer's memorandum continues:

I now pass to the question of rewarding the two brothers Rothschild, raised by the minister of finance in his report. In this connection two questions have to be considered: 1. In this business, have they conferred a benefit on the Austrian Treasury, and wherein does this benefit lie? 2. How can this benefit be suitably recognized?
As to the first, it was not until June, 1815, that the firm of Rothschild was employed as the business agent of the English government, in connection with the realization of the subsidies. It looked after the payments for that government, for which service it no doubt received a liberal commission, its duty being to maintain the rate of exchange between England and the Continent in favor of England and to improve it. The firm of Rothschild never had any right to ask Austria for a commission on the payments which it was effecting on behalf of the English government. In acting wisely in this matter, it deserved the compliments of the English government, whose intentions it was carrying out. The rate of exchange at which funds were transmitted before and after the battle of Waterloo indicates how far its success was due to fortunate circumstances and how far to its efforts. In effecting the payments accurately and punctually, the firm of Rothschild was but doing its duty. Even the fact brought forward by Schwinner, that they made the payments to the governor-general at Frankfort and to his military departments—payments for which the Austrian Treasury was responsible—out of the subsidy moneys, without charging any special commission for these transactions, cannot in my opinion be counted very much to its credit. It was paid a commission on the whole amount by England, and it cannot have been any more trouble to the firm to divide the payments among the various departments than to pay the whole amount into the central treasury at Frankfort. In any case I cannot conceive of a business firm doing business except in its own interest. The business man undertakes transactions in order to make a profit, and he should not pretend to having conferred an obligation where he has not done so.

Count Stadion thinks it desirable to secure the good-will of a firm of such extensive credit with a view to the future. I must confess that I cannot see how this is to be obtained by conferring any distinction whatever on the House of Rothschild. They will carry through transactions for the Austrian financial administration again in the future. If they see the chance of making a profit, they will ask us for business; but if they do not, they will decline to do business for us, even if the chiefs of the firm have been honored by your Majesty.

The balance-sheet is the first and most powerful factor in determining the business man's attitude. However, since the firm of Rothschild has carried through such considerable financial transactions for the Austrian Treasury, whereby the payment of commission was saved, I consider that it would be proper and consonant with your Majesty's dignity to give both brothers Rothschild a proof of your favor.

In this connection I cannot agree with the suggestion that a hereditary title should be conferred. Such titles should be the reward of service only. In this case there is the special consideration that the brothers Rothschild are Israelites. It is true that there have been cases in which your Majesty has decided to raise Israelites to the ranks of Austrian nobility, e.g., Baron Arnsteiner and Ritter von Eskeles.

On the other hand the claims of the Frankfort Jews to full rights of citizenship are now the subject of discussion, and although I would not venture to express an opinion as to whether honors should be conferred upon Jewish business men when the result of the negotiations in the diet is pending, I suggest that if your Majesty is inclined to act upon Count Stadion's proposal, the views of the minister for foreign affairs should first be ascertained. Personally I consider that the most suitable thing would be that your Majesty should make a gift to each of the two brothers Rothschild of a gold snuff-box bearing your Majesty's monogram in diamonds. Count Stadion might be consulted as to the monetary value of such a gift.

Count Zichy, to whom this memorandum was submitted for his observations, sent it on to the emperor with the comment that he considered Baron von Lederer's argument to be sound but that he could not immediately agree that the proposal should be rejected. He suggested that since Prince Metternich was best informed as to the conditions of the Israelites in Frankfort, and in view of the fact that the firm of Rothschild had really rendered services to the imperial treasury, Prince Metternich should be asked to express an opinion.[80]

Emperor Francis accordingly officially requested Metternich to express his opinion regarding Stadion's proposal, asking whether the existing circumstances of the Jews at Frankfort did not make it politically undesirable to distinguish a Jewish business firm in that way.[81]

The matter was therefore to be decided by Metternich, the man who, as has been stated, was well-disposed to the Frankfort Jews, and who had concurred in Stadion's making the proposal. Metternich reported verbally to Emperor Francis in favor of ennobling the Rothschild family.

Mindful of the important financial and political considerations on which Stadion's proposal was based, and which were further emphasized by Metternich, the emperor agreed, although he felt that the minor nobility would view the ennoblement of foreign Jews with very mixed feelings. The patent conferring the title of nobility on Amschel and Solomon, in recognition of their services in realizing the English subsidies, was issued from Schonbrunn on September 25, 1816.[82]

Meanwhile, it had been pointed out to Stadion that the two other brothers, Carl and James, whose services were also required for the operations that were being planned, might feel slighted, and a few days later Stadion recommended that these two brothers should also be ennobled. Emperor Francis issued an order in council to this effect, dated October 21, 1816.[83]

No sooner had the document been signed than Ugarte had the fact recorded in the official Vienna papers. Stadion expressly thanked the chancellor for doing so; a fact indicating the importance which he attached to the whole matter. At the same time he informed Ugarte that he had asked both the brothers Rothschild to submit a design for a coat-of-arms, and to state whether they wished to adopt a prefix of nobility.[84]

Stadion had informed Ugarte of the reasons for conferring a title of nobility, as set out in his report to the emperor, and added: "I do not consider, however, that the patent should enter into any details as to the services rendered, but that there should be merely a general statement to the effect that since the two brothers Meyer Amschel [sic] Rothschild and Solomon Meyer Rothschild have carried through a loan most meticulously and punctually—the English subsidy transactions during the year 1815—and have also shown an exceptional readiness to render services outside their actual duties, his Majesty has been most graciously moved, etc., etc."

In accordance with Stadion's request, the brothers Rothschild submitted a design for a coat-of-arms. This was enclosed with a letter written by Solomon Rothschild's own hand,[85] explaining the design, and reading as follows: "First quarter, or, an eagle sable surcharged in dexter by a field gules (having reference to the Imperial and Royal Austrian Coat-of-Arms) ; second quarter, gules, a leopard passant proper (a reference to the English Royal Coat-of-Arms) ; third quarter, a lion rampant (with reference to the Hessian Electoral Coat) ; fourth quarter, azure, an arm bearing five arrows (a symbol of the unity of the five brothers).

"In the center of the coat a shield gules. Right-hand supporter, a greyhound, a symbol of loyalty; left supporter, a stork, a symbol of piety and content. The crest is a coronet surmounted by the Lion of Hesse."

In submitting the design the Rothschilds asked that a separate patent of nobility should be prepared for each of the four brothers, as they lived in different countries. The design was duly sent to the Heralds' College (there was such an institution in Austria at the time) with a request for their observations. The college replied that they saw no objections to preparing four patents, but that it was "necessary to proceed with the greatest caution, particularly in the case of members of the Jewish nation for various reasons, and more especially because they are not familiar with the prerogatives of nobility." They added that although the usual fees were being remitted, they considered that the Rothschilds should pay 150 gulden for the special grant and that they could hardly resent this charge in view of the great distinction that was being conferred upon them.

"As for the coat-of-arms," the report continued,[86] "they ask for a coronet, a center shield, supporters, the Leopard of England, and the Lion of Hesse. According to the rules of heraldry, the gentry are entitled only to a helmet; their suggestion is entirely inadmissible since otherwise there would be nothing to distinguish the higher ranks, as coronets, supporters and center shields are proper only to the nobility. Moreover, no government will grant the emblems of other governments, as nobility is conferred for services to one's prince and one's country, but not for services to other countries. The lion is a symbol of courage only, which does not apply to the petitioners."

A design such as the Heralds' College considered suitable was attached to the report. The seven-pointed coronet, to which the petitioners were not entitled, and which was no doubt intended to express their wish for the title of Baron, had disappeared, together with the heraldic animals supporting the shield, and the lions of Hesse and England. Only the half-eagle and the arm with the arrows remained; but the hand was grasping, not five but four arrows, this being in accordance with the curious fact that Nathan, the brother who behind the scenes had had most to do with the English subsidies, was not yet recognized in any way.

The recommendations of the Heralds' College were accepted in every detail, and the design submitted by them duly became for some years the coat-of-arms of the Rothschild family, as laid down in the patent dated March 25, 1817. Although the ennoblement only carried a modest "von," the new rank was of no little importance. We must remember that at that period the higher nobility were dominant in almost all the states of Europe. They occupied all the highest positions in the state and were in a most favored position financially as compared with other citizens. For a Jewish family who had to fight hard for their position in their native city, the Rothschilds' imperial patent was a particularly rare distinction, and involved an important step forward in their fight for social recognition. As soon as the nobility had recovered somewhat from their annoyance, it became much easier for the brothers Rothschild to make their way socially.

The event was naturally very helpful to the relations of the House of Rothschild with Austrian statesmen. They did not take over the business of paying the whole of the huge French indemnity in advance instalments, but partial payments were made through them. They also transferred the moneys to Colmar as well as larger amounts sent to Mainz for the purpose of building fortresses.

Austria was owed three hundred thousand Dutch ducats by Russia for advances made to Russian troops during the Napoleonic wars and accordingly drew bills on the Frankfort firm of Rothschild, which were due in December, 1817, and January, 1818. In reply to Barbier's inquiry, James Rothschild wrote a considerate letter[87] saying that he could not accept the bills because the order from the Russian finance minister had not yet been received.

"If, however," he wrote, "it is your Excellency's wish that these bills be accepted by me ... I am gladly prepared to do so if your Excellency will be so kind as to give me an assurance that the bills in question are in order and that I will receive the report of the Imperial Russian Ministry of Finance."

The brothers Rothschild further offered,[88] in conjunction with Gontard, to provide three hundred thousand ducats, at five percent interest and one percent commission, a few months before the due date. "We flatter ourselves," they stated, "that your Excellency will appreciate the reasonableness of our proposals, and we venture to assure your Excellency that our principal desire has been to give further proof to the I. and R. Court of our constant zeal in their interests. Moreover, we are prepared to modify our proposals if an alteration in the rate of exchange in your favor should make this possible at the time when your Excellency has occasion to accept them."

Barbier supported the Rothschild proposal, attacking the four Vienna firms and observing that in his opinion the Rothschilds worked better and more cheaply.[89] But plans had now been changed at Vienna, where the bills were wanted to be paid only when they fell due, and inquiries had been made of the four Vienna firms as well as of Rothschild and Gontard regarding the simple transmission of the ducats to Vienna.[90]

The brothers Rothschild named their conditions and went on to say:[91] "If the treasury should later desire to receive in advance the above-mentioned amount of three hundred thousand ducats, we shall always be ready . . . to provide it. If, however, we should make such an advance your Excellency will find it not unreasonable to grant us a commission of one percent in addition to the interest rate of five percent per annum. We flatter ourselves that your Excellency will regard our various proposals as just, and venture to believe that we have made every possible effort in our power to furnish further proofs of how greatly we desire to continue to be honored with the treasury's confidence."

The letters show how cleverly the Rothschilds contrived to clothe their proposals in polite phrases and how they were always concerned to present their case as if their one desire was to make themselves useful, while the other party would derive all the profit and advantage.

While endeavoring to secure the custom of Austria, the brothers did not neglect the other states. Similar advances on account of the French contribution appear to have been suggested to Prussia and Russia, and in February, 1817, a loan of several millions was made to Prussia in the name of Rothschild. The Elector of Hesse, it is true, had a large share in this.[92] The brothers Rothschild still carried out really big transactions in conjunction with their patron or with other firms, but the time was soon to come when the five brothers would act alone, and one great firm after another would fall before them.

They were now again concerned to secure their position in Frankfort. The Jewish community had sent a request for assistance to Baron von Humboldt, the Frussian minister who was at that time acting on the diet; and Rothschild had appealed to the young German legal luminary and statesman Sylvester Jordan to use his influence with Count Buol at Frankfort, who had known Jordan since his earliest youth.

"The banker Rothschild,"[93] Jordan accordingly wrote to Buol, "one of the richest bankers in Europe, who has nothing to worry about except that he is a Jew, has most emphatically implored me to commend to your Excellency the interests of the Jews in general and of his House in particular. Hardenberg has already sent instructions in his matter to Humboldt. The senate of Frankfort is determined to confine them to the Jewish quarter, which is naturally distasteful to a banker who is worth millions."

In the middle of December, 1816, a printed memorandum with no less than thirteen enclosures, regarding the Jewish rights of citizenship, was sent to the diet, amongst the signatories being Amschel and Jonas Rothschild, as well as Jacob Baruch and old Bernes.

Meanwhile the brothers Rothschild were working assiduously abroad to extend their influence within the countries where they were living. In Austria their persistence had met with the greatest measure of success, and accordingly they redoubled their efforts in that country to secure new honors and titles. It did not take them long to realize that friendly social relations were of the greatest use to them in their business in each country; but it was just in this matter that they often met with great difficulties in London and Paris.

It was exceedingly hard for poorly educated German emigrant Jews to get into the higher social circles, even though they were rich. James had so far been most successful; at the excellent dinners which he gave he was already entertaining diplomats such as the Austrian ambassador Baron Vincent, and once even a prince of the blood royal, Paul von Wurttemberg. But he also met with numerous rebuffs.

Nathan and James hit upon the idea of asking Austria to grant them the dignity and office of honorary consul. On receiving such a nomination they would more or less belong to the diplomatic corps, whereupon many doors hitherto closed must necessarily be open to them as persons of official standing. Moreover, the title of consul of a great European power such as Austria was at that time, would be bound to raise their prestige and their credit in the business world. They wrote to Amschel at Frankfort asking him to obtain the title for them in Vienna; and he immediately wrote to Metternich: [94]

MOST EXCELLENT PRINCE, MOST GRACIOUS PRINCE AND LORD!

We have had the good fortune on various occasions to experience the proofs of your Highness's most gracious good-will, and we are therefore emboldened most respectfully to make the following proposal. Our brothers, the chiefs of the branches in Paris and London respectively, Jacob M. von Rothschild and Nathan M. Rothschild, honored through the distinction recently received by our family and their gracious elevation into the ranks of the nobility, are inspired by the most zealous desire to be able to devote their energies to the service of the I. and R. Austrian Government. They would feel they had found a means of satisfying these natural desires if one of them were nominated I. and R. Austrian Consul, a position which is at present vacant both in Paris and in London.

This position depends upon the nomination of your Princely Highness, and we therefore most submissively venture to request that your Highness may be pleased to accede to our humble wish. The I. and R. Government can find no more loyal, zealous, and indefatigable servants than our brothers; and we flatter ourselves that the connections which we have established with the governments of France and England would make it easy for us, both in a general way and in individual cases, to be useful to the I. and R. trade with those countries. We should be happy to be placed in a position to do so in this honorable manner, and to receive this further distinction.

Amschel wrote to Stadion at the same time[95] stating that it was not the desire for further honors that caused him to ask that his brothers should be nominated as consuls, but his sincere desire to prove himself of ever-increasing usefulness to the I. and R. Austrian Government. He was certain that the relations which both brothers had established with the governments of the countries where they were living would aid them in being of use to the I. and R. Austrian subjects, especially in commercial matters, and that the granting of their submissive request would enable his whole House to apply all their energies in the most varied ways to the service of Austria's commerce.

Carl Rothschild also appealed to Count Zichy,[96] whom he knew through business dealings, informing him that the Austrian ambassador in London, Prince Esterhazy, had written to Mettcrnich in support of Nathan's nomination and requested the same favor of him. Zichy forwarded Rothschild's letter to Metternich, with the remark[97] that although the matter did not come within his province he ventured to observe that this firm already appeared to have rendered important services to the Austrian treasury, and would through its riches and influence, especially in England, be able also in the future to give pecuniary aid to Austria.

It was to be a long time before these requests were granted. The Austrian state machine worked slowly, and several objections and difficulties cropped up, which could be overcome only by years of work. It was only through their close association with Metternich and Gentz, whom the brothers Rothschild cultivated in the ensuing period of congresses, that they were enabled to smooth the way, so that three years later there was no further obstacle to the desired nomination. Before they could achieve their object, however, they had a long row to hoe.

But the brothers Rothschild worked assiduously toward any goal which they had set themselves to achieve, notwithstanding all the difficulties that arose and the years during which their patience was tried. In the end they got what they wanted. Their unremitting efforts and their persistence in urging their cause, undismayed by any rebuffs, secured for them the unique career that had been destined for their family.

CHAPTER IV

The Brothers Rothschild During the Period of Congresses, 1818-l822

THE great fortune of the Rothschilds had been made; it was now a question not only of preserving it but of developing it and of employing it as remuneratively as possible. The convulsions through which all the states of Europe had passed, and the enormous military efforts made during the preceding quarter of a century, had produced general confusion in their finances, which could be straightened out only by hard work in peace conditions. Every state had been spending money lavishly for a long time, and the resulting shortage of money was very acute. The poverty-struck states had to acquire the cash necessary for their recovery from those who had succeeded in profiting by war conditions to accumulate riches as contractors or through financial operations. Foremost among these was the House of Rothschild, and it gladly lent money to princes and states, as the repayment of such loans through their subjects was secured. Thus it advanced moneys to numerous small princely families, especially to those of the neighborhood, while its relations with the Elector of Hesse remained outwardly unchanged.

Although he was the third son, Nathan incontestably look the leadership among the five brothers. His long and fortunate connection with the English government had taught him both the advantage of concentrating on really big financial operations, and the comparative safety of carrying through such operations with powerful states. For the concern of these for their public credit and their prestige made them regard it as essential to carry out their obligations punctually. Nathan was not in the least inclined to rest upon his laurels, or to limit himself to the preservation and enjoyment of the family's great fortune. His aim was to increase the power of his House; and he held the view that in order to win a victory, ducats, like soldiers, had to be concentrated in mass suddenly and unexpectedly upon a wisely selected point.[1] This was the dominant note in the policy of his House during the following period.

In order to apply this policy it was necessary, now that his firm enjoyed the high regard of the business community, that he should secure his position in society as well. The Austrian patent of nobility had given him a good start in this direction; but his native city and the senate of Frankfort continued to adopt an unfriendly attitude toward the Jews, including the Rothschild family. Amschel at Frankfort, who had been placed in charge of the campaign against the senate, used every opportunity for exerting external pressure upon the authorities of the city, especially through Prussia and Austria. At the beginning of the year 1818 a favorable opportunity occurred for again enlisting the support of the Prussian Chancellor Prince Hardenberg, who was well disposed toward the Jews.

The state finances of Prussia were, like those of Austria, in great confusion. The deficit was large, and it seemed not improbable that the pay of civil servants and of the army would have to be suspended. The treasury lived, from hand to mouth, and the king himself was being dunned by small tradesmen. In these circumstances, Barandon, the London representative of the Prussian Mercantile Marine, had recommended that a loan should be raised in England, and that for this purpose recourse should be had to Nathan Rothschild. Hardenberg readily agreed, and asked Amschel at Frankfort, whom he knew personally, to use his influence in favor of securing this loan. Amschel consented, and used this opportunity of again appealing to the chancellor on behalf of the members of his faith at Frankfort.

"At the present time," he wrote,[2] "when his Excellency the Minister and Envoy to the Diet, Count von Buol, is with your Excellency, I beg to renew my most humble representations regarding the fate of the members of my faith here, who are awaiting in great suspense the decision of the diet. We place our greatest hopes in the honored Prussian government, and cherish the most sincere wish that the principles recognized by it will be applied, convinced that your Highness knows too well how to appreciate the cultural progress made by our community during the last forty years to allow the way to their further development and improvement to be barred, or them to be limited in this respect."

Hardenberg was quite willing to accede to this request, since in doing so he would be acting in accordance with his own personal convictions. He had, however, a difficult task with his king, who was not well disposed to the Jews. The monarch told him the measures he could apply if action were taken by the magistracy of Frankfort, but at the same time expressed the desire that the wishes of the magistracy should be met as far as possible. "In any case," the resolution concluded, "I do not wish Prussia to support the Jews in the diet."[3]

On this Hardenberg angrily commented: "First ad acta. We have at any rate the decisions of the Congress of Vienna to go upon."[4]

However, the king came off his high horse, for Hardenberg had made him realize that the Prussian state would need the brothers Rothschild for a loan, and that it would not be good policy for Prussia to alienate them by an attitude unfriendly to the Jews in the Diet of Frankfort.

The majority of the diet were in any case in sympathy with the desires of the senate at Frankfort, and the rights which the Jews had acquired in 1811 seemed therefore to be in peril. Only the powerful influence of Metternich and Hardenberg had so far restrained it from taking a definite decision hostile to the Jews.

Amschel regarded the head of the House of Bethmann, which was being more and more overshadowed by the Rothschilds, as a natural enemy of the Jews; but Bethmann refused to admit that this was so. "If Herr James," he wrote at the time to David Parish, "will but visit me at Frankfort, he will soon realize that I am not influenced by any nonsense about Christians and that I have no prejudice against a reputable Jew. I have often attempted in vain to disabuse Amschel of the stupid illusion that I am opposed to the demands of the Jewish community at Frankfort in so far as they are reasonable. The fact that I am suspected by my fellow Christians of taking the Jewish side should convince him, if nothing else will, that he has no ground for his attitude."[5]

Amschel Meyer certainly was greatly interested in keeping on good terms with Prussia and Austria. Prussia's acute financial distress seemed to provide a further excellent opportunity of earning a large amount of money, and he did all he could, in close collaboration with his brother Nathan in London, to induce Prussia to come to the Rothschilds for refuge.

That kingdom had very good reason to look around for money, for in 1817 the state was carrying a burden of twenty millions of floating debt, interest being charged on part of this amount at the extravagant rate of twenty percent per annum, the payments being met by further borrowings each year.[6] Apart from this, the annual budget showed a deficit of several million thalers. Prince Hardenberg, by the king's command, accordingly instructed the Director of the Prussian Treasury to negotiate a loan. The director, Christian von Rother, was a highly competent official and Hardenberg's right-hand man in financial matters, and he had come into special prominence in raising money during the wars of liberation.

"It is essential," wrote the prince to Rother,[7] "that we should obtain money for various purposes. The maintenance of the state urgently calls for it. I am eagerly waiting to hear from you. Act with decision and courage."

Rother first tried Berlin firms, but they attempted to exploit the difficulties of the situation, and, as he reported to the king, the conditions which they proposed were "exorbitant and humiliating." In Holland he had no success either; but he fared better at Frankfort. As Prussian commissioner of finance he had already come into contact with the House of Rothschild in Paris, and he now succeeded in getting on exceedingly good terms with Amschel Meyer.

Amschel referred him to his brother Nathan in London, as the most likely person to make the loan a success. Hitherto, Barandon had conducted the negotiations in England, but he was not liked by the House of Rothschild. Rother, on the other hand, the brothers had known in Paris, and they regarded him as a more pleasant person to deal with. Indeed they preferred him in every way, and were exceedingly gratified when he came; to London and Barandon was left out in the cold.

They were now dealing only with two friends of their House, Rother and the Prussian ambassador in London, William von Humboldt, the brother of the great explorer Alexander. He himself was not only a diplomat, but also a distinguished scholar and philosopher. Humboldt understood little of money matters, and he left his private estate to be managed by Rothschild, whereas Rother was regarded as a financial genius in his own country. Humboldt was certainly a complete believer in Nathan Rothschild's indisputably superior talent for finance. He reported in this sense to Berlin, using words which are especially remarkable coming from such a man.

"If the loan is to succeed here," his report ran, "this can be managed in my opinion only through Rothschild.

. . . Rothschild is now easily the most enterprising business man in this country. . . . He is a man upon whom one can rely, and with whom the government here does considerable business. He is also, as far as I know, just, exceedingly honest, and intelligent. But I must add that if business is given to him to carry out, it will be necessary to fall in with his ideas. For he has acquired the independent habit of mind developed by riches and a fairly long sojourn in this country, and he is now engaged in such a constant number of financial transactions that it will not greatly affect him if one of them fails to come his way. He wants to take over the whole loan himself; on this point he is likely to be exceedingly firm, and he has asked in advance that the Prussian consul here, against whom he is prejudiced, shall not be allowed to interfere in the matter in any way."[8]

Humboldt's report is all the more valuable as an expression of opinion, since he proved his independence in concluding it by advising against the acceptance of the loan, this being of course quite contrary to Nathan's wishes. Rother, on the other hand, speedily came to terms with Nathan regarding a loan of five million pounds. This he considered advantageous for Prussia, as other important states were able to obtain money by loan only in small amounts.[9] In spite of the ups and downs of the negotiations, exceedingly cordial relations seem to have been maintained throughout between Rother and Rothschild. At any rate this is indicated by their correspondence at this time. Rother wrote to Solomon Rothschild,[10] who was also in London at the time, that he had been glad to make the closer acquaintance of his brother Nathan, whose character and intelligence he felt compelled the greatest admiration.

Solomon's reply was full of friendliness and candor. His letter was, he indicated, an expression of his sincerest feelings, and Nathan and Solomon assured Rother, when he left, that he could travel with a light heart.

He had achieved "a splendid piece of business, and they were his devoted, loyal, and eternal friends."[10]

This way of getting into the good graces of the Prussian negotiator did not fail of its effect. Rother was delighted that he had carried the business through and that on the day on which the agreement was concluded Nathan sent a ship to Hamburg with a million thalers as a payment on account.

Rother had, if possible, been even more strongly impressed than William von Humboldt by Nathan's influence. "The Rothschild in this country," he reported to Berlin,[10] "is a most estimable person and has an incredible influence upon all financial affairs here in London. It is widely stated, and is indeed almost a fact that he entirely regulates the rate of exchange in the city. His power as a banker is enormous."

The loan, which was issued at an average price of 72 per cent, turned out to be "a splendid piece of business" for Rothschild, as it never fell below the price of issue, and in 1824 actually reached par. The House of Rothschild therefore had every occasion to be pleased with this, the first big state loan which they handled, and they were encouraged to develop this line of business on a large scale. This loan was the first of several.

The brothers had formed valuable friendships through these negotiations, and William von Humboldt introduced them to his famous brother Alexander. It was not long before he was seen dining at Rothschild's house in London. Nathan was more frequently the guest of William von Humboldt, whose wide education and extensive knowledge certainly provided a contrast to the Frankforter who had risen so rapidly. Humboldt expressed himself candidly about him in a letter to his wife.

"Yesterday," the letter runs, "Rothschild dined with me. He is quite crude and uneducated, but he has a great deal of intelligence and a positive genius for money.
He scored off Major Martins beautifully once or twice.

Martins was dining with me, too, and kept on praising everything French. He was being fatuously sentimental about the horrors of the war and the large numbers who had been killed. 'Well,' said Rothschild, 'if they had not all died, major, you would presumably still be a subaltern.' You ought to have seen Martins's face."

The Rothschilds were anxious to maintain their friendly relations with the Humboldt brothers. Solomon also did his best to be agreeable to them whenever possible. Meeting Caroline von Humboldt at Carlsbad on one occasion, he overwhelmed her with attentions. She wrote to her husband: "I have had several callers, and among others Herr von Rothschild, the brother of the one who is looking after your affairs at Frankfort. He made some exceedingly comic remarks to me. He thanked me, in the course of his conversation, for receiving him, and said, 'Your Excellency ought to come to Frankfort again. We could do with a lady like you there.' It sounded extraordinarily funny. He also asked me whether he could be of use to me in the matter of money and said that his purse was at my disposal." [11]

The Prussian loan, which the brothers Humboldt arranged with the Rothschilds, furnished another excellent illustration of the way in which the three brothers worked together.

While Solomon and Nathan were dealing with that business in London, Amschel Meyer was meeting an awkward situation at Frankfort. In the case of propositions which the firm did not like, they could excuse themselves by pointing out the difficulty of obtaining the agreement of all the brothers—that is, of five persons who usually were widely separated from one another—this agreement being necessary for any substantial transaction.

These tactics were adopted in a matter involving the Crown Prince of Hesse, who was constantly at loggerheads with his father. The elector was now seventy-five years old, and failing. In contrast to his parsimonious father, the crown prince had made himself popular by a manner of life from which many persons profited. This involved very heavy expenditure, and the heir's need of money was all the greater since the appanage allotted to him by his father was—according to his ideas at any rate—ludicrously inadequate. The consequence was that the prince found his way to the firm which owed its rise and prosperity to his father. He applied to Rothschild for a loan.

Naturally, this was done quite in secret, without the knowledge or consent of the elector. At the beginning of 1818 the prince requested a loan of 200,000 reichsthalers, which the House of Rothschild granted; but before six months had expired he asked for a further advance of 300,000 reichsthalers. On this occasion he remarked that the House of Rothschild had the fullest information regarding the elector's affairs, and could therefore easily provide for the subsequent repayment of the loan.

Carl Rothschild happened to be in Cassel at the time. The prince immediately summoned him, and informed him that he had again applied to his firm for money, making the same remark to him as he had made to the firm. Carl Rothschild left the audience chamber in reflective mood. He thought it exceedingly strange that the prince should already have incurred further debts, and he was somewhat annoyed at the remark which he had made in asking for the loan. There was a risk that the old. elector might come to hear of his son's borrowings, and they would arouse his indignation not only with his son but also with the firm of Rothschild. Carl Rothschild met a chamberlain in the anteroom, and made some remark which may have sounded ill-tempered about the request for a further loan.

After returning to Frankfort Carl took counsel with Amschel, who was there alone; the result was embodied in the following letter:[12]

MOST EXCELLENT PRINCE!
We have the honor to acknowledge your Highness's most gracious letter of 28th ultimo. We must confess that having but recently handed to your Highness the considerable loan of 200,000 reichsthalers, we did not expect to be asked for a still greater amount. Your Highness will be graciously aware that we can act only in agreement with our absent brothers, and we shall therefore not fail to communicate to them your Highness's letter, asking them for their views. In the meantime we would most submissively beg for a gracious explanation of the following passage in your Highness's letter, in which your Highness is pleased to state: "You have the best possible knowledge of the elector's business here, and it is therefore particularly easy for you to reimburse yourselves through discounting bills."
Our knowledge of the elector's affairs extends only to such business as we are entrusted to carry out. It is impossible for us to retain a single farthing and to apply it in the interest of your Highness, for we furnish the fullest accounts of the smallest transaction and send them to Cassel.

This letter was to fulfil a double object: it would stave off the prince for the time being, and it would also be a protection against any reproaches from the elector if the matter leaked out.
The letter displeased the prince exceedingly; he perceived the rebuke and would have liked to reply indignantly. But he restrained his feelings as he still hoped to get money from the Rothschilds. However, he felt that in these circumstances it was difficult for him to carry on the negotiations personally. He accordingly selected Buderus as a go-between, requesting him to keep the matter strictly secret from the elector.
"Having learned of the chance arrival of Baron Carl von Rothschild," the prince wrote to Buderus,[13] anticipating the future title of the family, "I felt that I should inform him of the application I had made to his firm, and did so most politely. He, however, replied in a most unfriendly way, and permitted himself to make remarks behind my back which are not consonant with my honor." The young prince stated that nevertheless he still had confidence in the firm, and begged Buderus to use his influence to help him out of the awkward situation. He suggested that the Rothschilds' letter must be based upon a misapprehension. "I for my part," he continued, "could of course never have thought of such a thing, my intention being to indicate to him that he would be fully secured as he would have me more or less in his hands."

Buderus hastened to carry out the wishes of the heir to the throne, his future master. He went to Frankfort and remonstrated with Carl Rothschild for making the remark to which the elector's heir had taken exception. Carl Rothschild protested that he had made no remark regarding the further loan to anyone excepting Holzforster, the gentleman in waiting, who was kept fully informed of the financial affairs of the heir. Buderus reported to the young prince: [14] "I have succeeded in persuading Finanzrat Carl, who was the only one of the brothers at Frankfort, temporarily to advance a few thousand friedrichdors. Finanzrat Solomon of London has gone to a spa, and Finanzrat Amschel is also traveling. It will require a month to obtain the replies of the absent brothers."

However, the heir to the throne was persistent. He immediately informed Buderus that he was not going to be fobbed off with a few thousand friedrichdors, and added a remark which savored strongly of a threat.

"I know," [15] he wrote, "that these gentlemen will be entirely guided by what you say, and my gratitude in future to Privy Councilor von Carlshausen will be commensurate with his readiness to do me a service now."

The letter went on to make proposals as to how the 300,000 reichsthalers might in spite of everything be obtained from Rothschild.

The faithful Buderus felt very bitter about this ungracious reply. He could not force the banking firm to hand out money at the point of the bayonet. "I most humbly assure your Highness,"[16] he replied, "that the will to carry out your desires is not lacking, and that I would spare myself no labor or sacrifice to that end, for I find my greatest satisfaction in the success of my endeavors. Nevertheless, with the best will in the world I am unable to dispose of another person's property, or to dictate to him how he should deal with it."

Buderus reported that he had immediately sent a further pressing request to the firm of Rothschild, and had received the following communication from Carl:[17] "I am anxious to accede to his Highness's request, and assure you that if it depended on me alone there would be no obstacle to its being immediately granted. However, in the present instance consultation with all my brothers, who are now away, is particularly necessary. Our funds have been to an extent tied up in the recent negotiations for considerable loans, and I am unable to my infinite regret . . . immediately to come to a decision. Nevertheless, your Excellency may be assured that we shall make every possible effort to satisfy his Highness's requirements."

Meanwhile Solomon had returned to Frankfort, and it was decided after all to advance the prince the money he wanted on very special security. By a deed dated October 15, 1818, he mortgaged not only "all his real and personal property to the exclusion of nothing whatsoever," but also any property of which he might become possessed in the future in any way whatever.[17]

Three months had scarcely elapsed when the prince was again in need of money. He himself felt that Carlshausen would think it strange that he should already want another 100,000 gulden; and he first tried to see whether he could "acquire" the money from his father's friend, a lady whose politeness led him to expect that she would not refuse his request.[18] The Countess von Hessenstein evaded the question of a loan in her reply.

The young prince would have gladly paid the firm of Rothschild ten percent interest if only he could have got the money. Von Carlshausen was instructed by the Rothschilds to inform him that the firm never accepted interest at ten percent as this would be a usurious rate. Thereupon the prince wrote as follows to his father's loyal servant:

"I am well aware that the House of Rothschild can loan no capital sums in cash at five percent without loss, and at the same time that the prestige of the firm is too great to allow them to take a higher rate of interest—a fact which is entirely to their credit, although in these times no objection could be made to the higher rate. I am therefore confident that your Excellency will, with your usual kindness, use your good offices with the House of Rothschild to persuade them to grant me a further loan of four hundred thousand thalers."[19]

This request moved the firm of Rothschild to indignation. "Your letter," they wrote to Carlshausen, "arrived at the same time with the letter embodying the resolve of our brother at Berlin, in accordance with which it is plainly impossible for us to provide a sum exceeding the five hundred thousand reichsthalers in cash already advanced, especially in view of the fact that we have had to make the most exhaustive efforts to provide that sum."[20]

The use of the word "resolve" in this letter calls for special comment, this word usually being reserved for the decisions of sovereign rulers; also, it was apparently not so "plainly" impossible to advance the money, for on April 1, 1819, this third loan was also granted and the prince received the money he wanted.

Scarcely two years later the elector died; his son succeeded to the government and to his father's great possessions, and the Rothschilds had their money repaid in full with all interest due.

A far-reaching political development now diverted the firm's attention from such minor loan transactions, concentrating it exclusively upon the higher politics of Europe. The victorious powers had decided to meet in a congress at Aix-la-Chapelle, there to establish new relations with the France of the Restoration, as well as to discuss the question whether the armies of occupation should be withdrawn, and alleviation granted for the indemnities to be paid. England and the eastern powers were still suspicious of France; and the interest aroused by this congress was so great that the monarchs of the Holy Alliance attended it in person, while England was represented by the two foremost men of the day, Lord Castlereagh and Wellington.

Metternich meant to use this opportunity to secure the support of the tsar and the King of Prussia for his schemes by playing on their fears of revolution and general upheaval. Besides the numerous statesmen, the most prominent bankers and merchants of Europe flocked to Aix-la-Chapelle, scenting prey. Most of them traveled through Frankfort and availed themselves of the opportunity of getting into touch with the financial wire-pullers in the commercial center of Germany. Metternich too had come to Frankfort on September 3, 1818, accompanied by Gentz.

Gentz was his secretary and adviser in money matters; but he was interested not only in his country's but also in his own personal advantage. With rare candor he notes in his diary that in 1815 he received a purse with three hundred ducats and one with eight hundred ducats from Russia, and that Prussia had given him—an Austrian civil servant—eight hundred ducats and two hundred gold napoleons as a gratuity.[21] He was also quite open about the fact that the Jewish banker Lamel had given him money and that Parish had given him a share of the Austrian loan of May, 1818. Gentz called such transactions "pleasant financial dealings."[22] His way of referring to them is so candid that one gets the impression that the circumstances of those times prevented his being in the least conscious of anything improper in such gifts.

Prince Metternich came into contact with all the local magnates at Frankfort, including Bethmann. He seems not yet to have met Rothschild personally at this time, hut this defect was more than made good by his right-hand man Frederick von Gentz. The brothers Rothschild were well aware of the great influence that Gentz exerted upon Metternich in matters concerning the state finances, and through him upon the minister of finance, Count Stadion. They knew also that Gentz was bribable, whereas they naturally did not venture to approach Metternich in such a way.

Amschel Meyer and Carl Rothschild therefore called on Gentz immediately after his arrival. This visit resulted in verbal agreements of a financial nature; and they also requested him to use his influence with the prince toward securing his support in the question of the Frankfort Jews; for at that time the senate[23] was attempting to dispute the competence of the diet to deal with the Jewish problem, arguing that it was a purely local matter. The pressure brought to bear by the Rothschilds upon Gentz, and through him upon Metternich, resulted in the senate's objection being disallowed, and a commission of the diet being appointed to mediate between the two parties.

This decision, taken on September 10, 1818, moved the brothers to call on Gentz again on September 12, and to "engage his interest" by a further detailed exposition of the whole matter. Gentz suggested that Hardenberg should have his attention called to the subject again as he would meet Metternich at Aix-la-Chapelle and would be able to discuss it with him. The brothers needed no pressing to do this, and wrote to Hardenberg in the following terms:

"Your Highness's gracious sentiments toward us, as well as your well-known tolerance in matters of religious opinion, gives us reason to hope that you will graciously grant this letter your favorable consideration. The question at issue is the final decision in the matter of our position as citizens. This is a most important question for us now, since the welfare of those who confess our faith depends upon it, and is constantly occupying our thoughts. We are exceedingly anxious not to let pass the opportunity of the meeting between your Highness and his Highness the Prince von Metternich to ask that he should come to a final favorable decision regarding our destiny, and we await his decision in confidence. In venturing to appeal as strongly as possible to your Highness we hope that it may be vouchsafed to us to look with confidence to the future."[24]

During the sixteen days which Gentz spent at Frankfort the brothers Rothschild very frequently came to see him; he was invited to dine with the Rothschilds at five o'clock on September 22, Frau Herz and General Volzoven being among those present at the dinner. Amschel made no slight effort to have distinguished people at his table; but, as Johann Smidt, Mayor of Bremen, stated,[25] it was not in accordance with contemporary customs and manners to admit a Jew to so-called good society. No Christian banker or merchant of Frankfort had yet invited a Jew, not even one of the Rothschild brothers, to dine, and the delegates to the diet did not do so either. However, several people were beginning to depart from this tradition, and accepted invitations from the Rothschilds, either from an absence of prejudice, or from motives of personal interest.

Gentz arrived at Aix-la-Chapelle September 25, a few days after Metternich. A brilliant society had met in that city for the congress. Besides monarchs and statesmen, it included financial magnates such as Baring and Hope, who were negotiating the French loans in connection with the payment of the war indemnity. The firm of Rothschild had sent two brothers to Aix-la-Chapelle, Solomon and Carl. The latter was accompanied by his bride, the beautiful and intelligent Adelheid Herz, whom he had married on September 16, so that his business journey to the congress coincided with his honeymoon. In the case of the House of Rothschild even the most important personal considerations had to yield to important business, and to such a unique opportunity for forming extensive new connections.

Through Gentz, Metternich was brought into actual touch with the two brothers at Aix-la-Chapelle. Gentz fell completely under their influence, and his diary constantly records their visits. On October 27 Solomon handed him eight hundred ducats, which he stated he had won by speculating for him in British funds.[28]

On November 2, Gentz again records[27] "pleasant financial dealings" with Solomon, and on November 12 the brothers, together with Gentz and Parish, lunched with Metternich. In spite of his heavy work in keeping the minutes of the congress, Gentz spent the whole of the next day working on a memorandum stating the case for the Jews of Frankfort, no doubt in return for financial considerations. He called upon Carl's young wife, who was highly flattered to be waited upon by the secretary and confidant of the man who was playing the leading role in the illustrious assembly. At the Rothschilds' request, Gentz supported Dr. Buchholz, whom the Jews had sent to Aix-la-Chapelle to secure a favorable decision. Even if this proved fruitless, the European Areopagus was at any rate led to view the question in dispute from a friendly angle.

The congress broke up on November 14, 1818. Its conclusion brought profit to the House of Rothschild, although the principal parts among the bankers had been played, not by them, but by Baring and Hope. The Rothschilds, however, took over bills from that firm. They had successfully put forward the demands of small princes and above all through Gentz they had obtained a profound insight into the activities of the men who were the determining factors in European politics. Moreover, they had formed invaluable connections for the future of their House; and more especially they had made the closer acquaintance of Metternich, the most powerful man in Europe at the time. The brothers therefore left Aix-la-Chapelle in a state of high satisfaction.

Gentz was no less satisfied. He had been widely complimented for his work during the congress and had collected two orders, as well as six thousand ducats. He also attached great value to having "taken part in the most instructive conversation with the most powerful men in the commercial world, while the intimate secrets of the greatest financial dealings that have ever been transacted between men were negotiated in his little room."[28]

It is true that Gentz liked to see himself in a romantic light, and was wont to exaggerate anything with which he had to do; but the negotiations at Aix-la-Chapelle as to the manner in which France should pay the 270 million francs of war indemnity still outstanding did in fact constitute a formidable financial transaction. Metternich returned home with his sovereign, but Gentz returned at the end of November via Frankfort, where he spent about a week.

His diary shows that the first week in December, 1818, was spent in almost daily visits to or from the Rothschilds, and in long conversations and discussions with the members of the banking family. Hour after hour Gentz worked in favor of the Jews of Frankfort. To this period must be attributed the conclusion of the agreement that was so profitable to both, providing the Rothschilds with an important source of political information and a connection with Metternich, while enabling Gentz to carry on his extravagant manner of life, and to indulge in his expensive middle-aged amour with Fanny Elssler. The relationship continued until his death.

From Frankfort Gentz proceeded home via Munich, where he received a letter from his friend Adam Mtiller.

The public had learned something of the part played by the brothers Rothschild during the past critical years, and Gentz had told Mtiller more. Mtiller, as a result, suggested that his friend describe in a short sketch the rise of the House of Rothschild.[29]

Gentz replied as follows: "I was delighted with your idea of a monograph on the Rothschilds. It is one of the brightest and most happy notions that I have heard for some time. The word is all the more appropriate since the Rothschilds really do constitute a special species plantarum with its own characteristics. They are vulgar, ignorant Jews, outwardly presentable. In their craft they act entirely in accordance with the principles of naturalism, having no suspicion of a higher order of things; but they are gifted with a remarkable instinct which causes them always to choose the right, and of two rights, the better. Their enormous wealth (they are the richest people in Europe) is entirely the result of this instinct which the public are wont to call luck.

"Now that I have seen everything at close quarters, Baring's most profound reasoning inspires me with less confidence than the sound judgment of one of the more intelligent Rothschilds—for among the five brothers there is one whose intelligence is wanting and another whose intelligence is weak. If Baring and Hope ever fail, I can state with confidence that it will be because they have thought themselves cleverer than Rothschild and have not followed his advice. I am writing to you con amore aboutt these people and their business, because they were my recreation at Aix-la-Chapelle and at the same time I learned a great deal from them."

These remarks of Gentz's are valuable because they occur in a confidential private letter to a friend. We shall see later how differently Gentz was to speak about the same Rothschilds in a work destined for publication for which he received a princely fee from the family.

While the International Congress temporarily brought the three brothers, Amschel, Solomon, and Carl into the foreground, James in Paris and Nathan in London had not been inactive. Nathan in particular had succeeded in carrying on his activities in dealing with large loans, and had issued twelve million pounds of English State Loan. This business does not itself appear to have brought much profit to the firm of Rothschild, but it secured its prestige in the eyes of the British Treasury, and demonstrated to the whole world that in the face of native competition it had maintained its position as the banker of England—a nation which now, after Napoleon's overthrow, was rejoicing in its undisputed political power and wealth.

James in Paris was in constant close association with Barbier, the chairman of the Austrian Liquidation Committee in that city. He continued his efforts in rivalry with other firms, to secure the handling of the war indemnity, and so extended his business.

While the House was thus prospering throughout the world, its existence was suddenly most seriously threatened in the home town of Frankfort. The family had just lost one of its best friends there—the man to whom must properly be ascribed the important part of having first held the ladder on which the House of Rothschild had climbed to such heights. On August 3, 1819, while sitting at his desk in Hanau, Buderus had a stroke.

A short glance at the papers which he left shows that he had spent his whole life in meticulous devotion to the exacting work of accountancy. The son of a poor schoolmaster, he had risen to the rank of privy councilor and head of the treasury. He had acquired a fine estate and was possessed of about one and a half million gulden.[30]

All this was, however, a trifling reward, when one considers the services he rendered to the elector during the Napoleonic period, and the enormous portions of the elector's possessions he rescued.

His devotion to duty had not made him popular, for he was reproached with having acted with too great harshness in the elector's interests. Von Carlshausen seems to have realized this at the end of his days, and there is a suggestion of self-justification in the concluding sentence of his will, which reads as follows:

"I have done what was in my power to provide for my dear children. I have considered no sacrifice and no effort to be too great where the furtherance of their happiness has been concerned, and my whole life has been a consistent endeavor to place their welfare on a firm foundation. God has blessed my efforts . . . and you, my dear children, hearken to and follow a father's last counsel: guard carefully the property which I, with God's help, have industriously acquired. It is burdened neither by the tears of the oppressed nor by the curses of the defrauded. Endeavor to increase and secure it through economy, order, industry, wisdom, clemency, and piety. Shun greed and usurious avarice that blights all virtue. Have naught to do with unjust acquisitions. Always remember that contentment is the crown of riches."[31]

The House of Rothschild owed an infinite debt of gratitude to the dead man. It is true that under the contract he had had his share in the business, and to this fact indeed he owed the greater part of his wealth. But this was of small account in comparison with the services which he had rendered in excluding all rival firms from the rich elector's business, and with the possibilities which he had created of applying the elector's money to consolidate the credit of the banking firm and to secure its great business.

It was in its native town that the rise of the House had aroused the greatest envy and hatred. A Frankfort police report of that time gives a fairly good picture of popular feeling in the old imperial city:

"The occasion of a day of penitence,"[32] the report runs, "being held to commemorate a big fire that occurred at Frankfort a hundred years ago, through which four hundred houses were destroyed, clearly brings out the feelings of the Christian inhabitants against the Jews. According to the story, much property is supposed to have been stolen by them. In general, any opportunity for showing envy and ill-will is welcomed, all sense of justice being forgotten, although many rich Jews are a source of substantial income to Christians. Any right-thinking person will condemn the fact, for instance, that a caricature ridiculing his ennoblement[33] was recently pinned to the door of the Jewish banker Rothschild at Frankfort.

"Rothschild, although he indulges somewhat in display, provides many people with an opportunity of earning money thereby, and is exceedingly benevolent to the poor whether they be Christians or Jews. The capacity of this Jewish commercial and banking firm is shown by the fact that it has taken over a loan for England, of which we have just been informed. It is noteworthy that the firm of Rothschild secured the business in competition against others. A few days ago the firm on receiving a special message from Vienna bought fifteen thousand Metalliques; the price of Austrian securities immediately rose, and the stockbrokers got extraordinarily busy."

The revelation of the firm's power had the most exaggerated results. In such a highly emotional period as Germany was passing through, a rapid development of this kind was bound to have a particularly exasperating effect upon contemporaries and rivals. All thinking people in Germany were greatly stirred by the desire for freedom and national unity. On March 23, 1819, a fanatic's dagger cost Kotzebue his life because of his attacks on the national party. The emotion, artificially held in check by Metternich, everywhere vented itself upon the Jews.

A farce called "Unser Verkehr" ("Our Neighbors") was played throughout Germany, which, to the uproarious applause of the spectators, ridiculed the manners and customs of the Jews.[34] The author was unknown, and everybody said that the House of Rothschild had offered a reward for his discovery.

In August, 1819, the Conferences of Ministers, over which Metternich presided, met at Carlsbad to decide upon the notorious measures against any movement of liberation; the resulting excitement found an outlet in a violent outbreak of popular passion against the Jews. Wiirzburg was the first town in which acts of violence were perpetrated. The populace gathered together in groups which marched past the Jews' houses, smashing windows and breaking down doors. They began to loot. "Hepp! Hepp! Down with the Jews!"[35] resounded through the streets. Similar scenes occurred in Bamberg and other towns.

The Jews of Frankfort were all the more dismayed by these occurrences, as there had been menacing signs of a similar movement developing in that city. Amschel Meyer Rothschild and his two brothers, who on account of their wealth were likely to be the principal object of any attack, began to feel that their lives were seriously threatened, and to consider the question of flight.

One of the brothers seems to have spoken of their intentions to an Austrian official, for, writing on August 6, a secretary of legation at Frankfort reports as follows:[36]

"I have the honor tentatively to inform you that I have learned from a reliable source that the Jewish banking firm of Rothschild here intends to leave Frankfort for good ; they are going to apply, through the imperial minister of finance Count von Stadion for permission to settle in Vienna. Their intention is still a close secret here.

When they give effect to it, it will cause an enormous sensation both among the municipal authorities and in the whole business community, and the splendor of Frankfort will be considerably dimmed. It will probably serve to heighten the bitter feeling against the Jews, and the departure of the Rothschilds will be a fatal blow to them."

Frankfort soon caught the contagion of the anti-Jewish disturbances in the other cities of Germany. They were all the more likely to culminate in deeds of violence in that city since the populace knew that in its hatred of the Jews it enjoyed the sympathy of the highest authorities in the town. The occasion for the outbreak was a trifling one. On the evening of August 10, 1819, some youths walked through the Jewish quarter provocatively shouting "Hepp, Hepp!" Several Jews who happened to be standing at their doors joined to drive the youths out of their street, and beat one of the brawlers who had fallen into their hands. Thereupon the rumor spread through Frankfort like lightning that a Christian had been killed by the Jews.

Crowds collected instantaneously and moved shouting through the Jewish quarter, breaking up windows and shops with stones. The house of the Rothschilds was also attacked, and all their window-panes lay scattered about the streets. The family had had to take refuge in the back room, where they listened trembling to the threatening shouts of the mob.

On the morning of the nth, the words "Hepp, hepp," the slogan for driving out the loathed Jew, were inscribed in large letters at all the street corners. Thereupon several wealthy Israelites left the inhospitable town of Frankfort, and the brothers Rothschild nearly followed their example. As the disturbances increased the senate began to be alarmed that the Jew-baiting might develop into a general rising. The available troops were called up to hold the excited populace in check. Moreover, the delegates to the diet, feeling particularly concerned about the attacks on the House of Rothschild, which had important financial connections with most of the governments represented at the diet, demanded that counter-measures should be taken. A general resolution of the diet was proposed, requiring the senate to take strong measures to protect the security and property of the Jews.

Count Buol would certainly have been acting in accordance with the wishes of Prince Metternich in pressing energetically, at any rate on behalf of Austria, for such measures to be taken by the senate. Buol, however, who was hostile to the Jews, hesitated and waited for instructions. Not so the Prussian representative, Counselor of Embassy Himly. On the very morning of August 11 he gave a "most worshipful council of the free city of Frankfort to understand[37] that he had the fullest confidence that the council would take the most appropriate measures for punishing the attack made upon the house of the royal Prussian commercial advisers, Meyer Amschel von Rothschild and Sons, and would assure their persons and property adequate protection against similar risks in the future." Himly added, "The undersigned kindly requests the earliest possible information regarding the measures which an honorable council have taken in this matter."

The mayors Metzler and von Usemer replied that the disturbances in the Jewish quarter had immediately subsided, and that the senate had taken the strongest measures to prevent their recurrence. The senate added to this statement that the protection of the laws extended to all the inhabitants, and therefore also to the merchants Rothschild, and that the events of the previous night would be reviewed most strictly, and the ringleaders punished.[38] This read well, but bore little relation to reality, for although actual attacks upon the houses of the Jews ceased, the hatred of their inhabitants had come into the open, and this kept the Jews in a state of anxiety.

James in Paris had heard with great alarm of what had occurred at Frankfort, and had urged his brother to leave his home. "You will have read in the public press," he wrote to David Parish at Carlsbad, "how on the night of the 10th of this month mobs collected in the streets of Frankfort and poured forth threats and imprecations upon the Jewish community. Prompt measures on the part of a praiseworthy senate have scattered the ring-leaders and, according to the last reports I have received, have restored order.

"You can readily imagine that such occurrences are as unpleasant as they are unexpected nowadays. What can be the result of such disturbances? Surely they can have the effect only of causing all the rich people of our nation to leave Germany and transfer their property to France and England. I myself have advised my brother at Frankfort to shut down his house and to come here. If we make a start I am convinced that all well-to-do people will follow our example, and I question whether the sovereigns of Germany will be pleased with a development that will make it necessary for them to apply to France or England when they are in need of funds.

"Who buys state bonds in Germany, and who has endeavored to raise the rate of exchange if it be not our nation? Has not our example engendered a certain confidence in state loans, so that Christian firms have also taken heart and invested part of their money in all kinds of securities? The Jewish community in Germany is not allowed to learn the various crafts, so that there is nothing left for them to do but to become dealers in money ana stocks.

"A man generally has the greatest confidence in the securities of the country in which he lives; if the peace of the rich in Germany be disturbed, they will find themselves forced to emigrate for their safety; and they will certainly not take any interest in the funds of a country where their life has been obviously endangered. The object of the agitators at Frankfort seems to have been provisionally to collect all the Israelites into a single street; if they had succeeded in doing this, might it not have led to a general massacre? In that case would the public have had any scruples about plundering their houses?

"I need not point out to you how undesirable such an occurrence would be, especially at a time when our house might be holding large sums for the account of the Austrian or Prussian court. It seems to me to be really necessary that Austria or Prussia should devise measures to be applied by the senate at Frankfort for energetically dealing with occurrences such as those of the 10th of this month, and thus making each man secure in his possessions.

"I am sure you will be so good as to speak to his Highness Prince Metternich about this matter, and your friendship for me makes me feel confident that you will appeal to him strongly on behalf of our nation. I am informed that Herr von Bethmann was particularly conspicuous among those who endeavored to restore order."[39]

The advice which James gave from abroad did not take into account the important interests that would have to be sacrificed if the firm that was so deeply rooted in its native city, where it was the center of an intricate network of business connections, were to change its headquarters. The brothers who were resident at Frankfort did certainly consider the question of leaving the town, but when order had been restored they gave up the idea for the time. Amschel Meyer, as head of the firm, was tied to Frankfort. But in Solomon and Carl, who were freer to move about, the events at Frankfort had produced a certain uneasiness, which made them inclined to welcome any future opportunity for settling elsewhere.

Baron von Handel attentively noted the results of the Jewish disturbances. Some rich Jewish firms such as Ellissen and Speyer did actually transfer their headquarters to the Hessian town of Offenbach close by; and a persistent rumor was maintained that the Rothschilds would follow them.

"The great and rich House of Rothschild," Handel reported to Metternich, "is supposed to be not entirely averse to the idea of leaving here; and if they should do so, they would probably take up permanent residence in Paris or London, where they already have branches. The question suggests itself whether it would not be in our interests to offer them the prospect of a good reception in the I. and R. states, and to induce the House to emigrate to Vienna."[40]

This report was communicated to the committee of the treasury dealing with commercial affairs at Vienna.[41] The next day another letter from Handel arrived, stating that the inclination of the Rothschild banking firm to leave Frankfort was becoming more and more marked. The treasury committee for commercial affairs transmitted these to the ministry of finance and the interior for their information and observation, adding[42] that Amschel von Rothschild spent a hundred and fifty thousand gulden on his household alone and that he gave twenty thousand gulden a year to the poor. The committee were of opinion that the firm of Rothschild was at liberty to apply to be received in the I. and R. states. Count Stadion thereupon wrote the following to the minister of the interior, Count Saurau:

"The president of the treasury committee has informed me in the enclosed letter of his intention to invite the Frankfort firm of Rothschild to settle in Vienna, and also of the means whereby, subject to my agreement, he proposes to prepare the way to this end. The settlement of the House of Rothschild within the Austrian dominions would without doubt be of great advantage, and the proposal is therefore deserving of every support, although Hofrat von Handel's letter does not suggest that the House have expressed any desire to emigrate to the Austrian dominions. It merely raises the question whether an effort should be made to induce them to do so."[43]

As the reception of the Jewish families was a matter that concerned the minister of the interior, Stadion referred the suggestion to him, with the request that he approve it. Count Saurau sent his reply direct to the president of the treasury committee, conveying his decision to Stadion in the form of a copy of that letter, which read as follows:[44]

I venture first to call your Excellency's attention to the fact . . . that it is still quite uncertain whether the firm of Rothschild intends to leave Frankfort. Still less may we infer (from the reports) any clearly expressed preference for settling in Vienna. It would seem indeed exceedingly doubtful whether the House of Rothschild would choose for permanent residence a place where its principal would, in view of his religious persuasion, be subject to more restrictions than in any other state. Your Excellency must be aware that foreign Israelites may reside here only on obtaining the special "toleration" permit, which cannot be issued until they have duly received the provisional authorization for wholesale trading.

The department is not competent to make an exception to the I. and R. regulations regarding this matter, and its action would be limited ... to approving the request of the House of Rothschild for permission to reside, if submitted. In view of the complicated conditions, which are not likely to attract the House of Rothschild, it would seem especially desirable to avoid any step that suggested an invitation, and to leave it to them to apply, since special exceptions can be made only with the personal approval of the emperor. Meanwhile your Excellency may rest assured that we are far too well aware of the advantages that would in many respects accrue to the imperial state of Austria through the settlement of such an eminent firm within its borders, not to advise his Majesty most emphatically to give his consent as soon as a formal or definite application in this matter is received.

Handel was accordingly instructed that if the House of Rothschild made inquiries at the legation he was to indicate that they should submit an application. In any case, the report of the department revealed that it desired the House of Rothschild to emigrate to Vienna.

This was all the more remarkable as the position of the Jews in Austria was far from being an enviable one. They had not the right of owning land in any part of the imperial dominions; law and custom excluded them from administration and the courts, from the practice of the law and from the teaching profession, from all higher posts in the army, and from any political functions and offices. They were restricted in the matter of marriages; they had to pay poll tax and report themselves to the Jewish office, and foreign Jews were allowed to remain in the country only for a short period.

Such were the circumstances in which the highest officials in the state of Austria were trying to induce a foreign Jewish family to settle in the country. But that family was enormously rich; its financial influence was immense; and money overcame all other considerations. Soon a Rothschild House was to be established in Vienna too.

Frankfort was becoming exceedingly uncomfortable for the Rothschild family. The brothers were constantly receiving anonymous threats. One letter[45] informed them of the day on which Amschel was to be murdered by a secret society formed for the purpose of driving the Jews out of Frankfort. In spite of all this the firm continued to carry on its business undisturbed, the Austrian side of it particularly developing with the help of Metternich and Stadion.

Austrian affairs were chiefly left to Solomon. In mid-July of that year the firm of Rothschild had undertaken jointly with Gontard to arrange for the transfer from Naples of large sums of money which that kingdom had owed Austria since the intervention of 1815. Also sums to the value of about three million francs, payable in satisfaction of Austria's claims upon France, were transmitted to Vienna, the firm of Rothschild receiving one percent of the payments effected.[46] Finally, the brothers had heard from a confidential source in Milan that there was an amount of money in the state treasury there[47] which the government wished to transfer to Vienna. They immediately offered to carry this out.

It involved a transmission of two million lira in gold Coins, and Solomon, who was again staying at Vienna, quickly got into personal touch with the treasury in order to discuss the best means of sending this sum from Milan to Vienna through exchange operations. The firm of Rothschild stated that they would undertake the transfer of any sum whatever at the cheapest rate possible, and that they could arrange the business to the greatest advantage of the imperial interests.[48] For this service they and the firm of Gontard received one-half percent commission and one-eighth percent brokerage, so that for the simple transmission of the money from Milan to Vienna they received 12,933 lira in gold.

Their extensive transactions necessitated a voluminous correspondence, the rapid transmission of which was a difficult problem under the primitive conditions of those times. It was not only that posts were slow and far between; there were special dangers attached to the postal service because the contents of correspondence was not treated as inviolable. A large part of Germany was still served by the Thurn and Taxis post bureaus which were divided into lodges and non-lodges,[49] according as their officials were or were not the confidential agents of the Viennese Cipher Service.

If a letter came to a lodge office, it was carefully opened before being sent on, read through, and any important passages were copied. As these "intercepts," as they were called, were always laid before the authorities, such action, often abused, was greatly feared. Even Count Stadion did not hesitate[50] personally to invent "intercepts" in order to ruin persons who were a nuisance to him. Sometimes the couriers themselves intercepted letters in transit.

"Such inspection," Bethmann wrote on the occasion of a visit to Vienna,[51] "is inevitable, and Rothschild and Parish are as little able to avoid it as Herr von Geymiiller, although the latter enjoys the full confidence of Prince Metternich. Solomon Rothschild yesterday told me that his brother had recently again received three letters from him in one day."

The brothers Rothschild naturally thoroughly understood the position. As they had a great deal to say to one another that they did not wish anyone else to hear and also attached great importance to the speedy receipt of news in advance of normal methods, they decided to have their own system of couriers. They would be reimbursed for the heavy expense of this arrangement at one stroke if their firm thereby received early news of any political event that might affect the exchange.

An example of this occurred when the Duke of Berry was murdered. The duke was the nephew of the King of France, and as Louis XVIII had no children, the hopes of the Bourbons were centered upon him. As he was leaving the opera on February 13, 1820, he was assassinated by a political fanatic who thought to save France by exterminating the Bourbons. According to Handel's statement[52] the Rothschilds heard of this long before anyone else; they made appropriate arrangements for themselves, and then made the event known. This resulted in an immediate fall in all state securities, and produced "general consternation."

The courier system was at first inaugurated between the three brothers in London, Frankfort, and Paris. When the business with Austria accumulated, and Solomon's visits there grew more and more lengthy, the couriers extended their route to include Vienna.

The Austrian representatives in London, Frankfort, and Paris, being in constant communication with the House of Rothschild, soon realized that reports could be more speedily sent in this manner and, as remarks on numerous documents showed, frequently entrusted the Rothschild couriers with the most important and secret letters, without considering whether the Rothschilds might turn the tables and themselves "intercept" the state communications. This certainly cannot be proved, but it is highly probable, for on one occasion, when the brothers entrusted a letter to an ambassador, the letter was immediately "perused." Proof of this is furnished by the following two letters: on November 28, 1819,[53] Handel reported as follows to Metternich: "The banker Carl von Rothschild, who left for Vienna today, asked us to put several letters to various German ministers meeting at Vienna, which he had been asked to take with him, in a packet and seal it with the embassy seal, so that he could bring them over the frontier without risk. I made no difficulty about acceding to the request of Herr von Rothschild—who like other Jews is exceedingly timid but is a person of sound character—because this favor made it possible to see the contents of the letters. Rothschild duly sent them to me and although I had not time to peruse them all, I was able to scan the more important." The other letter was from[54] Le Monnier, the secretary of legation at Frankfort, to the director of the secret service department at Vienna. It ran as follows: "Herr Rothschild [no doubt Amschel Meyer], whom I often meet at Count Buol's as well as at Baron von Handel's, has asked me to allow him to send his letters to his brother in my bag. I did not raise any objection as I did not think it advisable to refuse; but I venture to suggest that you should inform the secret service department of this fact so that they may look out for these letters and intercept all those under my address."

It is not at all unlikely that the brothers Rothschild, who must be credited with a reasonable amount of intelligence, sometimes deliberately had letters sent through the embassies in order to put them in possession of facts which had been invented or adapted for definite purposes.

The financial position of all the states which had been engaged in prolonged military operations much needed to be set in order, now that peace and tranquillity had returned. In Austria, Stadion was dealing with this problem in collaboration with Metternich. Metternich was personally concerned to see that Stadion was profitably occupied in the financial matters, to which he had been sidetracked when the chancellor succeeded to the Foreign Office. His rival would then feel that he had plenty to do, and the financial strengthening of the monarchy would assist the policy of the chancellor. There were thus two men controlling the destinies of Austria who were well disposed to the Jews in general and to the House of Rothschild in particular.

In 1816, in addition to the interest-bearing state debt, there was an almost equal amount of paper money in circulation which was worth a quarter less than its face value. Stadion's efforts were directed toward preventing any further fall in value, through the issue of loans and other measures such as the founding of a national bank. The Metalliques loan, so called because the interest on the bonds was payable in precious metal, constituted a beginning. Stadion was in agreement with Metternich that the House of Rothschild should always be treated with consideration politically, with a view to inducing it also to participate in a loan. Since these were Metternich's plans, it is not strange that he should have been much irritated by the anti-Jewish attitude of the city of Frankfort.

Frankfort was described as a center of unrest[55] in the reports from the delegates at this period. This was quite enough reason for Metternich, who scented revolution and upheaval everywhere, to feel displeased with that city. He accordingly intervened to prevent the diet from leaving the settlement of the Jewish problem to the municipal departments. Metternich and Stadion also decided to accede to the request made a year and a day previously that Nathan should be appointed consul in London. On March 3, 1820, the emperor gave his formal sanction in this matter.[56]

The ambassador in London, Prince von Esterhazy, was instructed [57] to inform Nathan of his new sphere of activity, and to encourage him "through friendly advice and any other suitable means to carry out his duties in the manner which the state expected." Official instructions were simultaneously sent to Nathan in London[58] informing him not merely that he should duly carry out the duties imposed upon him by the I. and R. embassy, hut that he should, without waiting to be asked, regularly convey to them any information he received regarding events that might directly or indirectly affect the government's policy.

On Metternich's instructions Handel, the minister at Frankfort, had in November, 1819,[59] entered into negotiations with Rothschild for the big loan that Austria wanted to place with the firm.

Since that time the distinctions and favors already described had with deliberate intent been accorded to the House of Rothschild. Nathan now had a position in the consular corps of the British capital, a fact which was exceedinghy valuable to him both socially and in business. He was able to give Amschel powerful support in his struggle for the rights of the Frankfort Jews.

The ground had thus been well prepared for a favorable reception of the Austrian loan. The national bank required about 55,000,000 gulden in order to withdraw the paper money from circulation. On April 4 the emperor had authorized the minister of finance to issue the loan, which in accordance with Stadion's suggestion was to be done in two parts. On April 7 the first 20,000,000 gulden were, in accordance with Solomon's suggestion, issued to the firms of Rothschild and Parish in the form of a lottery loan, a method which was still unusual at that time, and which never failed of its effect upon the general public.

Nothing was said at the time of the negotiations that were already in progress for the issue of a further 35,000-gulden loan; and everyone subscribed to this loan in the confident belief that it would be the only lottery loan for the time being. The conditions were very oppressive to the Austrian state, although the redemption of the loan extended over quite a long period; under the agreement, the state had to repay in all 38,000,000 in return for the 20,000,000 then advanced. This naturally produced an adverse opinion in the general public, which was ignorant as to the general financial position and Stadion's intentions, and had only these figures to go upon.

A contemporary police report states[60] that the announcement of the Rothschild lottery loan had had a very bad effect upon public sentiment. The government's credit when it had scarcely begun to recover was appreciably lowered.

"As far as the Rothschild loan is concerned," the report continued, "I feel a genuine difficulty in deciding where to commence with my description of the exceedingly unfavorable impression . . . made by this financial operation, not only upon the Viennese public, but also upon the inhabitants of all the provinces. It would not be in accordance with the modesty due from one in my position to record the harsh expressions used by the opponents of this measure in. describing it as a monument of frivolity, caprice, and self-interest—indeed as being an immoral transaction. There have probably not been such numerous critics and opponents of any previous financial operation.

"I heard a guest at an At Home exclaim, 'This loan is one of the most wicked things that have been done at the expense of our pockets for twenty years, and that is saying a great deal!' One thing generally felt about this loan is that the manner in which it was made public inevitably made it unpopular from the start. To notify the inhabitants of a state that 20,000,000 were being borrowed from a foreign Jew, for which 38,000,000—very nearly double the amount—would have to be repaid, is regarded as treating one's subjects as beneath contempt. ... It is felt that the announcement of the loan in the "Wiener Zeitung amounted to the finance minister's saying: 'I am well aware that your expenditure being greater than your income you have not enough money to pay your taxes. Now in order that in future you may be still less able to pay them I shall still further limit the amount of money in circulation and therefore your income. In return for this benefit you will have to pay 38 millions to the Jew Rothschild.'"

The writer of this report emphasized the fact that there appeared to be no conceivable excuse for excluding the public from participating directly in such an advantageous financial speculation as the lottery loan, and for putting it in the hands of a foreign Jew. Citizens were being compelled to purchase the lottery bonds from foreign Jews at a premium of from 10% to 18%.

"I am assured by bankers here," the report continued, "that the profit which the contractors have made out of this loan is enormous. To the four millions granted them by way of commission must be added what they will realize through the sale of the bonds, which they do not issue at under 100 gulden. The Rothschild who is living here himself admits that this profit will increase from year to year, and that he hopes the bonds will rise to 200 by the second drawing, and to 400 by the tenth drawing! And this is not at all unlikely, since Rothschild is holding back the sale of the bonds, thereby increasing his chances of a tremendous gain.

"The whole transaction is felt to be a shameful Jewish swindle arranged between the Rothschilds and the crown agent Joel. The latter is supposed to have persuaded the minister of finance, or rather his department, to agree to it, and in return Joel or Joelson is alleged to have received 1,000 bonds, Count Stadion 2,000, and Burgermeister, the secretary of the treasury, 500. I personally regard all these statements as slanders without any foundation. The feeling about the loan was so bitter at first that a proposal was made among all ranks of society to form leagues, the members of which should pledge themselves not to take bonds exceeding the value of 100 gulden from the Rothschilds."

There were other critics who did not deny that Stadion's intentions were honest, but gave him to understand that they believed the minister of finance had been hopelessly done.

The figures contained in this police report somewhat exaggerated the facts, but expressed the feeling of the public that enormous profits had been made out of this business. In spite of the declared boycott there was an extraordinarily brisk demand for the Rothschild lottery, bonds. The offices were literally besieged with applicants, and the bonds soon rose to no, 120, 150, and even higher.

The Augsburg Allgemeine Zeitung had published articles by Gentz and other agents of the Rothschilds, which under the title "Financial Letters" recommended the "exceptionally favorable lottery." Enticed by these developments, Stadion decided in accordance with the authorization which he had received, to issue the further 35,000,000 gulden four months after the first loan. Rothschild and Parish paid out 35,000,000 gulden of convention currency in cash in twelve monthly instalments, in return for acknowledgments of indebtedness. The terms were such that the state would have to repay 76,821,515 gulden as capital and interest in return for the 35,000,000 gulden which it had received. In addition the state paid a commission of 4%, amounting to 1,400,000 gulden.

These conditions which were approved by Emperor Francis made the loan one of the most lucrative transactions of the time. For the firm not merely exploited the public's gambling instincts to sell the bonds at a good price, it also influenced the rate of exchange through its connections with the principal bourses. It was obvious that the Rothschilds would have to reckon with the fall In the price of the twenty-million issue as soon as it became known that a further loan of thirty-five millions was to be made so soon afterwards. But before this was made public they had placed the original issue at a price well above par, so that when the second loan was issued the earlier bonds were almost all in other people's hands.

There was naturally at once a storm of indignation against the enterprising bankers; but the first issue soon recovered, and the bonds of both issues were eagerly sought. The public indignation subsided; the Austrian State had its millions in cash; and the Rothschilds remained in undisturbed possession of their profits.

The negotiations necessitated by these important and extensive transactions had made essential the continuous presence in Vienna of a member of the Rothschild House. The discussions were carried on almost exclusively by Solomon Rothschild, although he was acting in concert with his brothers. This enormous business, however, required constant personal attention in its further stages also; and it was therefore necessary for Solomon to try to obtain some permanent pied a terre at Vienna. The laws of the country did not allow a foreign Jew to buy a house of his own, and perhaps such was not his original intention. The firm did not yet contemplate establishing a branch similar to those in London and Paris, although this was done eventually as the result of its intimate association with the finance and policy of Austria.

Solomon Rothschild had taken up his quarters in one of the leading hostelries of Vienna, known as the Hotel of the Roman Emperor, No. 1 Renngasse. It had some of the most distinguished visitors at that time, including the King of Wurttemberg in the year 1820. This was the only hotel with a large concert room,[61] and its acoustic properties were excellent. Beethoven often gave recitals there, and occasionally he stayed, it is supposed, at the Roman Emperor.

Solomon lived at the hotel until he was given the freedom of the city of Vienna. Eventually, it is true, he was the only guest in the hotel, for he occupied all the rooms. In the end he bought the building, as well as the house next it, No. 3 Renngasse. This is still in the possession of the family, while an insurance company acquired what was once the Roman Emperor Hotel.

Meanwhile Metternich's confidence in the firm of Rothschild had increased. The family perceived this, and when they saw any signs of big business they would let him know through Gentz that they would like to carry it out. James had learned in Paris that the allies had decided in 1815 to put aside twenty million francs of the Paris war indemnity for the erection of a fourth confederate fortress on the Rhine.[62]

James in Paris and Solomon in Vienna immediately offered to send this money to Frankfort so that the diet might have it available in current coin at their headquarters. Metternich was unduly attracted by the firm's offer to transmit the funds without charging commission or anything for expenses, and overlooked the profit to be derived on the rate of exchange. He therefore decided jointly with the Prussian secretary of state that this business should be carried through by the firm of Rothschild.

The two brothers, by a concerted arrangement, each made an offer that, if the money were left in their hands, the one in Paris would pay 3 1/2% and the one in Vienna would pay 3% until the building work on the fortress actually commenced. That might be a long time yet, as indeed events proved. Barbier observed in this connection (in a letter to Buol)[63] that in carrying out Metternich's instructions he had arranged that the diet should retain the right to demand security for the twenty millions from the House of Rothschild if this sum were deposited with them.

"The House of Rothschild," he wrote, "is undoubtedly one of the richest and best-established firms in Europe, but we thought it wiser to take this precaution as over twenty million francs are involved, which may be on deposit with them for quite a long period if the construction of the new fortress should be still further delayed."

Thus while the government itself paid 5% for ready money it left this large sum on deposit with the firm of Rothschild at 3 1/2% interest for an indefinite time. The banking firm got the advantage of this unexpectedly cheap money just when important political events in the South of Europe threatened to disturb the peaceful atmosphere that had been prevailing since the Congress of Vienna.

The Liberals in Spain had forced the promise of a constitution from King Ferdinand VII, who had been reinstated there. Civil war continued in that country, while the victory which the Liberals had won infected the excitable population in other lands similarly oppressed. Revolution broke out in the kingdom of Naples, where the nationalistic aims of the secret league of the Carbonari had affected wide circles of the population. On his restoration by the Austrians in 1815 King Ferdinand I, an upholder of the principle of absolute autocracy, gladly accepted Metternich's condition that he should make no concessions to the Liberals, and should govern in accordance with the Metternich system. Now, however, that he was threatened by popular rising, he yielded all along the line and made the ringleader, General Pepe, commander-in-chief, and pledged himself to a constitution on the Spanish model.

A similar movement was making progress in the island of Sicily, where the king's ministers had to make way for new men who were popular with the Carbonari. One of these ministers was the brilliant Luigi Cavaliere de Medici, who managed to maintain order in the finances in spite of the extravagances of the ruling family, and the privileges of the nobility and priesthood.

Metternich, who was watching over Europe like a guardian angel, resented any signs of resistance to his "principle of legitimacy." He had been deeply disturbed by the news from Italy, which was within Austria's sphere of interest. If the revolutionary spirit should spread from Naples to the North and infect the territories that were under Austrian dominion, there was no saying what the results might be. He saw that his political system, his influence, which already extended through the whole of Europe, and the very existence of all the old legitimist monarchies were endangered. He felt that every effort must be made to meet this peril, and summoned another conference of monarchs to consider the point. The conference met at Troppau in October, 1820, to discuss the principles to be applied if revolutionaries tried to impose changes in the form of government anywhere in Europe.

The congress was moved to Laibach, and Metternich arranged that the King of Naples should be asked to attend. Scarcely had the king crossed the frontiers of his revolutionary country before he forgot all the concessions he had granted to the people, and assured the envoy of the eastern powers that they had been wrung from him by force, and that he loathed constitution and Carbonarism. The congress decided in January, 1821, in spite of the objections made by England and France, to restore order in Ferdinand's kingdom by occupying Naples. Metternich had succeeded in a masterly manner in gaining over the tsar to his point of view.

"It is a matter of indifference," he stated to that monarch,[64] "whether the word be Bonaparte or the sovereignty of the people; they are equally dangerous and must therefore both be resisted. The Neapolitan revolt, and everything connected with it, must be completely stamped out, or else the powers themselves will be destroyed."

Metternich concentrated absolutely on his one great political object, the overthrow of revolution. The troops and money necessary for this purpose had to be forthcoming, and it was up to generals and financiers to see to the ways and means.

The news of Metternich's plans, involving as they did heavy additional expenditure, came as a severe shock to Stadion, who had done so much to put Austria's finances on a sound basis. He saw the edifice which he had spent rears to erect shaken to its foundations. The revolutions had also affected the bourses, and state securities were falling in price. Metternich, however, succeeded in being so convincing through his influence with the press, and the passionate communications sent by him from Laibach, that even those who had reason to be alarmed about their property became adherents of Metternich's plans of armed intervention in Naples. The chancellor had inquired of Stadion as to how the money could be found, and whether Naples would subscribe to a loan. Stadion sent the following confidential letter in reply:[65]

"Even our financiers, led by Rothschild and Parish, are anxious to see our troops across the Po at the earliest possible moment, and marching on Naples. I have written to Count von Mercy regarding the Neapolitan loan.

I suppose you have spoken only to Rothschild about it? I have never mentioned it to Parish, because I do not know how far Rothschild wants him to come into such a business (parceque je ne sais en combien Rothschild voudmis de lui dans une pareille affaire). In any case it is essential to lay our plans carefully so that the money does not merely come in at one door to go out of the other."

As Stadion considered the matter more closely, he began to feel distinctly uneasy. In normal circumstances the deficit for the year 1821 would have amounted to eight million gulden; but very heavy additional sums of money were now required for the expeditionary force to Italy, and the greater part of this cash would have to be found immediately. As Stadion came to consider the heavy demands made upon the treasury by Metternich's policy, he felt a growing sense of bitterness. Metternich, the chancellor whose financial ideas did not extend much beyond a general realization that a state no less than a private individual must have money, carried out his policy without any consideration of the cost. Stadion was expected to produce the necessary funds as if by magic, and he really was at a loss how to do it.

The chancellor advised Stadion to see the Rothschilds, and urged him to discuss with the brothers the means for raising the amount necessary for the campaign. The emigrant Jews from Frankfort had suddenly become the sheet-anchor for Austria's two leading statesmen, one of whom exercised an influence upon the destinies of Europe extending far beyond the boundaries of the imperial dominions.

While at Laibach, Metternich had asked Count Nesselrode, the Russian minister for foreign affairs, who was just about to leave for Vienna, to urge Stadion to ask Solomon Rothschild to come himself to Laibach and express his personal opinion there regarding the issue of loans to Russia and Austria. The chancellor also wrote a letter to Solomon Rothschild on January 29, 1821, making this suggestion, but Solomon was not prepared to leave Vienna at a time when the political situation was such that prices on the bourse were fluctuating violently from day to day. He therefore wrote the following letter to Count Nesselrode:[66]

YOUR EXCELLENCY:
With reference to the business matter under consideration, I venture most respectfully to observe that a discussion on this matter at Laibach, and my presence there, might give rise to numerous and probably highly inaccurate newspaper reports. Persons with base motives would unearth the fact that a loan to the most gracious of monarchs was being discussed; rumor would be piled upon rumor, and this would not be at all agreeable in the highest quarters. For this reason I submissively venture to suggest to your Excellency—and Finance Minister Count von Stadion agrees with my proposal—that the business be negotiated here with our finance minister. My continued presence here would dissipate all rumors, while everything would be carried on under the strictest seal of secrecy, and the business could be transacted in peace and quietness.

Solomon Rothschild sent a similar communication to Count Stadion at the same time, and the count immediately wrote[67] to Metternich to say that in his opinion Solomon's contention that neither he nor any other banker should'go to the congress at Laibach was absolutely sound. "In addition to the arguments which he has brought forward," he wrote, "I submit that the following points have to be taken into consideration. The loan in question (which ought to cover the costs of the expedition), can be only a Neapolitan loan, guaranteed for the greater security of the powers. It can be prepared under these conditions, but its formal conclusion must take place in Naples, after our troops have entered the city and occupied it. . . . Until that moment the public must know nothing whatever about it; for the loan would go very badly if we were only like the person in the fable offering the bear's skin, and it could be issued only on very unfavorable terms. It would immediately suggest that we were in lack of money, which fortunately is not yet the case; but the mere belief that we were would seriously damage not only our credit but our political position generally.

"Rothschild is here able to control his business and his correspondence from the center, and day by day, in collaboration with our finance department and his business friends, to decide upon the steps or transactions that seem to him appropriate to prevailing conditions. He cannot carry on his work effectively anywhere but here, while it is only here that we can examine the means that he adopts to carry out the wishes and intentions of the governments. These means must be brought into harmony with our general system of credit, since the loan is destined ultimately to find its way into the Austrian Treasury. . . .

"I feel myself compelled to observe that whatever view one takes of the situation Austria alone will have to bear the burdens of the military operations until Naples is occupied. When we get there it appears to me that the three following matters will have to be dealt with: first, our troops will have to be entirely maintained by that country; secondly, we shall have to obtain compensation for the costs otherwise incurred through their stay in the kingdom of Naples; and thirdly, we shall have to obtain an indemnity that will partially make good our advances.

"Rothschild believes that if the sum exceeds—the loan ought not to be too heavy—one million pounds, or about twenty-four million francs, cela se pourrait faire pour ainsi dire une bonne fortune a Londres. I have not yet gone far enough into the matter to be able to judge how far his hopes are well founded."

At the same time Solomon wrote the following letter to Metternich:

Your Highness was graciously pleased to send me your command of the 29th ultimo. Although it gives me great pleasure to show my zeal in fulfilling your Highness's wishes at all times, and happy though I always am to wait upon you, I feel it my duty to avoid doing anything which would attract attention. ... A journey to Laibach at this time would arouse such attention, and would give rise to all kinds of conjectures. . . .
Ever devoted to your Highness's commands I beg to remain in deepest respect Your Highness's Most Obedient Servant,
S. M. VON ROTHSCHILD.[68]

Stadion's letter had revealed the whole plan that was to be carried out: Naples was to pay everything, and Rothschild was to arrange loans at the expense of that country, the proceeds of which were to be applied for paying for Austria's unwanted intervention.
Meanwhile things had begun to move. The Austrian, General Frimont, crossed the Po on February 5, 1821, with 43,000 men, and began to march on Naples. Solomon Rothschild perceived with satisfaction that Austria's statesmen were dependent on him for finance, and saw the prospect of realizing substantial profits. He accordingly hastened to place sums at their disposal, with a view to securing the possible business at Naples entirely for himself.
Stadion wrote to Metternich:[69] "Rothschild and Parish"—who had apparently, against Rothschild's wishes, been informed of this affair by Gentz—"are provisionally offering to make me advances and to transfer sums direct to Naples apart from the loan. Rothschild is already concluding agreements in Paris and London for this purpose, or at any rate he says he is."

A week later Stadion wrote saying:[70] "For some days Rothschild has been effecting transfers of money to one or several banking firms (in Naples), and by the time we get there about three million francs will be available. These can be immediately placed at the disposal of our government. I only wish that I could always be informed of the requirements in good time so that I could make the necessary arrangements. Until the day before yesterday nobody asked for a single gulden of cash for the whole march of our troops from the Po to the Neapolitan frontier; and then a courier arrived demanding an urgent credit of 250,000 gulden at Florence. It seems to me that this should have been foreseen and provided for a long time ago. Fortunately, Rothschild has money and credit everywhere, and he was therefore able immediately to provide me with the advance I wanted, as well as an additional advance of 100,000 gulden. . . ."

Stadion was already relying largely upon the House of Rothschild, which rendered that statesman the most welcome services in his embarrassment, although certainly not without cherishing the hope that they would be duly rewarded. The finance minister had sent Metternich a detailed scheme regarding the contemplated Neapolitan loan.

"I am awaiting," he wrote to the chancellor, "your reply to my last memorandum regarding the Neapolitan loan, so that I may carry the matter further with my friend Solomon Rothschild. It is absolutely impossible for him to travel to Naples, and he is asking one of his brothers to come over from Frankfort and go on to Naples. This brother is expected by the end of the month. He has also written to Paris to say that a confidential servant of his firm—by name Salicey—who is thoroughly familiar with Naples, should proceed there without delay."[71]

Finally Stadion complained that he no less than the public had been kept completely in the dark for ten days regarding the progress of events and the present position of the troops.

Solomon had realized that it was absolutely essential that a member of his firm should go to Naples. It was not exactly pleasant to go there as there was a revolution in progress, and the Austrian troops would have some hard fighting; nevertheless Solomon summoned Carl, the only one of the five brothers who so far had no independent sphere of his own.

Carl had, since his youngest days, been accustomed to making long journeys on his father's business. Now at the age of thirty-three a promising field for his activities was offered him, although it was in a country that he had only once casually visited, and the language of which he did not know. This, however, did not affect the matter, for it seemed to be a merely provisional arrangement, and Carl little guessed that Naples would come to be his permanent place of abode. On March 1, Carl Rothschild arrived at Vienna from Frankfort and immediately called on Stadion.

"Un petit frere Rothschild," Stadion reported to Metternich,[72] "has just arrived here on his way to Naples. I am engaged in working out with the two brothers the most important conditions regarding the loan which they will issue. I hope to send young Rothschild to Laibach Wednesday, or at the latest next Thursday. You will there be able, my dear prince, to inform him whither he should then proceed. I hope that it will be to Naples, and that you will have occasion to send him as speedily as possible."

On March 6, Carl did in fact go to Laibach. Stadion was hoping that in the course of its advance the army would acquire a few millions for the Austrian Treasury, which was sadly in need of them. "I have to point out," he wrote, "that the declaration of war by Naples without a shot having been fired is sufficient ground for us to declare our right to indemnity from the date when our troops crossed the Po."[73]

Meanwhile the Austrian army was approaching the Abruzzi, which was the easiest territory between Austria and Naples for the enemy to defend. Its march was somewhat delayed through the insufficiency of provisions and of money. Count Ficquelmont, who was accompanying the army on his way to take up his duties as ambassador at Naples, wrote: "We are all suffering acutely from the disastrous shortage of money." Application was made at Rome to Torlonia and other banking firms, but in vain. A stirring appeal was made by Metternich with a view to remedying these evils. On receiving a report from Vienna, Metternich had published a statement regarding the whole expedition, in order to pacify the Viennese public, who did not understand what business Austria had in Naples. Count Sedlnitzky welcomed this step, wishing the chancellor luck in carrying on his policy on the grand scale, and reported:[74]

"Through an arrangement made in the nick of time by the thoroughly worthy House of Rothschild and other firms, regarding Wertheimer's failure, the market here has been saved from being flooded with Metalliques bonds, and a gradual rise in their value as well as in that of other state securities has been effected. This has had an excellent effect upon public opinion in the middle classes and in the business world."

The minister of police considered the critics and malcontents to be especially numerous among so-called men of learning, and even in several higher circles and in the army. "Nevertheless," he wrote, "we may count ourselves fortunate, if we compare public sentiment here with that in other countries."

Stadion, however, who was constantly receiving applications for money, was not equally satisfied. He viewed the future with dismay, and was utterly at a loss to see how he could provide the money for everything that was being done. He suddenly heard that a general had stated during the court ball that the emperor had recently commanded the pay of the Neapolitan Expeditionary Force to be increased, and a new recruiting law to be carried into effect which would add almost 100,000 men to the strength of the army.

"I was absolutely overwhelmed with surprise," he wrote in alarm to Metternich,[75] "by this news, and by the manner in which I learned it. If this is true, it will involve a permanent additional expenditure on our armies of more than ten millions. I have not got this money and I see no prospect of getting it. Things cannot go on like this. I feel that I have already reached the utmost limit of what is possible. . . .

"It is very easy to send out handbills, but in order to translate them into reality the emperor must find a man who can feed fifteen thousand men with five loaves. I cannot refrain from protesting against the way things are being done. His Majesty does not allow himself to spend even two hundred florins on his gardens; he does not sanction a pension to save a poor family from hunger without sometimes consulting me several times in the matter. And now we are to have an additional expenditure of ten million which it is difficult to justify. . . , So far from consulting me in fixing this sum, which is far beyond anything we can possibly raise, it was not even thought worth while to inform me of the decision.

"In such circumstances my position, which I have always regarded as the great misfortune of my life, has become quite impossible. For years I have been refused the means . . . of putting things straight, but at the same time I am regarded as an inexhaustible source of money., I am required to fill the glass at any moment it is put before me. Such a method of proceeding certainly puts an end to my responsibility in the matter. Even if, after all the other sacrifices I have made, I cast aside the last shreds of any respect that I may enjoy in the world, this will not bring additional revenue to the monarchy or save it from financial disaster.

"I write to you today, my dear prince, in the bitterness of my heart. It is difficult to remain calm under such conditions. Besides, I feel it to be my duty to state the unvarnished truth, when, as in the present instance, the truth is of such importance. Farewell, my dear prince, make such use of this letter as you think fit."

In some such mood as this, Stadion wrote two memoranda regarding the general financial position of the country, and sent them to Metternich. "The problem is," he submitted,[76] "how to save at least some part of our existence. I cannot possibly conceal from you any longer that I am weighed down and oppressed by a load of misfortune. I have reached the point when I fear that any day I may find that I am quite impotent and helpless to do any more work. I will carry on with the strength that remains to me, until I drop. But do not expect any great services from a man who is weakened as I am."

The finance minister's panic left Metternich unmoved. Clear before him lay the path that he had recognized as the right one, and had ruthlessly followed. He was determined not to deviate from it until he reached his goal.

"We have embarked upon a great undertaking, one that contains the possibilities of greater results than any of our times," he wrote to General Count von Bubna.[77] "It is great, for upon its success or failure the whole future depends; not merely the future of the Austrian monarchy but that of the whole of Europe. ... It was impossible for us to take any other action, for it is a matter of life or death. . . .

"Everything now depends upon success. I hope that one or two hard blows will decide the issue. If not, the result will be the same as if we had ventured nothing; the revolution will engulf, first Italy, and then the world.

I will spare no effort until I am killed myself. . . . Meanwhile, farewell. I shall not see you this year, but I shall certainly see you next year unless the world has been destroyed."

While Metternich was using proud words such as these, he was being besieged with the most urgent requests from the army to furnish money for its innumerable needs.

In the meantime Carl Rothschild had arrived at Laibach and had called on Gentz, who immediately informed his princely master of young Rothschild's arrival. Metternich asked Carl, through Gentz, whether he would be prepared to travel in his service, and whether he was able, without any loss of time, to make payments to the army. The chancellor also desired to know how moneys could be speedily and safely conveyed to Rome.

Carl replied as follows: "I have the honor to reply to your Princely Highness's gracious inquiry of today that I am prepared to undertake the journey at once to any place where your Princely Highness may bid me go, and to do everything in my power to see that the payments which you have graciously commissioned me to make to the army are carried out with the greatest possible speed and precision. If your Princely Highness will most graciously inform me what sums, and at whose disposition you wish them placed in Rome, I will then . . . send a special messenger to instruct Signor B. Paccard, a member of a firm who is in Milan, to transfer any sums required to Rome without delay, and if necessary to travel there himself. ... I have only to add, with all humble respect, that we will, on this occasion as always, use our endeavors to satisfy the wishes of his Majesty, which indeed is always our sole aim."[78]

Carl Meyer von Rothschild, who thus came into prominence, was personally the least gifted of the five brothers. He had little talent for adapting himself to his environment, had an awkward manner, and was over-strict in his observance of the religious practices of an orthodox Jew. His principal asset was a pretty and intelligent wife, who won everybody's affection and thereby made people forget many of her husband's errors. In spite of the distance which separated them, Carl remained, at any rate in really important transactions, under the control of his brothers James and Solomon.

Meanwhile the Austrian army had advanced almost without a battle. The encounter at Rieti was just a small skirmish and was described by Ambassador Count Ficquelmont as the most ridiculous thing he had ever seen. "Our advance is uninspiring," he reported,[79] "as we are completely unopposed, but our political victory is all the greater."

Everything therefore seemed to be proceeding satisfactorily, when a very bad piece of news was received. After his return King Victor Emmanuel had inaugurated a severely reactionary regime in Piedmont. For example he made the possession of a certain amount of property a necessary qualification for being allowed to learn to read and write; he had the botanical gardens at Turin destroyed, and wanted to destroy the marvelous bridge over the Po, simply because they were the works of Napoleon. He naturally opposed all nationalistic movements among young people. The risings in Spain and Naples were accordingly joyfully welcomed in Piedmont.

When the Austrian troops started for the South, a rising broke out in Alessandria too, the object of which was to secure a constitution, and the abdication of the autocratic king. The news of these events caused dismay at Laibach. The assembled diplomats were like a swarm of bees that has been disturbed. Gentz reported:[80] "This unexpected news is a very hard blow to me and to all of us. I remained with the prince until half-past four in a kind of stupor, and then I tried to eat something.

Rothschild came to me in a state of great emotion; I had enough sang-froid to be able to calm him."

Carl Rothschild was just about to start for Italy in accordance with Metternich's wishes, and these events caused him the most serious alarm. The impression made at Vienna was no less profound. Stadion completely lost his nerve. "The situation is terrifying," he wrote to Metternich.[81] "Never, not even in the darkest hours of the revolutionary wars, has an event produced such an effect on the Vienna bourse as the latest news from Italy. ... If the enemy were at the gates there could not be more unreasoning panic. The whole of the population of Vienna is rushing to the bourse to get rid of our public securities. . . . Our credit (which has only just been established) is on the eve of vanishing completely. I shall be forced to suspend the conversion of paper money into cash or banknotes on demand. To do so would be exceedingly painful to me, for it would mean destroying in one day the labors of the five preceding years. . . .

"This is the first step to our destruction. It is impossible that a loan should be considered either at home or abroad at a time when our securities are becoming worthless. . . . Judging from the way things are going we shall have to give up all hope of getting any financial assistance from Naples. . . . There is so much popular unrest of a very marked character that each day may bring a fresh catastrophe and make further desperate measures necessary."

During this period Stadion repeatedly called in Solomon to examine the situation with him and ask his advice. If, however, he hoped for comfort from him, he was doomed to some disappointment. Solomon too had suffered from the sudden fall in the value of securities, and could not himself help being somewhat affected by the general panic. It was not until he received reassuring news from his three brothers in the West of Europe, that he was able to take a less gloomy view of the situation.

The panic reached its height on March 22. On that day Stadion wrote again to Metternich, describing the complications in Naples and Piedmont as amounting to the destruction of Austria.[82] He wrote: "If all the misfortunes that appear imminent today come upon us at once, I must confess I see no hope of salvation. Nevertheless we must try to put an end to the Naples adventure as speedily as possible, and thus at least save the army's honor. All troops should be withdrawn to within our frontiers and kept in readiness to meet attacks from abroad and from the revolutionary spirit at home."

Metternich said nothing, but proceeded to set troops in motion for quelling the revolt. It was Stadion's business and not his to raise the necessary money. The former had already spent money which was earmarked for the year 1822, and his pronounced sense of responsibility caused him to take a darker view of recent events than was strictly justified. Metternich, however, infected his imperial master, who was staying with him at Laibach, with his own spirit of resolute calm, and the emperor wrote a reassuring letter to the King of Naples. The king had just left Laibach, having borrowed the money for the journey to Florence from the Emperor Francis, as he had no funds himself. While assuring the king that his interests were identical with his own, the emperor did not forget about the repayment of the journey money, and issued instructions that the cash should immediately be provided out of the Rothschild loan which was being planned in Naples.[83]

On March 24 the expeditionary force had entered Naples without encountering serious resistance. The news of this event put an end to the rising in Piedmont; Lombardy remained quiet; and the general information received at Laibach gave reason to hope that the whole movement would die down. In a short time Metternich was able to feel that he had reestablished his system in both countries. It was now possible completely to reassure Carl, and to persuade him that the journey to Florence, where the King of Naples was still staying with his retinue, was absolutely safe. Before he started on the further journey to the capital at the foot of Vesuvius, the Austrian troops there would have reestablished complete order and security.

It was on March 23 that Gentz had made these reassuring observations to Carl Rothschild, using the opportunity to ask for a small personal loan. Carl, who was not so quick at appreciating Gentz's influence as his brothers had been, made difficulties, with the result that, to use his own words, "an unpleasant discussion" ensued.

When he got back home Rothschild learned that Metternich wished him to leave for Florence on the following day. He felt some misgivings regarding the disobliging attitude he had adopted toward the right-hand man of the all-powerful chancellor; and he thought that his brother Solomon would be annoyed with him if he had parted from Gentz in ill-will. He accordingly called on Gentz late that evening in order, as the latter put it, "to make good his error."

Metternich had given Carl Rothschild a letter of introduction to the Austrian general, Baron Vincent, who was staying at Florence with the King of Naples. The general had long known of the Austrian government's financial intentions regarding a loan to be issued in Naples. He knew that the Allies had agreed with the king at Laibach that the costs of the expedition should be borne by the kingdom of Naples from the moment when the army crossed the Po, and that the cost of maintaining the army in Naples should also be borne by that kingdom. Metternich had sent Vincent the following instructions on the matter as early as March 1, 1821:

"The point regarding the loan is of great importance for our finances. We wish to facilitate the work of the Neapolitan government so that they will be able to provide for the first needs of our army and fulfil some of their obligations to us. Count Stadion has already entered into negotiations on this matter with the House of Rothschild. ... It is desirable in our financial interests that this house should be given the preference, and the king also is prepared to proceed on these lines. The firm has the necessary means at its disposal, and I therefore believe that it will be possible speedily to come to terms with it. . . .

"It would be redundant to point out to your Excellency that the fact that Count Stadion was compelled to make enormous advances to the Neapolitan Expeditionary Force has made him exceedingly anxious to insure that these moneys shall be gradually repaid. He is the more concerned about this since, if the monarchy were to incur such a heavy loss, the resulting financial embarrassment might produce results which nobody can foresee."[84]

Shortly before Carl Rothschild's departure Metternich followed up these instructions with a letter[85] stating that Rothschild was coming only in order to negotiate for the Neapolitan loan. Although this firm had not yet put forward definite terms, Metternich wrote, it was desirable that the Neapolitan government should hand over to the House of Rothschild bonds coming within the scheme of their general system of credit at a fixed price, and leave it to the firm to reimburse itself by issuing these bonds at its own risk at a price which would yield it a profit.

Should the House of Rothschild demand a guarantee from Austria for the due carrying out of the obligations of the Neapolitan government, Vincent was authorized to accept such a condition if it was necessary. He was urged, however, to ask Rothschild to put his proposals into writing, and to press for a speedy conclusion of the agreement. This was urgent in the interests of Austria's finances. In general he should show courtesy to Carl Rothschild and introduce him to the Neapolitan minister, Prince Ruffo, so that Rothschild could deal direct with him. Metternich concluded by saying:

"We must naturally take no direct part in these business negotiations, but we are very much interested in their success. The loan is destined to cover a part of the costs of the expedition, as well as to meet the expenses of maintaining and paying our army. You are invited, therefore, if Herr von Rothschild's first proposals are accepted by the Neapolitan minister, to facilitate the conclusion of their business through your good offices."

Carl Rothschild arrived in Florence on March 31.

On Vincent's introduction he had a short interview with Prince Ruffo,[86] but he was coolly received and was not given any explanation as to the minister's intentions. He had to wait for news from James, who had been requested by Solomon to express his views regarding the Neapolitan business. Vincent advised Rothschild to go to Naples and inform himself as to the prospect on the spot, for Ruffo had been absent so long that he was completely uninformed as to the financial situation. The Ambassador took the opportunity of borrowing 1,000 ducats[87] on the government's account, the advance for his official expenses having long been exhausted. Rothschild gladly lent the desired amount.

Although the agreements were kept secret, and nobody knew that that firm had been granted absolute priority, the news of a loan to be issued by Naples became known in other banking circles. A Milanese, by name Barbaia, approached Vincent, and in agreement with certain French firms offered[88] to advance thirty millions to the Neapolitan government at an issue price of 60%. "My fear is," Vincent replied, "that this may conflict with our arragements with the House of Rothschild and confuse them." Barbaia was not a negligible rival. He was already known to the King of Naples, and was received by him in Florence on this occasion too. Vincent as speedily as possible gave Carl Rothschild precise information regarding the offer.[89] "You will," he remarked, "be in a better position than anyone else to say what value should be attached to this offer."

This problem itself naturally did not engage Carl's very close attention, but it was valuable to him to be informed of his rivals' plans as speedily and accurately as possible, in order to be able to take appropriate counter-measures.

On April 6 he proceeded to Naples. Vincent gave him a letter to Ambassador Count Ficquelmont, informing the count of the offer being made by Barbaia, and of Austria's anxiety that the loan should be intrusted to the firm of Rothschild. The king himself did not yet dare to return to Naples. In accordance with Metternich's instructions the general commanding at Naples meanwhile restrained the newly installed government from considering loans proposed by various Italian banking firms before Rothschild should have arrived. When he arrived on April 12, Count Ficquelmont immediately introduced him to the government, who informed him that they wished to take up a loan of twelve million ducats—about twenty million gulden.

Under pressure from the Austrian general the government had ignored Barbaia's offers, although the Milanese had brought a letter from the King of Naples recommending him. The king had instinctively felt that the House of Rothschild would act in Austria's interests rather than his own; but he was king only by the grace of Austria, and that country could call the tune.

The House of Rothschild stated that they were prepared to grant a loan of ten million ducats.[90] They added that they would at first make only six millions available, the balance to be paid when they had placed the six million. The bonds were to be issued at 54; 3% commission was to be paid; and an undertaking was to be given that during the continuance of the agreement no new loan should be issued. Moreover, in any future loans the firm was to be given the preference before any other. For sinking-fund purposes and for greater security they demanded that the state domains should be pledged.

These were hard conditions. Public securities then stood at 60%, so that the issue price was very low, and all the more favorable to the Rothschilds, as they intended to issue the state bonds (which had hitherto been dealt with only on the Naples bourse) and, through their London and Paris houses, to put them on the market in those cities. The Neapolitan finance minister, Marchese d'Andrea, considered the proposals to be far less advantageous than those of certain Neapolitan firms, and therefore entirely unacceptable. The minister was of opinion that instead of helping the state the conditions would be a serious blow to its credit, since it was impossible to place any confidence in a government that sold its securities at such a low rate. He held that there was no reason for selling bonds at 54 when the ruling price was 60. The government was not so pressed for money as those appeared to believe who put such proposals forward.[91]

Meanwhile, news had been received that the revolution at Naples had collapsed.

Ficquelmont summoned Carl Rothschild and told him that Austria was desirous that the House of Rothschild should handle the loan. The ambassador requested him not to make it too difficult for Austria to bring the necessary pressure to bear upon the Neapolitan government, but to moderate his terms somewhat.

Rothschild replied that his first proposals were not his last word in the matter; he had been asked to make an offer, and he had done so by way of opening negotiations. The good news received from Piedmont made it possible for him now to offer better conditions. The ambassador also asked Rothschild to avoid, if possible, saying anything about a guarantee by the powers. Carl promised to do what he could, and Ficquelmont assured him of his full and very powerful support with the Neapolitan government. That government owed its very existence to the Austrians, and it was obvious that it would have. to conclude the agreement with those whom the Austrians wished.

The ambassador at Naples had completely understood what was in the minds of the leading men at Vienna. "If the House of Rothschild carries through a loan of any kind," he wrote to Metternich,[92] "that fact will provide us with the necessary security. As we have not yet made any direct or positive demand for reimbursement of our expenses, I did not feel that it was possible to include in the terms of the loan any explicit condition regarding direct payments to Austria [by the House of Rothschild]. Herr Rothschild, who always keeps our interests in view in the negotiations, has therefore inserted the words in his draft terms, 'payable to those who shall be authorized to receive the money.' This condition will become applicable when our direct negotiations have settled the amount to be paid to us."

The ambassador was anxious that the Neapolitan finances should be spared as much as possible so that there should not be any doubt as to Naples' ability to pay the expenses of Austria's expeditionary force. "If the current expenses for the maintenance of our army," Ficquelmont wrote to Metternich, "can be met out of the ordinary revenue of the state, the whole amount of the loan could be paid into our treasury, except perhaps the first two or three instalments, which the government will require ... in order to put the taxing system in order."

Shortly afterwards the loan was issued, 16,000,000 ducats being taken up at 60 ducats for the 100 ducat bond. Rothschild allowed other Italian banking firms to take some small part in it in order to keep active opposition down. The government pledged itself not to issue any further loan before 1824, and if it required to issue further loans, to give the House of Rothschild the preference.

Carl joyfully reported the conclusion of the business to Metternich.[93] He emphasized that in accordance with Metternich's wishes he had made no mention of a guarantee by the powers, writing: "Moreover, I hope that, if peace only lasts for a little while, the loan will soon be fully subscribed, and it will not be necessary to ask for guarantees for the balance, as in that case all state securities will rise in value, and the Neapolitan securities will follow suit . . ."

The plan had succeeded, and Austria had thereby put the House of Rothschild in the saddle at Naples. This was not done from motives of disinterested friendship, and the brothers Rothschild paid for the privilege—with Neapolitan money. Meanwhile the forces of reaction were playing havoc at Naples. People were arrested in thousands, the death penalty and long terms of imprisonment were meted out to the Carbonari and the revolutionary officers. A strict censorship was also instituted. These conditions continued after the return of the king, and as all these things were being done under the protection of Austrian bayonets, the foreign troops did not gain any sympathy in the country. All classes, excepting the conservative upper class, regarded them as undesirable guests; and resentment against the Austrians was heightened by the fact that they were using a clever foreigner to force the country itself to pay for their occupation.

About this time death came to the man in whose service the Rothschild family had grown great. On February 27, 1821, the Elector of Hesse had a heart attack. With the words,[94] "I shall lose this battle," he expired. His death had nothing like the importance to the Rothschild family that it would have had about ten years earlier, when their transactions with the elector constituted almost their only, and certainly their most important, business.

The new elector spent a great deal of money, but he had not the commercial ability of his father, and the relationship with the Rothschilds was limited to casual transactions of minor importance. Amschel at Frankfort carried on the business of making loans on an extensive scale to princes and other important personages whom he desired to cultivate. James and Nathan put the Neapolitan securities on the market in London and Paris, making the interest due in London payable in British currency, a fact which induced many people to invest their money in these securities, carrying as they did a high rate of interest. The result was that soon after their issue they rose considerably in price.

Nathan was clever at securing people's support, and at getting publicity for himself. A young clerk from the commercial department of the treasury at Vienna, by name Anton Laurin, had been sent to study in England for some months during the summer of 1820, and was naturally referred to the Austrian consul in London, Nathan Rothschild. Nathan showed a great deal of kindness to Laurin, as he naturally assumed that he would send a report home. He acted as his mentor, and invited him frequently to dinner and supper.

He was so successful in securing the young man's affection that Laurin gave the most ecstatic not to say extravagant and almost tedious accounts of him when he returned home. He sent in such an enthusiastic report to his chief that the latter decided to convey the essential points in it to the emperor, with the request that Nathan should be specially commended.

After recounting how Nathan had helped Laurin, the president of the commercial department of the treasury proceeded to state in his memorandum to the sovereign: "Laurin at the same time reports as to the disinterested work done by this consul, and as to his efforts to be of effective assistance to Austria's credit, industry, and commerce. He states that Rothschild waives all consular fees, actively assists Austrian subjects . . . has secured a quotation for Austrian state securities on the London stock exchange, helps Austrian sailors generously . . . from his private resources. Nathan is prepared with his own ships to establish a direct service between London and Trieste; he has sent a collection of seeds of rare foreign plants for your Majesty's gardens, as well as several articles of interest in industry and the arts for the Polytechnic Institute without asking for any payment; he is still collecting models and various objects of this kind with a view to bequeathing them to that institute.

"It is not for me to express an opinion as to the value of the services rendered to the credit of the Austrian state by Consul Rothschild; in this connection I can but humbly lay before your Majesty the London stock-exchange report for the 6th ultimo, which he has sent me. In this your Majesty may be graciously pleased to observe that Austrian state debentures are specially mentioned, together with their price, under the designation Austrian Loan. The other efforts referred to above by Consul Rothschild for facilitating and extending Austrian trade, the industrious and disinterested manner in which he carries out the duties of the consulate, so graciously intrusted to him by your Majesty, his generous help to unemployed Austrian sailors, and his efforts to enrich your Majesty's gardens and the Polytechnic Institute deserve proper recognition.

"Through establishing a direct monetary exchange on London, Rothschild has indisputably greatly facilitated commercial and financial transactions. If he succeeds, as he undoubtedly will, in view of the disinterested patriotism of his aims and methods, in establishing direct communication between London and Trieste, the beneficial results to our commerce will be even more marked. Through carrying out this one conception he will earn the well-deserved gratitude of a considerable portion of the Austrian trading community and consuming public...

"I hope that your Majesty may graciously realize from a perusal of these few lines what an important and beneficial influence upon the trade and industry of the monarchy the nomination of this man as Austrian consul is having. . . . Our former consuls in this country, which is so uniquely adapted to trade and industry, did . . . absolutely nothing for the monarchy, confining their activities to collecting substantial fees from our subjects. . . , The newly appointed consul, Rothschild, has in a very short time done more than all his predecessors put together. I therefore feel it to be my duty to hiring his meritorious activities to your Majesty's knowledge, and at the same time most dutifully to beg that your Majesty's satisfaction may accordingly be conveyed to him." [95]

In his memorandum to the emperor of March 6, 1821,[96] Count Stadion confirmed the statements of Ritter von Stahl, adding that the Rothschilds also deserved praise for the greater facility with which, under the existing critical conditions, the financial requirements of the army in Italy could be met.

These two documents were also sent to Count Zichy for his observations, who passed them to Privy Councilor Baron von Lederer, who gave his opinion in the same skeptical vein he had used when the ennoblement of the family was under consideration.

"The alleged special services of Nathan Meyer Rothschild," he wrote,[97] "are connected partly with his activities as Austrian consul in London, and partly with his relation to the finance departments. If it is due to Rothschild that Austrian government securities are quoted in London stock-exchange reports, and if the transfer of money to Italy has been facilitated through the good offices of the House of Rothschild it must be remembered that the interests of the brothers Rothschild are identical with those of the finance departments.

"The brothers Rothschild are at the head of the business which concluded the last two loans with the Austrian financial administration, so that they are clearly interested in obtaining a market for Austrian securities abroad, and particularly in London. When banking firms undertake to remit money they are rewarded by a commission set aside for the purpose, and are able to profit by differences in the rate of exchange. I would therefore attach more importance to Nathan Meyer Rothschild's disinterested manner of carrying out his duties as Austrian consul, and would venture immediately to concur in the proposal that he should be acquainted of his Majesty's satisfaction, if I did not feel that the occasion for doing so is somewhat unsuitable.

"A clerk of the commercial department of the treasury, by name Laurin, obtains leave to travel to England. He is given a letter of introduction to Nathan Meyer Rothschild, who receives him in a friendly manner, and supports him in his endeavors to extend his knowledge in the fields of industry and commerce. He returns full of praise of the way he has been received, and takes the opportunity of commenting in high terms on Nathan Meyer Rothschild's disinterested and zealous conduct as consul.

"I am far from wishing to cast any doubt upon the facts that he brings forward, but as he made the journey purely as a private person, and not on any official mission, it was not his business to put these facts forward through official channels, and to take the responsibility for their accuracy. In my humble opinion the statement he volunteered should merely have led to an inquiry on the matter being made through the Austrian Embassy; and it seems to me that this omission can still be rectified."

The emperor, who was not yet fully aware how deeply leading statesmen had committed themselves to the House of Rothschild, did indeed command that further information should be asked for regarding Laurin's statements that Rothschild carried out his duties in such a disinterested manner. Ritter von Stahl, however, stuck to his guns, and was particularly emphatic in pressing the interests of the House of Rothschild. As he knew that James in Paris desired the dignity of an Austrian consul-general, for the same reasons as his brother in London, he suggested, on March 30, that James should be appointed.

The highest quarters did not give any immediate decision in this matter, but the Neapolitan revolution occurred shortly afterwards, involving the close cooperation between Metternich and the House of Rothschild. It was no longer thought either desirable or possible to refuse the brothers anything, as it depended upon their attitude whether or not Austria should recover the money spent on the expeditionary force. Solomon gave his brother James at Paris to understand that he should renew his application to be appointed consul-general, for now was the critical moment, as the Austrian government was more or less in a cleft stick. As it was under an obligation to the House and closely associated with it, it could not turn the request down.

James asked Solomon, as he stood so well in Vienna, to put forward the request himself. Solomon drafted a petition to the emperor, and handed it to Stadion, who, in consideration of the indispensability of Solomon and his family, conveyed it to the emperor with the following memorandum:[98]

"I venture to support this petition, which your Majesty was previously not pleased to entertain, for the following reasons, which relate particularly to present circumstances, and to conditions obtaining during the last few years. Your Majesty is fully aware of the highly important services which the House of Rothschild or, more accurately, the various Rothschild firms established in the principal capitals of Europe have rendered in the complicated difficulties of the present time.

"To the energy and resources of the Rothschilds, to their tireless efforts to apply large sums of money at points where they were immediately required to stem the tide of events, I owe the fact that I have been able continuously, in all places, and at the right moment, to provide what was necessary for military operations, without interfering with our internal services or the measures to restore our credit. In the precarious state of Austria's finances resulting from recent events, it was only thus that popular feeling and the government's credit could be maintained at the point where they now stand. Through the Rothschilds' clever management, the cost of the extensive monetary movements during the military operations was low compared with any other method of remitting money.

"Through the great services which the Rothschild firms have rendered to us during a most eventful period, their existence has become most intimately bound up with that of the Austrian monarchy. They have incurred the envy and hatred, and to a certain extent the persecution of the whole Liberal party in Europe; and although the extent of their wealth, their firmly established reputation throughout Europe, and their constant rectitude in business matters have so far protected them from the consequences of malicious intrigues, it is really essential that their services should be recognized by our court and that they should enjoy the explicit protection of your Majesty in the principal markets of the world, in order that they may have the necessary strength to resist all these machinations and to continue as useful to the monarchy in the future as they have been in the past.

"This is particularly the case in Paris as being the headquarters of all Liberal activities in Europe, and the city in whose bourse the loans of all states are handled, with no inconsiderable effect upon their value.

"The president of the commercial department of the treasury has laid before your Majesty proofs of what has been done to promote our trade by the Rothschild who has been appointed consul-general in London. Even more successful have been his efforts to develop a market for the sale of our securities in England and to establish arrangements for directly discounting bills of exchange between Great Britain and the Austrian markets.

"Paris is as indifferent as London to religious distinctions, and the appointment of one of the brothers Rothschild as Austrian consul-general in Paris should be of real service to the commercial and financial interests of the monarchy. Moreover, Rothschild waives the right to any emoluments connected with such an appointment, which he desires only for the distinction attaching to the office as being likely to afford him some protection against the hatred and persecution of the Liberal party in that city."

There was much truth in Stadion's report. The Rothschilds had in fact made themselves unpopular with the more Liberal section of the public abroad, through the contracts which they had made everywhere with the re-established reactionary governments. Stadion was not aware that in spite of their particularly conservative sentiment, especially in Austria, they cultivated relations with the other parties as well, lent money here and there, and thus secured themselves against a political reaction such as was always possible.

The envy of other firms was increasing to a prodigious extent as the power of their house grew. In Paris their position was particularly delicate. For the Bourbon kingdom, with the weak Louis XVIII and the Ultras, who were all the more powerful, was far from popular, and the strictly royalist minister, Villele, who was at the head of the government, was hated by a large part of the population. The brothers Rothschild, however, had necessarily become intimately connected with the new regime and, moreover, as the bankers of the Holy Alliance, they were sending French gold abroad in large amounts.

James Rothschild was often the target of veiled attacks, and once he felt actually constrained to call upon the prefect of police to lodge a complaint regarding the large number of threatening anonymous letters which he was receiving." Through being appointed consul-general he hoped not merely to raise his social prestige, but also to achieve greater security under international law. It is true it was not realized at the court either of Paris or of Vienna that James Rothschild was in close association with the liberal-minded Duke Louis Philippe of Orleans (afterwards King of France). James frequently advised him in money matters, and was very often a guest in his house.

Emperor Francis referred James Rothschild's application to be appointed consul-general to the commercial department of the treasury, with the instruction that they should let him have their observations upon it. Ritter von Stahl did not need to be asked twice to do this. He immediately transmitted the application to Stadion with the following observations: [100]

"England and France are by far the most cultivated states in Europe; in them agriculture, industry, and commerce flourish in the greatest harmony, and it is therefore most important for us to have in their capitals commercial agents who are experienced men, and enjoy an extensive credit. ... As far as commercial and industrial matters are concerned, I cannot suggest a more suitable person for his Majesty than the head of the Paris House, James von Rothschild.

"I made his personal acquaintance during his last stay here; he is a young man of parts, who is intimately acquainted with several members of the Polytechnical Institute in Paris, and of the Conservatoire des Arts et Metiers, as well as with many of the most cultured French manufacturers and business men. Moreover, he expressed to me his readiness, as his brother in London had done, to cooperate in every possible way in promoting our industry and commerce. For this purpose he immediately ordered some interesting machines, which he is giving to our Polytechnic Institute, assuring me that he did not wish in any way to lag behind his brother in London in proof of his devotion to the House of Austria.

"Finally, the consideration that James Rothschild is a Jew seems, in my humble opinion, to constitute no greater difficulty than in the case of his brother in London. It is true that in the decision regarding the appointment of the London Rothschild as consul, which decision is attached to the application, your Majesty expressly laid down that it would have to continue to be the rule that no Israelite should be appointed consul. Yet if the exception made by your Majesty in favor of the London Rothschild has proved in the highest degree beneficial, it is likely to be no less so in the case of the Paris Rothschild.

"In Paris, too, the consuls . . . have no specially representative character . . . and as, under the French constitution, the Israelites enjoy the same rights of citizenship as all other French subjects in France, I am of opinion that your Majesty may graciously permit an exception to the rule to be made in the case of James von Rothschild such as you have graciously permitted to be made in regard to the London Rothschild.

"While the commercial and industrial reasons for acceding to James von Rothschild's request are weighty, the financial considerations are still more important. This point it is not necessary for me to labor; your Excellency is fully aware that since the recent crucial events in Italy the combined Rothschild houses have rendered far greater services than they had rendered even at the time when his Majesty, with your Excellency's approval, was graciously pleased to appoint the London Rothschild to the office of consul. It is certainly a factor of no small importance in the success of such vital operations to have the support of all these wealthy firms."

In conclusion, Ritter von Stahl strongly urged that Metternich should be asked to express an opinion as to whether there was any objection to the proposal from a political point of view, so that a further report to his Majesty might be made as speedily as possible.

Metternich duly wrote to Herr von Stahl:[101] "As all considerations of a commercial, industrial, and financial nature make it desirable to grant this application, I have to add only that from a political point of view there is no reason why Solomon von Rothschild's wish should not be granted."

On August 11, 1821, James von Rothschild was duly appointed consul-general in Paris. Thus another of the five brothers had climbed a rung in the ladder of social position.

Immediate payment for his Majesty's favor was required. Since the Austrian army had entered Naples, the Neapolitan government had met all its expenses, including pay; but ten days after so whole-heartedly supporting the petition, Metternich instructed Count Ficquelmont in Naples to get from that government the money that had been expended from the moment when the army crossed the Po. The finance minister had already pressed impatiently to be indemnified for these expenses.[102] The advances already made were estimated at 4,650,000 gulden, and the money was to be repaid in Vienna in six monthly instalments, commencing on August 1, 1821.[103] Metternich sent a private letter to the count, together with these instructions.[104]

"The ministry of finance," wrote the chancellor, "attaches very great importance to the punctual and reliable repayment of the moneys which you are hereby instructed to demand from the Neapolitan government, and it will not tolerate any further excuses for delay. With this end in view, it has concluded an agreement with the House of Rothschild under which . . . Herr Rothschild in Naples has been authorized to make an arrangement with the government in order to facilitate these payments. ... I have the honor to request you to get into communication with Herr Rothschild on this matter, and to support such proposals as he may consider it desirable to submit to the Neapolitan government. The object of these proposals; will be to make it easier for the government to effect a payment that might cause it some embarrassment without the assistance of this banking firm, and at the same time to facilitate the punctual receipt of a considerable sum of money by our treasury, in the payment of which no further delay can be suffered, as it constitutes a part of our annual budget."

Although he did not succeed in arranging for the Neapolitan government to repay the whole of this amount, Count Ficquelmont managed to obtain compensation to the extent of 4,000,000 gulden, 500,000 to be payable on August 31, 700,000 in each of the following three months, and 1,400,000 in January, 1822.[105] The first amount was paid to Carl Rothschild and transmitted by him through his brother Solomon to the Austrian government. It had been possible to make this payment out of existing funds, but further payments were to be met out of the loan of the House of Rothschild.[106] Thus part of the money subscribed for the loan never reached the Neapolitan Treasury at all, but was made over to Austria direct by the House of Rothschild, although Naples bore the whole burden of the loan.

The government of that kingdom at this time made the request of Carl Rothschild that in consideration of certain additional advantages he would, if possible, make his loan payments to them earlier than was provided for under the agreement. Rothschild agreed, on condition that he was allowed to deduct the first two instalments of 700,000 gulden, and transmit them direct to Austria. Carl reported the conclusion of this agreement to Count Ficquelmont, stating:

"I am accordingly glad to be in a position ... to give your Excellency the assurance that the first two payments are secured, and that I shall be making payments to your Excellency, instead of my brother making them in Vienna.

Your Excellency will no doubt realize that this was the principal reason which led me to fall in with the suggestion—at some sacrifice to myself. For I was thus able to satisfy your Excellency's wish that the payments in question should be secured to the I. and R. Treasury, and at the same time furnish further proof that I am always prepared to make every effort in the interest of his Majesty's service. As for the balance of 1,400,000 gulden (out of the total of 4,000,000 gulden) due in January, I shall try to deal with this sum in a new loan which the royal government of Naples intends to issue shortly. . . ," Carl Rothschild had thus endeavored to meet the convenience of all parties. He made it easier for the Austrians to recover their expenses, and he paid the instalment on the loan to the Neapolitans before the agreed dates. He himself did not do badly, for in June, 1821, the bonds he had underwritten at 60, already stood at 76 1/2! The court of Naples had been in such urgent need of the advance payments on account of the loan that when Carl agreed to make them, he received a special letter from the finance minister.[107]

"His Majesty," the letter ran, "has instructed me to communicate to you in his royal name, his full and gracious satisfaction with the consideration you have shown in the matters affecting the treasury."

The king's debts to the emperor were also settled through the House of Rothschild by making a deduction from the loan. The balance, so far as it was not used in the maintenance of the Austrian army, was not spent either carefully or usefully. In spite of all the loans, therefore, the country continued to be oppressed by financial stringency; and the Neapolitan ministers were constantly complaining of the annual charges (amounting to nine million ducats) for maintaining the Austrian army, which made any reasoned finance impossible. But Austria insisted upon its pound of flesh, and Stadion's attitude was positively petty when Carl Rothschild transmitted the moneys to Austria in bills due in three months. The finance minister demanded immediate payment in cash, as Naples was required to pay the money free of all charges in Vienna. Carl took the stand that without his intervention and willingness, the Neapolitan government would have been absolutely unable to carry out the obligation it had incurred to the Austrian court to pay four million gulden, so that he had felt himself justified in adopting this method of remitting the money.[108] Henceforward, however, he paid in cash, and simply debited the expense of remitting the money and the loss on exchange to the Neapolitan treasury.

In such circumstances the first loan was naturally soon exhausted, and the Neapolitan finance minister found it necessary to apply to Carl Rothschild for a second loan. After lengthy negotiations a loan of the nominal amount of 16,800,000 ducats was arranged at the end of November, 1821, which in view of a wider market and the resulting improvement in price was underwritten at 67.3 in spite of the fact that the state's indebtedness had increased.

When the amount of 1,400,000 gulden fell due on the last day of January, 1822, the finance minister himself asked Rothschild to make the payment out of the loan,[109] as Naples was not able to find the money; for the support of the Austrian troops was a constant heavy burden on the treasury. Stadion's financial program with regard to Naples was carried through quite ruthlessly; and Metternich was able to point out to the finance minister that thanks to the Rothschild intervention, which he had advised, the undertaking that Stadion had so much dreaded had been completely financed by Naples.

Metternich fully appreciated the services rendered by the House of Rothschild, and was prepared at Solomon's urgent request to devote greater energy henceforward to securing the emanicipation of the Jews. Slowly but surely, the rich Jewish bankers, who had been brought into touch by the Rothschilds with the delegates to the diet at Frankfort, improved their social position. Severely though they had been shunned before, the change became apparent during the first months of 1820. The Rothschilds and other representatives of the commercial world gave big dinners, and the bearers of the most noble names, as well as persons in every kind of high office, were seen at their tables. In this way they often acquired items of news that they could turn to account in business.

"Since arriving here," the Bremen burgomaster Smidt wrote from Frankfort,[110] "I have found to my great astonishment that people like the Bethmanns, Gontards, Brentanos eat and drink with prominent Jews, invite them to their houses and are invited back. When I expressed my surprise I was told that no financial transaction of any importance could be carried through without the cooperation of these people, they had to be treated as friends and it was not desirable to fall out with them. Having regard to these facts the Rothschilds have been invited by some of the ambassadors."

During this period Amschel Meyer Rothschild's wife was invited to a ball at the Prussian Legation in Frankfort. Smidt specifically recorded his opinion regarding the Rothschild family in a report of a conversation with the delegate to the diet, Count Buol.[111]

"This house," he observed, "has through its enormous financial transactions and its banking and credit connections, actually achieved the position of a real power. It has to such an extent acquired control of the general money-market that it is in a position either to hinder or to promote, as it feels inclined, the movements and operations of potentates, and even of the greatest European powers. Austria needs the Rothschilds' help for her present demonstration against Naples; and Prussia would long ago have had to discard her constitution if the House of Rothchild had not made it possible for her to put off the evil day. Several medium and small states have also had recourse to its financial power in their difficulties. This puts it in a strong position to ask for favors, especially for a favor of such an apparently trivial nature as the protection of a few dozen Jews in a small state."

At the end of May, 1820, Metternich sent a dispatch to the reluctant Buol instructing him to support most of the Jews' wishes in the diet. Buol, however, was inclined to follow out his own predilections, so that there was no immediate change in the situation; indeed the senate showed a tendency to revert to increased harshness in dealing with the Jews. Thereupon Metternich firmly admonished Buol to put an end to this state of affairs, with the result that the diet sent a kind of ultimatum to the senate.

The chancellor went even further; he traveled to Frankfort himself, and decided publicly to honor the Rothschilds there by accepting an invitation to dine with them. He had let Amschel Meyer know this through Solomon at Vienna, who had just come into prominence again through an action which had won sympathetic recognition in high quarters. The I. and R. Court Theatre at the Karntner Tor was again without a lessee, and the only applicant, Dominik Barbaia, was unable to find the deposit of fifty thousand gulden in cash required under the terms of the lease. The House of Rothschild stated that they were prepared to guarantee and pay this amount to the I. and R. Treasury, whereby, as the document of guarantee stated, "the further continuance of an entertainment worthy of the dignity of the imperial court and the capital city" was assured until the year 1824.[112]

On his arrival at Frankfort, Metternich received the following letter from Amschel Meyer Rothschild:[113]

MOST EXCELLENT PRINCE ! MOST GRACIOUS PRINCE AND LORD !

I hope your Highness will not regard it ungraciously or consider it as a presumption if I make so bold as to ask your Highness to do me the gracious favor of taking soup with me this noon.

Such a favor would mark an epoch in my life; but I would not have ventured this bold request if my brother in Vienna had not assured me that your Highness did not entirely refuse his entreaty to grant me this gracious favor.
The Austrian gentlemen here have assured me that they will also be present in such a case. If your Highness wishes to come at another time, please command me, for any man feels himself happy to be in your Highness's company.

Metternich accepted the invitation and, accompanied by his intimate friend Countess Lieven, came to lunch with Amschel Meyer, an event which did not fail of its effect upon the diet and upon society in Frankfort The two burgomasters of Frankfort, although invited, did not come. The senate, however, was prepared to make all the concessions asked for, except to agree to the designation, "Israelite citizens." Metternich had seriously to emphasize his "definite wishes" to the obstinate Buol, instructing him to act "in strict accordance with them." But the senate remained obdurate, Buol practiced passive resistance, and the Jewish problem remained unresolved.
While making these social and diplomatic efforts on behalf of the Jews in general and of the Rothschilds in particular, Metternich instructed Gentz to see that the House of Rothschild did not suffer in the press. Because of the close association of that House with Austria, which was ruthlessly repressing all liberal movements in Germany, the more radical sections of the German public, and their papers, were venturing to pass some rather hostile judgments upon the House of Rothschild, in spite of the prevailing censorship. Gentz had repeatedly to listen to Metternich's reproach that he had not got the newspapers sufficiently in hand. For whenever an article unfavorable to the Rothschilds appeared in a German paper, Solomon pressed Metternich to use his influence to prevent such occurrences in the future. Even the Frankfort letters to the Allgemeine Zeitung, published by the firm of Cotta, contained such attacks. Gentz felt that it was his duty to intervene.

"Sir," he wrote on October 18, 1821, to Cotta, "you will have heard from other sources that there is again grave dissatisfaction here regarding the manner in which the Allgemeine Zeitung is edited. ... It seems to me all the more necessary that if you are really anxious that the A.Z. should continue to circulate in the Austrian states without restriction, you should at least mitigate such offending passages as convey the impression of hostility to Austria. . . .

"I refer to such articles as those of Frankfort origin, which have been appearing with some frequency lately, and which comment upon the financial operations here and the rate of exchange in a manner unfavorable to Austria and her credit. It is true that the general sense of these articles reveals the fact that they are directed, not against our state securities, but against the House of Rothschild. Under prevailing conditions, however, it is obvious that the moves attributed to the House of Rothschild always react upon our state credit, and are generally more damaging to it than to the Rothschilds, who in such cases are well able to help themselves."

On December 4, 1821, Gentz wrote again, saying, "The constant attacks upon the House of Rothschild invariably, and sometimes in the most outrageous manner, reflect upon the Austrian government by necessary implication, since everybody knows they are transacting important financial matters with that House, which is not only unimpeachable, but honorable and thoroughly respectable. The persistent rumors regarding new loans are invented simply and solely in order to undermine the confidence which our public securities have won and which they deserve."[114]

The Allgemeine Zeitung was thereafter banned throughout the whole dominions of the Austrian monarchy. Cotta, who although no friend of the Jews was a sound business man, was exceedingly displeased at this and requested Stegemann, the editor-in-chief, to be more careful, as Gentz—and they both knew well that meant Metternich—had complained bitterly about the paper.

Stegemann replied:[115] "In view of the letter from Herr von Gentz which you have been kind enough to communicate to me, I gladly give my formal promise not to accept . . . anything in future relating to the value of Austrian public securities, or anything whatever relating to the House of Rothschild (at least as affecting its relations with Austria). This means of course that I shall have to adopt a new, very cautious, and colorless attitude to affairs. ... In point of fact, I know nothing of any attacks against the House of Rothschild, unless the remark that Madame Rothschild has received her first invitation from the Prussian minister constitutes an attack." In a word, Cotta and Stegemann submitted, and for the time being the brothers Rothschild did not have to bother much about the very widely read Allgemeine Zeitung. The zeal Gentz had shown in this matter was not attributable entirely to Metternich's instructions. Since his return from Laibach to Vienna he had grown more and more intimate with Solomon Rothschild. He often had occasion to confer with him on behalf of his chief regarding the Neapolitan loan, and on one occasion Metternich made a very friendly remark to Gentz, regarding the attitude of the House of Rothschild in this matter.[116] It happened that on the following day Gentz met Rothschild at a dinner given by the banker Eskeles at Hietzing; and he hastened to inform him of the "remarkably flattering remarks made by the prince." This produced, as Gentz himself records in his diary, results most favorable able to himself. "This morning," he notes,[117] on June 24, 1821, "Rothschild paid me a very long visit; he told me the same remarkable story about his money and family affairs as I had recently heard from the prince. At the same time he gave me the account of my share in certain recent financial operations, from which it appeared that, entirely contrary to my expectations, nearly five thousand gulden were due to me."

Gentz's diary for the next few months is full of notes of meetings with Rothschild, and constantly mentions his "very agreeable communications,"[118] and "important financial arrangements."[119]

At the end of the year Rothschild specially demonstrated his gratitude for all the information he had received, and for the influence that had been brought to bear upon Prince Metternich and the press. "Rothschild breakfasted with me," Gentz notes in his diary on December 22, 1821, "and gave me a proof of real friendship for which I cannot feel too grateful to this excellent man at a time when all my income from the principalities has come to an end,[120] and nothing is done by those in authority to compensate me somewhat for this loss."[121] Finally, Gentz played his part in bleeding the Neapolitan treasury, and Rothschild assisted him in this matter too.

On New Year's Day Rothschild waited at Gentz's house until he came back from Metternich in order to tell him that a courier was leaving for Naples next day, and that Gentz might send an urgent reminder regarding the gratuity promised him by the court of Naples. He, Solomon, would see that the matter was put through by his brother Carl and General Roller, the intendant general of the Austrian troops. Gentz and Rothschild had become positively inseparable; the friendship certainly cost Solomon a great deal of money, but the cost was negligible in view of the advantages which it brought him.

The restoration of the Neapolitan kingdom by the Austrians placed heavy burdens upon the people. Count

Ficquelmont estimated that Naples had to pay 23 to 24 million gulden, or 12 to 13 million ducats, for the annual upkeep of the Austrian army;[122] he himself was terrified at the magnitude of the amount. "If the burdens that we impose," he reported to Vienna, "are so oppressive that they are more than the country can stand, all parties will unite in desiring our departure. Instead of being a protecting power we shall become oppressors. The end of it will be that we shall not be able to remain as long as our interests and those of the kingdom of Naples require."

The ambassador also stated emphatically, as he had often done before, that the finance minister was entirely incapable, and that there was only one man who could restore order, namely, Luigi de'Medici, the former finance minister, who had been overthrown by the revolution. All the other foreign representatives were also of this opinion, but the king feared Medici as a man whose intellectual gifts would not accord well with his own autocratic temper. Ficquelmont discussed this matter with Carl Rothschild, and Rothschild also thought that it was only by appointing this descendant of the eminent Tuscan noble family—a man of outstanding honor, energy, and administrative talent—that the material recovery of the country could be assured.

Although Medici had enemies among the royal family, such as the Duke of Calabria—to whom he had refused to give money for the duke to squander in an irresponsible manner—successful pressure was brought to bear by the Austrian government with the result that he was reappointed finance minister at Naples in the spring of 1822.

The new minister did succeed with great difficulty in getting the country out of its serious embarrassments.

It is true that not even he was able to deal with the demands of Austria, but he proved himself a pertinacious accountant, and managed to knock down considerably the maintenance expenses of the Austrian army, the returns for which had always been scaled up very generously.

He contrived to make the second Rothschild loan last longer than his incompetent predecessors had done in the case of the first loan, but in December, 1822, he was compelled to have recourse to a third loan, the extent of which was 22 million ducats nominal. Later on he raised a fourth loan of 2 1/2 million pounds sterling at the rate of 89 4/5, in order to acquire the necessary funds for paying the Austrian army for a further period, and for covering the deficit in the budget.

Through arranging for the loan to be issued in sterling instead of in ducats Nathan expected especially to interest English investors,[123] and in this he was successful. By February 26, 1824, the loan was already quoted at 96.75. The public debt of Naples, which before the revolution had stood at 28 million ducats, had risen by the year 1824 to no less than 104 million ducats nominal, yet the bonds appreciated so considerably in value that some Neapolitan public securities stood at 108 in April, 1824. It might have been expected that as the amount of the debt increased these quotations would fall, since, the income having remained comparatively stationary, the security for repayment of the debt diminished as the debt increased in amount.

The ambassador Ficquelmont fully appreciated the position when he wrote: "It was therefore another's credit and not that of Naples that caused the prices to rise, namely, the credit of the House of Rothschild. The value of its public securities is therefore not a reliable basis on which alone to found an estimate regarding a state's welfare. By so doing one might be gravely misled.

"Securities at Naples have risen in value because a wider market for them has been found. London and Paris have become the principal centers through which they are sold. It has not been possible for Naples to contribute in any way to the result, since Naples merely punctually paid the interest on its debt. ... A small portion of the funds has found its way to Austria, the balance, . . . which was not placed in Naples, has been gradually absorbed by powerful banking firms in London and Paris, which derive their profit from fluctuations in value, and have thus recouped themselves (and a great deai more) for the capital sums which they have advanced."[124]

Thus, briefly stated, the financial policy of the Rothschilds in Naples was summed up. Carl Rothschild had originally gone to Naples with the intention of remaining there only for a short time, as its occupation by Austrian troops was intended to be a temporary measure; but local conditions made it necessary that these troops should remain in the country for a much longer period, unless by withdrawing them Metternich was prepared to risk having the king and his reactionary supporters driven out of Naples.

While the Austrians remained, the presence of Carl was an urgent necessity; and his wife, who had embarked on the journey to Naples as a pleasure trip, made arrangements for a prolonged stay. Carl extended his business, and finally contrived to make himself indispensable to the Neapolitan court in financial matters. He struck roots in that beautiful city of southern Italy, and what had ar first seemed likely to be a brief business sojourn was destined to develop into permanent residence. And the House of Rothschild acquired a new center of operations in the world.

In spite of Stadion's efforts through Rothschild and military pressure to get in the money expended in Naples, the Austrian budget had got into a state of sad confusion. The rising in Piedmont had cost a great deal of money, and the military expenses had attained colossal figures. In despair Stadion reported to the emperor and Metternich[125] that the excess of expenditure over revenue was such that there was a permanent annual deficit of at least 20 million gulden, or more than one-sixth of the total budget. He urged the necessity for putting an end to this disastrous state of affairs. If it were to continue for a longer period of years, it would involve the downfall of the monarchy.

Stadion stated that another loan to cover this deficit was urgently required, and suggested recourse again to the House of Rothschild, whose wealth had increased prodigiously of recent years. Moritz von Bethmann, who was staying in Vienna in February, 1822, expressed the following opinion regarding the House of Rothschild:[126]

"I can understand that the Rothschilds prove exceedingly useful instruments to governments, and am far from wishing to cast aspersions on them or from envying them their good fortune. Solomon especially is a man of the most estimable character, and I am exceedingly fond of him. I have heard from a reliable source that Solomon Rothschild has stated that the annual balance sheet of the five brothers showed a net profit of six million gulden in 20-florin measure. This is certainly a case where the English proverb applies: 'Money makes money.'

"Observing their industry and judgment, we may expect their business to continue to flourish; indeed one hopes so, since the overthrow of this Colossus would be terrible. The harmony between the brothers contributes largely to their success. None of them ever thinks of finding fault with another. None of them adversely criticizes any of the others' business dealings, even when the results do not come up to expectations. Solomon has won people's affections here, partly through his general modesty and partly through his readiness to be obliging. Nobody leaves him without feeling comforted."

Stadion's gloomy report regarding the condition of the public finances induced the emperor to give his agreement to a loan being obtained from the House of Rothschild. Rothschild was approached in March, 1822, an amount of 28 to 30 million gulden being mentioned. The treasury official, Baron von Pillersdorff, wrote a considered report on the offer sent in by the firm.[127] Rothschild proposed that 30 million gulden should be issued at 70%, so that the loan certificates to be issued would represent a nominal capital sum of 42,957,000 gulden. As interest was allowed to be deducted, even before the money was paid, a capital amount of 42,875,000 florins would have to be issued in respect of cash received, amounting to 18,785,717 florins.

"If we compare the real underwriting figure (allowing for the deduction of interest) of 67%," Pillersdorff's report continued, "with the ruling price which averages 75%, we find there is a difference of eight points, or 10 2/3% in favor of the underwriters, which would mean a profit to them of 3,428,000 gulden. It further appears from the above statement of the case, that the interest payable on the suggested loan would amount to 7 1/2% per annum.

"The view to be taken of these conditions," the report concluded, "follows naturally from a consideration of the figures detailed above. In my opinion they are exceedingly onerous and less favorable than any previous proposals, having regard to the fact that the first loan, concluded when Austrian credit was in its infancy, was a daring experiment. They are unacceptable in view of all the reactions that would result. . . .

"Taking all these considerations into account, the proposals put forward do not seem to me such as should be accepted, even as a basis for further negotiation. It would certainly be a severe blow to the country's credit if it became known that, in the circumstances indicated above, a loan had been concluded at the price of 67%, especially when one bears in mind that the treasury would have to meet the reproach of having confined itself to a single offer."

The House of Rothschild was accordingly informed that the treasury was prepared to carry through a financing operation with them and Parish, if this could be arranged on favorable terms, but that the proposals made could not be regarded as such. Moreover, the treasury-wished to take up only a small amount. The Rothschilds, who wanted to get the business at all costs, replied in the following terms:[128]

"We hasten hereby to inform your Excellency that we have just heard from our houses in London and Paris, that several firms in those cities have informed them of their desire to invest capital in Austrian funds, and thereby to participate in a loan arranged for his Majesty's service. In view of our friendly relations with those firms, we should be exceedingly glad to meet their wishes as far as we can. So we venture to inform your Excellency, in connection with the offer (we have now made) for underwriting twelve million gulden of five per cent loan, that we are prepared in any event to offer one and a half per cent more for the amount decided upon than is: offered by any other firm."

The Rothschilds sent in a second letter on the same day, in which, together with Parish, they endeavored to get the large loan. They tried again to induce the finance minister immediately to issue the loan on a larger scale, as they stated,[129] "principally in order that the credulous and uninstructed public should have no occasion to believe that a similar operation would be repeated at an early date." The letter concluded: "In the full conviction, that none, not even the smallest circumstance of any significance escapes the profound insight and business acumen of your Excellency, we are confining ourselves briefly to indicating the above consideration and are content to leave the appreciation of it entirely to your Excellency's wisdom and judgment."

When the Austrian Treasury did not accept this offer, Solomon Rothschild felt personally aggrieved. He took his troubles to Gentz, who had just received a gratuity of three thousand ducats from the court of Naples, through Carl Rothschild's interventions. Gentz reports[130] how Solomon described, with many tears, how inconsiderately he had been treated in more than one quarter, in connection with his new loan proposals.

This failure was soon compensated for by other important transactions. Nathan had just concluded a loan of three and one-half million pounds with Prussia, and the repercussions of this transaction were felt as far as Frankfort and Vienna. Concurrently there were a large number of small loans arranged in Germany and Austria, with the higher nobility, who were short of money in both countries.

The loan, amounting to nine hundred thousand gulden, which Prince Metternich himself obtained from the House of Rothschild on September 23, is of particular interest. It was a perfectly straightforward business; the loan bore jive per cent interest, and was to be repaid by 1834; in fact the prince repaid it in full in 1827. There was nothing in the least suggestive of bribery about the transaction—Metternich was no Gentz—but it was bound to make the chancellor, who thus became Solomon's debtor, feel not entirely free in his dealings with him. At all events it had the result that Metternich was more inclined to be sympathetic to the personal wishes and requests of Solomon Rothschild and his brother.

The chancellor had known for some time that the brothers Rothschild were not content with the simple "von" that they had acquired in the year 1817, and that they had their eye on the title of baron. Upon Gentz one day sounding Metternich as to whether a request in that direction was likely to meet with success, the chancellor gave him to understand that he would raise no objection. The brothers accordingly put forward this request, mentioning their services to Austria. And it was granted; by an imperial decree, dated September 29, 1822, all the brothers and their legitimate descendants of either sex were raised to the rank of baron.

Thus most of the objections raised by the College of Heralds, the court officials, and Baron von Lederer, were automatically discounted. The Rothschilds obtained the seven-pointed coronet which, as a rather broad hint, they had drawn on the coat-of-arms submitted in 1817. The lion on the coat was also granted, and instead of the four arrows which the hand had grasped since they had been admitted into the ranks of the minor nobility, there were now five, symbolizing the five brothers. They were also granted supporters, a lion and a unicorn, and three splendid helmets adorned the coronet. The motto, "Concordia, integritas, industria," was intended to express the harmony between the brothers, as well as their honesty and tireless industry.

In view of the enormous value attaching to any title of nobility in those times, the promotion to the rank of baron signified for the Jewish House, which only twenty years ago had been almost entirely unknown outside its native town, an almost immeasurable increase of prestige. The private life of the brothers also changed from this time. They occupied luxurious dwellings in Frankfort, Paris, and London. Only the aged Gudula stuck faithfully to the family house in the Jewish quarter until her death in 1849 at the age of ninety-six.

Their efforts firmly to establish their social position also met with success, especially as the stories of the family's wealth had invested its members with a kind of legendary halo. They consciously encouraged this belief in their wealth and their power, for they fully realized that it increased the credit of their House. Astonishing though the achievements of the five brothers had been since their father's death, they showed no sign yet of flagging in their efforts. They were driven by the constant urge to accumulate ever-growing riches, and to increase their power and prestige.

CHAPTER V

The Rothschild Business Throughout the World

THROUGH his vigorous intervention, Metternich had restored peace after his fashion in the Apennine Peninsula. The chancellor, however, was constantly apprehensive for the future of his system and the principle of legitimacy, and dreaded the spread of liberal and democratic ideas. When the fires had been quenched at one spot they burst out at another on the broad continent of Europe. Attention was now directed to the Greek rising, and to the civil war in Spain, which had been continuing since 1820.

In this country, which had wrung a constitution from the king, the opposing forces of the Right and Left were still in conflict. During the summer of 1820 the radical members of the Cortes treated the king practically as a prisoner, and on June 22 of that year Ferdinand VII wrote to the King of France requesting him to send forces to his assistance, and also endeavored to induce the other great powers to assist him against his own subjects.

The idea of intervention did not appeal particularly either to the King of France or to his chief minister Count de Villele, although one party, that to which Chateaubriand belonged, was very much in favor of it. The matter had come to be one that concerned the whole of Europe, and Metternich had grown accustomed to intervene decisively in any important European crisis. He had found that the most effective way of doing so was through the congresses of sovereigns, such as had repeatedly been held of recent years. These congresses gave him the opportunity of using his persuasive powers to the full.

On October 20, 1822, another such congress met, this time at Verona. Metternich and Gentz accompanied the emperor to Verona as they had to Laibach, and profiting by their previous experience they took Solomon Rothschild with them. For it was obvious that if it were decided at Verona to apply measures of compulsion to Spain, the resources for this would have to be forthcoming immediately. As the House of Rothschild had proved so useful in the case of Naples, it was desired to make use of it if necessary on this occasion too. In the case of the congress at Laibach, Solomon had felt misgivings about leaving Vienna; but he made no difficulties now.

When Solomon arrived at Verona he learned from several representatives of the powers there of a rumor abroad that the House of Rothschild had offered a loan to the government which had come into power through the revolution, and which was threatening its own king, or that the Rothschilds had at any rate entered into negotiations with this government. Such conferences may actually have taken place; but it was of the utmost importance to the Rothschilds that Metternich should be reassured. He must not be left in any doubt as to the fact that their House was lending its support only to the legitimists and the conservative regime. Solomon therefore two days after his arrival at Verona hastened to write a letter to the chancellor refuting these rumors:[1]

"Most gracious Chancellor," the letter ran. "On my arrival at Verona I was amazed to learn that men of standing here believe that our House has contracted or intends to contract a loan with the Spanish government. Your Highness is far too familiar with the sentiments of myself and my brothers to give such a baseless rumor more than a moment's consideration. It is so wholly inconsistent with our general reputation that I do not think it necessary for me to go into explanations regarding the matter. I will confine myself to stating that your Highness may rest assured that we have never concluded any loan with the Spanish government, that we shall not conclude any such loan, and that we have refused such offers as have been made to us in this matter as decisively as we have, in your Highness's knowledge, refused similar offers in the past."

Solomon had spoken the truth. He had had nothing whatever to do with any arrangements with Spain; his brothers certainly, especially Nathan who lived in liberal England, often did things which they did not immediately communicate to the other brothers, and which these learned of only after the fait accompli; but on this occasion there had actually been no agreement concluded with Spain. After handing his letter to Metternich, Solomon called on Gentz. Alexander von Humboldt had just left him. Humboldt was attached to the King of Prussia's suite, and he had been discussing problems of high philosophy with the "Pen of Europe." In order to assure himself of Gentz's support during the congress, Rothschild held out to him the prospect of further profitable transactions, and Gentz noted with satisfaction in his diary that Rothschild had discussed with him "matters which although not so high were far more pleasant."[2] During the whole period of the congress Solomon and Gentz had been inseparable, and both had derived the greatest advantage from their association. Gentz introduced Solomon to the representatives of Russia, and the delegates of the tsar's dominions soon concluded a loan of £6,000,000. Apart from the business profit realized on this transaction, Solomon contrived to increase his personal prestige.

"Rothschild and his Paris brother had the Order of Vladimir conferred on them yesterday," Gentz wrote[3] to Pilat the editor of the Oesterreichischer Beobachter, which was the most widely read Viennese newspaper at that time. He would be very much pleased if this fact could be mentioned in the papers in an appropriate manner in the near future. "I do not feel that this can conveniently be done in the Beobachter; its proper place would be in an article on Verona, and as you have not published such an article yet, there would be something comic in this being the first item of news from here.

"We must, however, do everything possible to satisfy such a good and loyal person as Rothschild. You might give this matter your thought. In any case please see that it is mentioned as soon as possible in the Allgemeine Zeitung. Have the following statement printed in that paper: 'In recognition of the distinguished services rendered to the Russian Empire by the House of Rothschild in various important financial and credit operations the emperor has conferred the Order of Vladimir upon the barons Solomon and James von Rothschild.' Do not say St. Vladimir and do not refer to the class, which neither I nor the Rothschilds know."

Sometime later Gentz had occasion to send a reminder to his friend and wrote: "You have not replied to me regarding the Order of Vladimir conferred upon the Rothschilds. The baron is asking me every day whether you have forgotten about it. He is particularly anxious that the news should be featured in the Beobachter, and I do not see why this should not be done. At all events the news should be mentioned by you in the Allgemeine Zeitung before somebody else prints it in a misleading and possibly a malicious manner."

In the end the distinction was duly announced in both papers, and the news that the mighty empire of the tsars was also having financial dealings with the House of Rothschild appreciably assisted in raising its credit with the general public.

Meanwhile Solomon had inaugurated a private service of couriers between Verona and Paris and Vienna, and the Rothschilds proceeded to exploit the news about the congress, which they thus received in those capitals before anyone else.

At first it was not by any means certain whether armed intervention in Spain would be decided upon. Even Metternich was not entirely in favor of it, and as war with Spain was therefore not expected[4] French securities kept rising in value. Suddenly, on the arrival of a courier from Verona, James Rothschild sold French bonds to the nominal value of five million francs. The following day it became known that the banker Ouvrard, who was also staying at Verona, had concluded a loan with the Regency Government, which had been set up by the supporters of absolute monarchy in Spain for the duration of Ferdinand's captivity.

It was certainly natural to draw the inference that the congress was taking the side of the king, and a sharp fall in brench bonds resulted. The capital of France re-echoed with reproaches against ministers who had constantly averred that they were determined to avoid war with Spain. The slump became more and more acute, until, a few days later, the British ambassador got news from Vienna. It then became generally known that no decision had yet been taken, and Wellington was continuing, on behalf of England, to oppose the proposal for intervention. The securities now began to go up, and the good news was confirmed by Rothschild. On November 18, Villele wrote to his representative at Verona to say: "The Rothschilds' courier is causing our securities to rise again. He is spreading the news that there will be no intervention. I do not believe in these deceptive booms, which entail fresh variations in the rate of exchange and heavy losses to many persons,[5] especially when there may be a risk of war later."

The House of Rothschild was thus using the general political situation for the purpose of doing profitable business because it was able to get news early. James had been alarmed by the contradictory reports that had followed so rapidly upon one another. Solomon had confidentially informed him that important decisions were obviously pending at Verona, and that the French government would play the leading part in them. Solomon suggested that it would be exceedingly useful if James would come to Verona personally.

James quickly decided to make the journey, and on November 22 Solomon introduced his brother James to Gentz at Verona. On the following day the two brothers dined with Prince Metternich. A few days later, on November 26, Solomon planned to take advantage of his brother James's presence in Verona, and go himself to Vienna. Gentz had just given him a secret report on the congress, and several letters which he wanted taken to Vienna. But a post from Rome informed him that their brother Carl was shortly to arrive from Naples. Solomon postponed his journey for two days. The three Rothschilds had thus an opportunity thoroughly to discuss Neapolitan and Spanish affairs, and the probable result of the congress. After this Solomon and James returned home.

At the beginning of the congress, Solomon had been sending so much news from Verona to Vienna that the bulky Rothschild postal-packets attracted the notice of the postmaster at Scharding. He felt called upon to draw the authorities' attention to this exceptionally voluminous correspondence. This naturally did not particularly excite them, since numerous communications were entrusted to the Rothschild couriers by Metternich and Gentz themselves.

The decisions of the congress did finally lead to armed intervention by France in Spain. The congress passed off with great brilliance and duly impressed the world at large. The ancient arena at Verona was the scene of a magnificent banquet, which was attended by all the members.

Rossini, who was then at the height of his creative powers, charmed the members of the congress with melodies from his operas. Solomon, who had known Rossini in Vienna, introduced him to James at Verona, and this proved to be the starting-point of a friendship which was to develop into intimacy in Paris, especially during the last ten years of their lives.

Solomon dealt with Prince Metternich's personal expenditures at Verona—amounting to 16,370 lira—as indeed the House of Rothschild had furnished[6] all the cash spent in Verona, drawing it partly from France and partly from the various money-markets of the Lombard-Venetian kingdom.

The relations between Austria and that House were constantly growing closer, and her leading statesmen were scarcely able to refuse any request put forward by one of its members.

On September 30 the commercial department of the treasury received an application from Nathan, asking to be appointed Austrian consul-general in London. He pointed out not only that he had punctiliously performed the duties enumerated in his official instructions, especially in the matter of rendering assistance to Austrian seamen—doing so without asking for any compensation—but that he was the sole consular representative of a foreign power in London who had not the rank of consul-general.[7] He promised not to relax his watch on Austrian commercial interests in the future, and also most conscientiously to carry out any instructions which he should receive. The commercial department of the treasury strongly supported this application, and Metternich sent it forward to the emperor with the following memorandum:

"The said Rothschild has for a considerable period occupied the office of Austrian consul in London, to the general satisfaction of his chiefs, and in a disinterested spirit has carried out his duties often involving personal sacrifices, from which he never shrank where the prestige and the interests of your Majesty's service were involved. Your Majesty is moreover graciously acquainted with the services rendered by his House to the imperial state. The incongruity of his present rank in relation to the commercial agents of other foreign powers in London, who generally are styled consul-general, cannot fail to injure his official prestige."

Metternich also pointed out that James in Paris already had the title of consul-general, and Emperor Francis accordingly granted the application. So Nathan now held the same position in London as his brother in Paris. That city was the center now of Rothschild enterprise. The question of intervention in Spain was still the dominating issue, and as in this matter England was sharply opposed to the conservative groups in Russia, Austria, and France, it was inevitable that there should be a corresponding conflict of opinion within the House of Rothschild.

Metternich, with his legitimist policy, had Solomon completely in tow; Amschel was not so prominent, bu| owing to the Jewish problem at Frankfort, he had to follow the direction indicated by his protector Metternich, while James in Paris was so closely bound up with the leader of the ministry, Count de Villele, and anticipated such advantages from this connection that he too was compelled to fall in with the conservative group, who were all-powerful on the Continent. Carl at Naples was; also a dependent upon Austria, so that Nathan in liberal England was in an awkward position with regard to his four brothers on the Continent.

As a naturalized Englishman, and as banker of the richest state in the world, he personally would have wished to fall in with its political opinions as completely as possible. Indeed, it was necessary that he should do so, as otherwise he would speedily have lost his connection with the British government, and any possibility of doing big business in the future.

After the conclusion of the indemnity transactions in Paris, James had succeeded in getting on good terms with the Bourbon court, and especially with the leading minister Count de Villele. He had often been able to oblige influential persons in matters of finance, a fact which assisted him in his efforts to consolidate his position. Soon after his appointment as consul-general James had taken the magnificent Palais Fouche formerly occupied by Napoleon's commissioner of police, and the magnificent style in which he lived served to enhance his prestige. He was still a bachelor, a fact that somewhat limited his social activities, but also made it easier for him to make his way into exclusive circles, some of which still showed great reluctance to admit the Jewish parvenu, and only did so when personal interests made it appear desirable. Conditions, however, gradually improved in this respect as his wealth increased. James also benefited by the fact that the great Paris bankers of that period such as Laffitte and Casimir Perier were either liberal, or indeed almost revolutionary, in their views, while others such as Delessert, Mallet, and Hottinguer were too nervous to undertake risky ventures on a large scale.

In 1823 James offered to place funds at the disposal of Villele, and informed him that he was prepared to come to his assistance in alleviating the financial embarrassments of the treasury. James's first important transaction with the French Treasury consisted in undertaking the sale of 6% Royal Bonds. When at the end of January, 1823, the campaign against Spain was decided upon, James gave Villele to understand that he was prepared to deal with the big loan to which the chamber had agreed. Villele bethought himself of the precedent of Austria and Naples, and suggested that Rothschild should in a similar way raise the money necessary for intervention in Spain through negotiating a Spanish loan payable to France.

Fundamentally, however, James was as reluctant as Villele to embark on hostilities against Spain, for these might seriously interfere with his financial scheme. His attitude is revealed in some intercepted correspondence between him and a Spanish banker called Bertran de Lis, who was endeavoring in association with the Liberals to secure the fall of the Spanish Ministry, in order if possible to prevent the French from intervening. San Miguel's Spanish ministry had, in view of the French menace, obtained authority from the Cortes to change the seat of government and the royal residence. The king would gladly have dismissed the government, but the menaces of an excited populace caused him to refrain from doing so. If the fall of the ministry could be brought about in some, other way, France might perhaps be induced to regard this as indicating an improvement in the position and abstain from taking action.

Such was the state of affairs when a letter arrived from Rothschild's confidential correspondent at Madrid. "We are at this moment," wrote Bertran de Lis to the House of Rothschild in Paris,[8] "struggling to overthrow the ministry and to replace it with persons better qualified to guide the ship of state. I am convinced that we shall succeed in our endeavor, and I am therefore anxious that you should bring these facts to the attention of your government, so that they may cease taking any hostile action. I am asking you to do this in the confident expectation that a solution may be found consistent with the honor of both nations, which will assist in maintaining peace throughout Europe. I hope that you will support me in this endeavor as much as possible; but if you see that nothing can be done, and that a breach is imminent, I hope that you will send me a special messenger at my expense, so that I may regulate my actions accordingly in settling my financial affairs."

The same correspondent subsequently attempted in various ways to communicate items of important political and business news to James; but these appear to have been intercepted as they never reached their destination. The first letter to get through seems to have been one dated March 29, 1823, in which Bertran de Lis wrote:[9]

"It is our desire to avoid war, and in order to carry through the business that we have in hand, I feel I should let you know the line of action which in my view your government should adopt to this end. For one thing I feel they should cease any hostile operations until new ministers have been appointed. . . . In this way we might perhaps reach an agreement satisfactory to both nations, and one that might also bring us advantages of a general nature, and also such as we may turn to account in our business."

The writer of this letter proceeded to deal with the current situation in Spain in some detail, and concluded with the warning: "It is important also to use every precaution in carrying on this correspondence; for it would be exceedingly painful to me to be compromised in this matter in which I am convinced that the public interest is identical with my personal interest."

In spite of the precautions that were presumably taken, the correspondence fell into the hands of royalists, and was duly brought to the attention of Metternich at Vienna.

He was highly indignant that one of the Rothschilds, who always pretended to be so conservative, and denied that they had anything to do with Liberals, should suddenly be discovered in dealings of this character. Gentz was instructed to speak to Solomon about it. Solomon was at great pains to invent an explanation, and Gentz noted in his diary:

"I have just had a little discussion with Rothschild about the incredible story of his brother in Paris, who is suddenly appearing in the role of intermediary between the French ministers and a revolutionary banker at Madrid."[10]

Meanwhile the French had seriously embarked upon intervention in Spain. On April 7, 1823, the Duke of Angouleme, nephew of the king, crossed the Spanish frontier. He encountered no opposition, and pressed on far into the country toward the capital Madrid. It was Villele's task to provide the moneys required by the French army, and now that the die had been cast James Rothschild hastened to offer his services to the minister. His first action was to hand the minister a letter of credit in favor of the Duke of Angouleme addressed to a bank in Madrid that was closely connected with the firm of Rothschild.

Villele forwarded this document to the duke. "This is," he wrote in a covering letter,[11] "in the nature of a courtesy, but I was afraid of offending Rothschild, who has been and still is exceedingly useful to us in our financial difficulties, if I did not accept it. As soon as the army has entered Madrid Rothschild will send an official of the firm, or perhaps one of his brothers, to that city. I would request your Royal Highness to grant this banking firm your very special protection, as its intervention may be exceedingly useful to us in the future, both in the matter of rendering financial assistance to the army, and also in the matter of the Spanish loan, if such a loan can be usefully launched."

Angouleme did not share Villele's view that the letter of credit was to be regarded as a mere courtesy. "I consider," he replied, "that it would be exceedingly useful to avail ourselves of the facilities that Rothschild enjoys for providing ready money at Madrid." He held that this was a speedier and more economic method than sending money from France. He fully agreed that Rothschild should be treated with consideration, as recommended by Villele, who it was clear had learned much from the Austrians in Naples.

James was thus placed firmly in the saddle, and was enabled to carry out his measures under the protection of the two most powerful men in France at that time. It is true that Villele revealed a certain attitude of suspicion toward bankers in general, regarding them as voracious beasts of prey out for money.

On May 23 the duke entered Madrid without opposition, and set up a regency, which was to rule with modified absolutism until the king should have been liberated from the Cortes. This government, however, in spite of its dependence on French troops, soon threw all counsels of wisdom and moderation to the wind. In order to fill its empty treasury it attempted to arrange a loan with Ouvrard and an agent of the House of Rothschild, who had come to Madrid with the French army.

Villele warned Angouleme not to allow the regency to have a free hand in this matter. "For," he wrote,[12] "where the body is, there will the vultures be gathered together to devour it." He referred to the bankers, not excluding Rothschild, who would undoubtedly have offered the regency oppressive loans.

Meanwhile the Cortes had carried the Spanish king off to Cadiz, and Angouleme proceeded to invest that city and to liberate the king. "Cadiz is the key to the whole problem," Villele wrote to the duke.[13] "By force and negotiation the king must be got out of the hands of the rebels. Your Highness knows that his Majesty has given you carte blanche to enable you to succeed in this venture, and that we have plenty of money in reserve which is available for any of your requirements. Moreover, with the letter of credit which I have sent to you, your Highness can draw bills up to any amount on the House of Rothschild in London for making payments to those who may deliver up the king."

I n order to meet all this heavy expenditure Villele had been negotiating for some time for the flotation of a considerable French loan. The minister still found his dependence upon the House of Rothschild irksome, and gave vent to his feelings in a letter to the duke:[14] "Although I have nothing but praise for the manner in which Herr Rothschild has served us while I was in diffuculties, I should like to float a loan which would make me independent of these people."

The cold facts were destined to turn out rather differ-ently, and through this loan of 23 million francs, which was offered for public tender, Villele was to be bound more closely than ever to the House of Rothschild. In open competition with three other banking firms, James Rothschild, encouraged by his brother Nathan, offered 89.55%, the next highest price offered being 87.75%. The importance attached by the House of Rothschild to the conclusion of this agreement is most clearly evidenced by the fact that Nathan from London, Solomon from Vienna, and Amschel from Frankfort had all hurried to Paris for the negotiations.

Both parties were delighted with the arrangement. Villele was pleased since he had scarcely hoped that such conditions were possible for France, engaged in a venture like the Spanish intervention, especially in view of the fact that the country was already burdened with a foreign debt of 400 million francs.[15] He reported enthusiastically to the duke on July 11[16] that the bonds on that date already stood at 91.25, and that the loan had therefore appreciated 2 1/3%.

The four brothers did everything possible to extend the European market for this French loan. Villele congratulated himself on having got the loan underwritten at such a high figure, and explained his success as follows: "Monsieur Rothschild, whom the King of Portugal asked for a loan of 25 million francs, had the courtesy to ask King Louis XVIII for his permission before consenting. This is an example of the efforts which the financial powers were making to intervene in politics. Moreover, Rothschild of London, Rothschild of Frankfort, and Rothschild of Paris are all here, a fact which contributed not a little in giving me the confidence necessary to fix the minimum price at 89.5%."

Villele thought that he had carried through quite a clever deal, but this loan, which constantly rose in value, and reached par as early as February 12, 1824, proved to be a new and abundant source of profit to the issuing firm.

Villele now reverted to his scheme that the duke should present a skilful ultimatum demanding the liberation of the King of Spain and his family. Villele advised that he should bring money plentifully to bear in this matter,[17] and should have an unlimited supply of credit at his disposal through Monsieur Belin, the Madrid agent of the House of Rothschild, so that he could draw bills up to any amount on the House of Rothschild in London. James agreed that he might accompany the duke if he left Madrid. Belin's signature was sufficient to release amounts which it might otherwise be exceedingly difficult to procure. Without his assistance it would be impossible to use bribery for the liberation of the king.

"This man," Villele wrote to the duke, "is personally known to the majority of those whose support we need, and it will be much more attractive to them to receive the price of their infamy secretly in London than to be paid in gold which they would have to withdraw at their own risk from a city invested on all sides."

Villele had entirely forgotten his former feelings about the Rothschilds, and he had extensive recourse to the convenient services rendered by the firm at home and in Spain.

"Your Highness," he wrote to the duke,[18] "can use the House of Rothschild's money for all your financial requirements, whether necessitated by the service of the army or by the negotiations. In connection with the latter its agent's banking relations with the principal banking firms of Cadiz may be useful to you." He suppressed any misgivings at having brought Angouleme into such close contact with Rothschild. "Finance and trade," he wrote, "are the friends of peace, but they always wish to secure peace at the expense of honor; nevertheless, having the safeguard of a man of your Highness's temper and sentiment as a counterpart, we need not be anxious about allowing these gentlemen to intervene."

In Spain matters took the course that France had desired. On June 23, 1823, the duke had reached Cadiz and was prepared to launch his attack. The forts surrounding the city were speedily captured. The necessity actually to take the town by storm did not arise. In accordance with Villele's advice the duke made free with the Rothschilds' money; bills were drawn on Nathan Rothschild to the amount of nearly two million francs in favor of various members of the courts, and of the persons who held the king captive.

When the military position at Cadiz had become hopeless, and those who had accepted bribes promoted mutinies in the garrisons, the Cortes finally broke up, and released the king. It is true that he was first forced to sign a document containing all kinds of promises for a moderate form of government, in accordance with the constitution; but everybody knew perfectly well that he would not keep them. Thus the King of Spain was not in the end required to feel under an obligation to the powerful support of the House of Rothschild for his release from his own subjects of the liberal party. Neither was the duke forced to feel that he owed it to the banking firm that, after speedily overcoming all difficulties, he was enabled to return to Paris as a conquering hero.

The services which the House had rendered to the French government, however, enhanced its prestige at court and with Villele to an enormous degree. James began to surround himself with luxury, and to patronize science and the arts; he furnished his house at No. 40, rue de Laffitte magnificently. He received the Cross of the Legion of Honor.

After the intervention, the course of events in Spain was, to Metternich's delight, exactly similar to what had occurred at Naples. An absolute monarchy was reintroduced, the liberals being savagely persecuted. The constitution vanished. The Roman Inquisition functioned again, and the government went far beyond what the French government had wanted to achieve by intervention.

Ferdinand's new absolute government had money troubles no less than its predecessor; and the king appealed to the monarch of France, pointing out that his work was not yet completed, and that he lacked such a financial foundation as would be provided by a loan. Villele applied to James Rothschild, who, in conjunction with Nathan and the British bankers Baring and John Irving, offered a loan of 120,000,000 piasters[19] to be subscribed for at 60%. The bankers demanded, however, that the whole of Spain's Colonial revenue should be mortgaged, this being the only revenue that had suffered little through the civil war, and in addition they required that France should give a formal guarantee.

An agreement was not concluded at the time, since Villele replied to the bankers[20] that his first consideration must be his duty toward France. He could not agree to a guarantee by France without endangering its political and financial interests. He would, however, gladly advise the Spanish government to regularize its administration and to apply moderation in its general policy, in order to create the confidence necessary for such agreements. These were fine words, but they offered no tangible security for calculating business men, and accordingly the bankers withdrew their offer.

Metternich and Gentz had attentively watched the course of events. Rothschild's relations with Gentz had become, if possible, still more intimate, and the sincerity of Gentz's diary is attested by nothing more than by the entries of the 6th and 9th of January, 1823: "Rothschild called on me in Vienna. Everything is going magnificently and money in profusion. . . . January 9. I have been informed by Rothschild that a remittance of a thousand ducats is on its way from Russia."

Rothschild was assiduous in impressing Gentz with the riches and power of his family. On January 13, 1823, he favored him with over an hour's discourse on the position of his firm and its enormous resources, showing him some "eloquent and exceedingly interesting documents."

The firm had in fact grown so powerful that it now proceeded to conclude most important transactions, in which it had formerly allowed other firms such as Gontard and Parish to participate, entirely on its own. The brothers may have learned that the Austrian finance minister once more had occasion to think of them. England had recently demanded the repayment of some old debts owing by Vienna, and it appeared that Solomon's and Nathan's services would be required again. Metternich and Gentz were therefore anxious to be obliging at this time, especially in matters that did not cost the state anything. They did not have to rack their brains to find an opportunity of showing their good-will, for together with Borne, Solomon had been "hammering at [Gentz] about this wretched question of the Frankfort Jews."[21]

The growing power of the House of Rothschild, which had originated in Frankfort and now had dealings with most of the more important states, caused the Frankfort Jews to stiffen in their attitude. They now demanded as a right what they had formerly begged as a favor. While Solomon and Gentz were pressing Metternich to help the Jews of Frankfort, Solomon's coreligionists there were carrying on a constant campaign against Count Buol, delegate and president of the diet who was so markedly hostile to them. Their efforts finally resulted in Count Buol being recalled, and this constituted an important victory for the House of Rothschild.

Buol's successor, Baron von Munch-Bellinghausen, was instructed to settle the Jewish problem as speedily as possible, since it was Austria's intention to support such demands of the Israelite community as were just. Amschel

Meyer Rothschild was quite unrestrained in his demonstrations of joy. On the day when the new president of the diet arrived, Rothschild gave a big dinner, to which all the delegates were invited.

"I should have preferred," Munch stated in his report to Metternich,[22] "not to have made my first public appearance in this manner, but as the affair had already been arranged I thought that I ought not to be too nice; moreover I made the acquaintance of all the delegates before the session."

Matters now began to move; Miinch-Bellinghausen followed out Metternich's ideas in quite a different way from Buol, and in August, 1822, the question was settled in a manner highly satisfactory to the Jews. It is true that many restrictions were still maintained. Thus only fifteen Jewish marriages were allowed in each year;[23] no Jew was allowed to possess more than one house, and Jewish trade too was not free from all restrictions. The Jews, however, were henceforth counted as "Israelite citizens"; the ghetto was done away with, and they had full liberty of movement within the town.

They regarded these concessions as a victory, and Rothschild gave a dinner to celebrate them September 3, to which he invited both burgomasters, as well as the delegates to the diet. The former, however, again stayed away because, as Schwemer said, they did not feel in a mood for celebrations.[24] The debentures issued in 1811 under Dalberg's agreement for the liberation of the Jews were now fully redeemed. This fact also indicated that the Jews were satisfied. Thus the matters in dispute in the Jewish question, which had been pending for eight years, were finally settled by the diet acting in a judicial capacity. The principal credit for this was due to Rothschild. Both the town and the Jews sent deputations to thank Baron von Munch, who did not fail to report this fact to Metternich, as he knew well the importance Metternich attached to this question.

The reasons for supporting the Frankfort Jews were well known in Austria. Count Stadion had been negotiating with Rothschild and Parish, the underwriters of the last Austrian loan, since the spring of 1822 for a loan to cover the estimated deficit of 20 million gulden. They had stated that they were willing to underwrite 20 millions at 67, and then at 68.5%, but Count Stadion, whose recent experience in such matters had made him more cautious and critical, thought that these terms were not sufficiently favorable, or were, as he expressed it, "oppressive."[25] He therefore looked around for other offers, and for the first time in the experience of the Austrian government these were forthcoming.

Stadion wanted to borrow only 12,000,000 gulden at first; he fixed the final date for submitting tenders at April 14, 1822. The Paris banker Fould, representing a group of Paris firms at the head of which was Laffitte, offered to underwrite the 12,000,000 at 69%. Parish and Rothschild made a second offer to take over the loan at 69 1/2, while the Viennese banking firm of Geymuller offered 72 3/4. A conference of ministers was summoned for April 13, to consider the tenders.

Solomon Rothschild was particularly anxious to secure the loan, if necessary without the cooperation of Parish—with whom he had recently had several differences—as this would provide him with a further opportunity for exploiting the advantages enjoyed by his firm for the sale of securities through their branches in the most important markets in Europe. He learned through Gentz that other firms were not merely in the field but had actually offered better terms than his, and he therefore decided to write to Stadion.

When the finance minister went to attend the conference on April 13, he was handed a letter from the firm of Rothschild just before entering the conference room. This letter bore the signature of that firm alone. The firm stated that they were prepared in any case to offer 1/2% more than might be offered by anyone else for the loan which was to be issued.

The conference first decided that 20 million gulden should be issued at once instead of the smaller amount that Stadion desired. It was then considered whether or not any attention should be paid to Rothschild's late offer. The conference was agreed that Rothschild's letter was manifestly irregular. Applicants had been required to submit tenders under seal by April 12. Rothschild had done so jointly with Parish, but their offer had been less favorable than that of Geymuller. The second letter, although dated April 12, had not been given to Stadion until the following day. The minutes of the conference pointed out that "the irregularity of this procedure consists in having failed to observe the final date imposed upon all applicants for submitting their tenders—a fact which Rothschild is obviously trying to conceal by antedating his offer—and also in the lack of precision in the offer itself."

Metternich and Count Zichy expressed the opinion that Rothschild's offer should not be accepted, but that it should not be rejected either, and proposed that the whole matter should be negotiated afresh. With regard to the French banker Laffitte, whom he suspected of liberal sympathies, Prince Metternich stated that he feared the banker might be actuated by other than purely business motives. He added that he felt similar misgivings regard - ing Geymuller's offer, since it was possible that he was acting in concert with Laffitte.

While Metternich used his influence in favor of the House of Rothschild, Stadion took the opposite line, adhering to his view that Rothschild's retrospective tender should be ignored, and that the offer of the firm of Geymuller should be accepted as the best offer sent in by the time fixed.

Stadion was of the opinion that the financial interests of the state required that competitive tenders having been asked for, it was essential that the conditions laid down should be strictly observed, and that Rothschild's retrospective offer should therefore not be considered. "This is the first time," he emphasized, "that the treasury has had the gratifying experience of finding several competitors tendering for a loan. They will come to us again, and perhaps with even more favorable results in the future if we prove to them that belated offers are not considered. If in the present instance we act otherwise, it may be assumed that henceforth we shall have no possibility of securing genuine competition, and we may therefore pay dearly in time to come, for any immediate advantage." Finally, with reference to the objection made to Laffitte on personal grounds, Count Stadion observed that it would be quite impossible in any case to prevent him from being an unrevealed participator in a loan, and that even if Rothschild's offer were accepted this contingency would still have to be reckoned with.

As there was no way of bridging these differences of opinion the conference broke up without result. It was therefore necessary for the emperor to give the final decision, with the result that Metternich's views prevailed. The emperor issued the following decisions in council :[26]

"On the question whether 12 or 20 millions should be issued, the general political situation should be regarded as the determining factor, and Metternich should accordingly be consulted. A new date should be fixed for submitting tenders indicating that belated offers will not be considered."

Another year was to pass before the new big Austrian loan materialized. In April, 1823, the deficit up to the end of the financial year 1824 was estimated at no less than 35,000,000 gulden. It was now decided to issue a loan of 30,000,000. Four firms, including the House of Rothschild, jointly provided this sum in cash, receiving 36,000,000 five per cent debentures payable in coin, at 82 gulden per cent.[27]

While Austria was suffering from these difficulties, her aggressive foreign policy—especially the expedition to Naples, which was viewed very critically in England—had given rise to the belief that the finances of Austria must be in a most flourishing condition if it had so much money to spend on such objects. The Opposition in the British Parliament had for some time been reproaching the ministry for failing to demand payment of debts which had been incurred by Austria even before the revolutionary war.

Before the system of the English subsidies had come into effect, Austria had been granted two loans by England, to the value of £6,220,000 for financing its campaigns, and in the excitement of the Napoleonic wars, this fact had fallen into the background. With the addition of compound interest the debt had, by the time of the Congress of Verona in 1822, risen to an amount exceeding £23,500,000. Austria had already been approached at Aix-la-Chapelle regarding the repayment of the loan, but Metternich had refused to pay, and all the negotiations since had proved fruitless.[28] For Stadion definitely stated that if England insisted upon its demands it would mean the collapse of Austria's finances, which had been so laboriously resuscitated.[29]

When Metternich adopted a policy at Verona which was opposed to that of England, Wellington again reminded the chancellor that his government was pressing for the payment of this debt. He was not asking for the whole gigantic sum mentioned above, but was prepared to waive all interest charges, compound and simple, and would even be satisfied with a capital payment of £4,000,000. This amount, however, Austria must pay in any event Even this was a very considerable sum, representing about 40,000,000 gulden in convention coinage, and it constituted another dreadful surprise for Stadion.

Metternich realized that it was his policy which had induced this claim to be brought forward again, and he endeavored to reach an agreement in personal conversation with the British commissioner Sir Robert Gordon, who had been dispatched for this purpose. Various solutions were considered and rejected. Finally Metternich offered a lump sum of 30,000,000 gulden five per cent debentures at an issue price which involved the reduction of the total claim to about two million pounds. He then had recourse to Solomon Rothschild, asking him to try to influence the British government through his brother Nathan. Solomon immediately wrote a confidential letter to Nathan on the matter.

"The British minister," he wrote,[30] "has as yet made no reply to this proposal . . . It is probable that England will not at once unconditionally accept the offer of the Austrian government, but will attempt in one way or another to obtain better terms. Whatever the reply may be, however, I do not believe that the Austrian government will vary their original offer ... If it were to act otherwise, and all at once to put in circulation new public securities amounting to so many millions, the Austrian government would be dealing a severe blow to its credit, which is being raised by a businesslike and intelligent administration to a point commensurate with the country's greatness.

"You are a business man yourself, and will therefore be best able to appreciate these circumstances, so that it would be redundant for me to explain myself further. What I have written has been communicated to me in confidence by his Excellency Prince von Metternich, and it is merely intended to inform you of the general position. In any case you may, although only confidentially (for you have no official instructions) discuss the matter with the chancellor of the exchequer, and endeavor to convince the English of the fairness of the offer which is being made. As I am aware of your devotion to the government here, I feel confident that you will be grateful to me for giving you an opportunity of proving yourself useful and well disposed to them in such an important matter, and that you will show all the wisdom and caution necessary to assist it in attaining its ends. I hope that you will be able to inform me of the success of your endeavors by the next post ..."

Nathan thereupon got in touch with the bankers Baring and Reid-Irving, and also with the British government, and succeeded in persuading the government to agree to a payment of £2,500,000, whereas the negotiators, after at first asking for more, finally obtained from the Austrian government 30,000,000 florin 5% cash debentures at an issue price somewhat exceeding 82 2/3%. Stadion agreed to the offer made by the three firms mentioned above,[31] and on October 31, 1823, Solomon was able to send the following report to Metternich:[32]

MOST GRACIOUS CHANCELLOR!

It is with particular pleasure that I take this opportunity of informing your Highness of the pleasant news, that after considerable effort I have at last succeeded, in collaboration with my colleagues in London, in concluding the transaction with the English government on the basis of the amount of 30 million gulden 5% Metalliques Bonds. I have thus faithfully carried out the promise made to you on my departure, and am most happy to have been able to terminate a matter outstanding for so long, entirely to the satisfaction of the wishes of the imperial government.

I have been expressly requested by my colleague to endeavor to secure that the government of his Majesty the Emperor shall grant a commission of 2-3% to the underwriters in view of the fact that the transaction is such an advantageous one to the treasury. Mindful of the just and loyal principles of the government here, I may feel justified in assuming that if I submitted such a request it would not fail to receive consideration. But the reflection that my services and my zeal in this matter have resulted in such definite advantage to the state, and effected such large savings, is so exceedingly pleasant that I gladly renounce the possibility of deriving any further emoluments. I have made a similar statement recently to his Excellency, Count von Stadion, and therefore flatter myself that I have given occasion for his Majesty to feel satisfied with me, and have earned his gracious consideration.

Your Highness will no doubt deign to appreciate with your customary gracious condescension the efforts that I am making in the interests of the imperial state, and I confidently flatter myself that you will graciously consider a request with which, lest I should seem immodest, I do not venture to trouble your Excellency yet. I am waiting to communicate it to you verbally. I await with extreme impatience the moment when I shall have the happiness of seeing your Highness again and in the best of health, and when I shall be able personally to renew the assurances of my most profound regard. . . .

As a matter of hard fact the whole transaction constituted a bull speculation in Austrian public securities by the three firms concerned. Their expectations were fulfilled directly after the negotiations had been concluded, for as early as January, 1824, the Metalliques showed a marked appreciation in value.

When the conclusion of the whole affair was reported to Emperor Francis, with a suggestion that the Austrian mediator Kubeck should be commended, Count Zichy wished to avail himself of the opportunity for obtaining some imperial recognition for the House of Rothschild. He minuted on the memorandum requesting the emperor's confirmation that, although the firms carrying through the settlement of this loan, which had so materially improved the credit of the Austrian state on the London Stock Exchange, had indisputably had their own interests in view, they, and especially the House of Rothschild, nevertheless deserved recognition for the able way in which they had handled the business. Such a demand for Austrian securities had been produced that the last loan was already quoted at a premium of over 5%, while by making their credit available the firms had succeeded in the difficult matter of satisfying the English government.[33] Zichy accordingly proposed for the emperor's consideration that the following sentence should be added: "And we take cognizance of the efforts made by the London banking firms which have so materially raised Austria's public credit."

Baron von Lederer, however, added that in his view the services rendered in arranging the loan in England consisted merely in an intelligent appreciation of the circumstances ; and that on this service the banks had already realized no inconsiderable profit as shown by the prices of the securities published in the English papers.

Emperor Francis drew his pen heavily through Zichy's "frill," and took "cognizance with satisfaction" of the fact that the matter had been settled.[34] The whole transaction proved to be one of the most profitable pieces of business in which the House of Rothschild had ever engaged. The bonds continually increased in value, their average price in 1824 being 93, and in 1825, 94. It is obvious that the brothers Rothschild succeeded in very profitably realizing on the 30 million gulden debentures which they had subscribed at 82 2/3. It is not possible to estimate the actual profit, but according to the statement of Neumann it already amounted to £1,824,600 at the beginning of April.[35] Solomon Rothschild's "pleasant feelings" and the magnanimous gesture with which he refused a commission or "emoluments" are thus readily intelligible.

It is not surprising that, since Vienna offered opportunities of doing such excellent business, Solomon should have grown more and more attached to that city. In spite of the restrictions imposed upon foreign Jews, his relatives also were attracted by the idea of settling there. One of these was a cousin of Solomon Rothschild, called Anton Schnapper, who was about to marry the daughter of William von Wertheimstein, Rothschild's Vienna manager, a Jew who had received the imperial "toleration" as a private wholesale merchant.

Through Solomon's powerful influence Anton Schnapper contrived to obtain an audience from the emperor, and to submit his request for toleration, and permission to carry on business. Although the emperor gave his consent, much time elapsed, as was the case with all applications, before formal sanction could be given, and the impatient young man decided again to make application to the emperor, but in writing.

"Your Majesty," the application ran,[36] "The undersigned desires henceforward to be included among the millions of fortunate subjects who enjoy the merciful and just rule of your Majesty. I was born at Frankfort-on-the-Main, and I am the son of honorable parents, my mother's name having been Rothschild. I have worked for several years as an assistant in the business of this well-known firm, and acquired such knowledge as goes to make a competent and honest business man.

"I now desire to settle in this city as a wholesale merchant, and to unite myself in the bonds of honorable matrimony with the virtuous daughter of the licensed wholesale merchant of this city, William von Wertheimstein. My request for 'toleration' and for authority to act as a wholesale tradesman has already been considered by all the departments concerned, found to be in order, and has been submitted to your Majesty for approval. May your Majesty be pleased most graciously to accede to this humble request, and speedily to grant it, and thus establish a family which in return for this priceless favor will never weary of beseeching the Almighty in their daily prayers to grant prosperity to your Majesty and your Majesty's family."

Schnapper sent this in with the observation that his first application was still lying in his Majesty's office. "You have on several occasions," he wrote to Solomon,[37] "kindly promised me your support in this matter, and in view of the bonds of blood and friendship that unite us, I hope you will have the kindness to concern yourself with it now."

Solomon kept his word, and requested Metternich[38] very kindly to emphasize the importance of this petition quite briefly to Martin, his Majesty's principal private secretary, as his Majesty's signature was still required.

Metternich's position was such that a word from him put the matter through at once.

Stadion continued to employ the House of Rothschild in important financial operations. In February, 1824, the firm undertook to produce old 200 gulden bonds to the value of ten millions for a commission of 2 1/2%,[39] if he were granted new 100 gulden 5% bonds in return for each 200 gulden bond. Solomon indeed wanted to increase the sum to twenty million, subject to the condition that during this period the old debt should not be reduced, and that the strictest secrecy should be observed during the whole scheme. The offer came to Hofrat von Lederer for his opinion, and he at once minuted that he doubted whether the House of Rothschild would find it so easy to carry through the business to the tune of twenty millions.

He was to prove right; for in February, 1825, the House of Rothschild asked to be allowed to reduce the amount to seven (from ten) millions. In the meantime the older bonds had increased considerably in value, and the result was a loss to the firm. The House of Rothschild naturally did not do all its business at a profit; but if it ever failed to do so, or actually suffered a loss, the brothers generally succeeded in their efforts to reduce it to a minimum, and above all, to keep it secret. The firm's transactions, even outside Austria, were constantly increasing in scope, and its undertakings were beginning to extend beyond Europe to other continents.

Brazil had, in 1821, also imposed a Cortes constitution upon its sovereign the King of Portugal, with the result that separation from the mother-country was decreed and the king's son Don Pedro was proclaimed constitutional emperor. This occurred with the support of England, but against the will of the conservative eastern powers, and especially of Metternich.

While the four brothers on the Continent were under Metternich's sway—James alone allowing himself occasional secret ventures with the liberals in Spain—Nathan had to do his best to follow the general political tendencies of liberal England. When, therefore, in 1824 Brazil was unable to fulfil its obligations to another London firm, Nathan intervened to the great satisfaction of British statesmen, taking over Brazil's liabilities, and in 1829 he concluded a loan of £800,000 with the new imperial state. This enabled Brazil to put her finances in order, while Nathan did not suffer financially.

However, such loans, being suggestive of liberal sentiments, would naturally arouse resentment amongst the conservative powers, and they also gave rise to considerable difficulties amongst the five brothers. Fundamentally the brothers were in complete agreement regarding their aims, and they had no intention in any circumstances of adopting any definite political line. Their adaptability made it impossible to do anything of the kind. But those Rothschilds who were living within the sphere of Metternich's power, and especially the Viennese Rothschild, were forced at any rate to pretend that they stood exclusively for the conservative tendencies represented by Metternich's system. It was often exceedingly difficult for them to explain away or put a good complexion upon Nathan's actions, a fact which frequently led to embarrassing situations.

At this time occurred an event of great importance to the House of Rothschild. On May 13 Solomon Rothschild came to see Gentz in a state of great excitement, and told him he had just received news that Count Stadion had suddenly had a stroke at his home. A man of the most scrupulous personal honor, and the most indefatigable industry, he was profoundly ambitious, and so permeated with the spirit of devotion to duty and with a sense of the importance of his work, that he took all the vicissitudes of his difficult office deeply to heart; he therefore used up his reserves of energy more quickly than other men. The excitement and the strain of the events of the last few years had prematurely worn him out. He died two days after the stroke, and was succeeded in office by Count Nadasdy.

This was a serious loss to the Rothschilds, for they owed it to Stadion more than to anyone else that they had come to Vienna. It is true that during the last years of his life he had grown much more skeptical and critical in his attitude toward the brothers; but they were so intimately connected with Austrian finances that a new minister, had he wished it, would have had the greatest difficulty in eliminating them. Even Metternich, who secretly cherished feelings of suspicion and aristocratic pride toward the Jewish parvenus, never thought of such a thing.

Moreover, Gentz and the Rothschilds themselves took care that no serious misunderstanding should arise. As Gentz reports, Rothschild not only repeatedly saw Metternich at his office during this period, he also often had meals with the prince; and Solomon's big dinners with thirty or more guests were attended by ministers and ambassadors and many members of the aristocracy. Through his numerous invitations, Solomon extended his connection, and got ideas for his operations.

The center of gravity of the House of Rothschild's business was at that time in France. The former leader of the royalists and head of the government in that country had not forgotten the financial assistance rendered by the House of Rothschild at the time of the Spanish expedition. As it was his ambition to set France on her feet financially, it occurred to him that he might avail himself of the assistance of the House of Rothschild in this also. At that time France had to pay no less than 197 million francs interest on its public indebtedness. Villele meant to reduce this intolerable burden by converting the 5% loan, which already stood at par on February 17, 1824, to a loan at a lower rate of interest, namely 3%. In this way he anticipated saving about thirty-four millions annually in interest. Villele thought out his scheme and then made a detailed proposal to James Rothschild in Paris.[40]

The minister showed that in spite of the expense of the Spanish war, he could make his budget balance without a further loan or additional taxation. "In these circumstances," he wrote, "it appears to me to be possible to take advantage of the conditions that have caused public securities in England and throughout Europe to appreciate in value, for the purpose of carrying through the conversion of our 5% bonds into 4 or 3% bonds."

Villele asked James to cooperate in this plan, which was not to affect French credit. He meant in this way to convert no less than 150 million bearing 5% interest, and to issue to the underwriters a corresponding amount of 3% bonds at 75. The minister hoped that the 3% bonds would also soon rise in value; and he offered to allow the underwriters to keep the saving in interest during the first year after the conversion of the bonds bearing 150 million in annual interest had been effected.

James immediately informed his brother Nathan in London of the French finance minister's proposal for this gigantic transaction. All the brothers, and especially James, tacitly recognized Nathan as having the best financial brain. His connection with the British government also made him the most influential of all the brothers. The finance minister not only had sent his proposal to James in writing, but also had repeatedly discussed it with him personally, and immediately after such discussions, on the 2nd, 3rd and 4th of March, 1824, James sent a private courier to his brother Nathan in London. On March 6, Nathan, after consulting with the banker Baring, sent James the following reply:[41]

"MY DEAR BROTHER: ... the brothers Baring, as well as I myself, will be pleased to be of use to the French government in their plans for reducing the interest payments; and as the scheme seems to have been well thought out, there should not be much cause to fear for the result. At the same time, it is absolutely essential that the finance minister should be in complete agreement with us, and that no difficulties should arise in carrying out his intentions.

"It is quite clear that the present price of the bonds is maintained by speculators who have been exceedingly lucky for some time, and will no doubt continue to develop their success by further speculating on a rise. Such persons, however, have not the power to assist the finance minister in a scheme embracing such far-reaching possibilities, unless it be supported by such eminent capitalists as Messrs. Baring and Rothschild. I am sending you the draft of a scheme which I should like to have submitted to the minister, and the success of which would undoubtedly be of enormous importance to the country and to the government."

In this drafted scheme Nathan explained that the finance minister would have first of all to secure the chamber's consent to the operation, the government being allowed a completely free hand to carry through in the most advantageous way possible, as was done in similar cases by the British Parliament. In essentials, Nathan followed Villele's proposal that he should jointly with Baring underwrite 150 million 3% bonds. He asked only that, in the event of the operation being less successful than was anticipated, the minister should be authorized by the chamber to issue treasury bills up to 100 million francs, so that in such a case Baring and Rothschild would be able to get money by cashing these bills, and would not be forced to sell the bonds.

"If the results work out satisfactorily," wrote Nathan, "the firms of Baring and Rothschild, who will apply all their energy and risk their property in carrying out the French minister's scheme, must expect to receive as their reward the profit which this operation will yield during the first years. The minister must persuade the bank to discount at 3%, and also to lend money on the bonds.

"His Majesty will thus be in a position when the chamber reassembles, to inform his subjects and the whole world of the flourishing condition of French finances, and that, too, directly after a war which has restored the Spanish Bourbons to their throne and to the hearts of their people. . . ."

If the whole operation were to go through successfully, and if 150 million of annual interest charges were really to be cut down from 5% to 3%, the saving effected by the French government would run into many millions, and the House of Rothschild was to receive the benefit of the first annual saving thus made.

Villele and the two firms soon arrived at an agreement Nathan had applied his experience in British transactions of a similar nature, and the whole matter had now to be submitted to the public.

When the chamber reassembled, the King of France referred to the contemplated operation for reducing the rate of interest payable on the public debt. The proposal came as a surprise to the public. The bonds were held by many thousands of small people, and the news made a great sensation because innumerable investors felt themselves hit, and most of the bondholders understood only that they would in future receive three francs interest instead of five.

Meanwhile the bonds had been driven up to a still higher figure, reaching 104 and 106. Each man felt himself threatened in the possession of this valuable paper, and a storm artificially raised by Villele's enemies broke out. This was increased by making enormous play of the government's statement that the former emigres should be compensated out of these savings. Vincent, the Austrian ambassador in Paris, reported that these operations would furnish the banking powers with fresh fields of gain, and that their avarice would lead them to suggest similar plans to all other governments.

The scheme met with harsh criticism in all quarters, the most devastating being contained in a report from Paris to Metternich, which concluded with the words: "The rentiers are wild with indignation, but Villele will attempt nevertheless to carry the thing through, for he is a minister quand meme." [42]

The king was so upset that he did not dare to show himself in the streets of Paris, fearing demonstrations by the small bondholders. Nevertheless, at the expense of his popularity he consistently supported the plans and intentions of his prime minister.

There were exceedingly severe critics of the role which the House of Rothschild played on this occasion. Ouvrard attacked them with special severity in his memoirs.[43] As, however, he belonged to the party which was hostile to the Rothschilds, his statements can be accepted only with reservations. There was no immediate prospect of the House of Rothschild making either profit or loss, for the proposals were carried in the lower house by a very small majority, while the members of the upper house, most of whom had strong personal interest as bondholders, rejected the proposal on July 3, at the instigation of Chateaubriand. Thus, the scheme failed.

Gentz does not seem to have been speaking so well of his friend Solomon at this time, or possibly he wanted to impress Metternich with the fact that he could assert his independence of the House of Rothschild. In any case he wrote to the chancellor on June 11, 1824: "I am secretly pleased that Villele's finance operation has not gone through. It will do no harm if that gentleman's arrogance is somewhat reduced. Besides, the scheme itself was exceedingly unjust and cruel; and France will certainly be impressed by the fact that the hundred thousand families who would have been hard hit by it owe the fortunate event entirely to the aristocratic opposition. Also there can be no harm in the coalition of big bankers having suffered a rebuff which will somewhat damp their ardor for getting new business. Everything must have a limit, and the all-powerful firms were beginning to go beyond theirs. They obviously had a fully prepared scheme for carrying through similar reductions in interest in all the principal states. It will now be as much as they can do to get out of the French scheme with a whole skin . . . and if I were Solomon Rothschild I would retire with all my millions after losing such a battle." [44]

If this remark was meant seriously, Gentz was to prove very much mistaken. It was not the habit of the Rothschilds to throw up the sponge at the first reverse. Moreover, one must be cautious in drawing conclusions from a perusal of the letters that passed between the brothers and Austrian politicians, as the letters suggest that they were inspired by unqualified devotion to the state of Austria, which would not have been consistent with their position with regard to other governments.

Carl Rothschild at Naples in particular soon realized that it would not be at all advisable for him to be regarded there merely as the agent of a foreign power. The occupation by the Austrian troops could not last forever, and it was all the more necessary for him to cultivate relations with the local authorities since he was strongly inclined to settle permanently in Naples, and to found a new branch, the fifth, of his House there.

As the king and the members of the royal family at Naples were always in need of money, Carl had several opportunities of obliging them. His constant business dealings with the finance minister, Medici, resulted in their getting on very good terms in spite of the payments to Austria. While on the one hand the Rothschilds assured Austria of their anxiety to see the state paid by Naples, Carl protested to Medici that he would do everything he possibly could to lessen the burden that Naples had to bear. The results soon became apparent; Medici began to examine and criticize the accounts sent in by Austria for the maintenance of the troops. Ficquelmont now lamented[45] the fact that the sums to be paid by Naples had not been fixed once and for all, and demanded in 1822. He suggested that in that case Medici would not have had time to examine Austria's disbursements so closely.

"The real reason," he stated in a report to Vienna, "that he is induced to increase his demands, and to make difficulties, lies in the fact that he obviously knows of the savings that we are effecting; as Rothschild is transmitting them to Vienna, we may practically assume that Medici is bound to know of them, for Rothschild's staff is in too close touch with Medici's for this to be avoided.

"It would have been better to leave this business to the quartermaster's department of the army, as was done in the case of the first occupation of Naples; in that case nobody would have known the amounts that we transmit to Vienna, and we would also have saved the charges which we pay to the House of Rothschild. Our departments send in exaggerated accounts, and I should not like to have the task of defending them. It is exceedingly annoying that the figures made up by the accounts department should be submitted to a foreign government without revision. This is the most certain way of compromising us."

It was a bold admission to state that the expeditionary force was being used to get more money out of Naples than the expenses actually incurred; but Count Ficquelmont must be given considerable credit for the fact that he opposed these exaggerated demands, and pointed out that the annual claim of 13 million ducats, sent in by Quartermaster-General Roller, was gaining for the Austrian the enmity of the whole country.[48]

The king also was forced gradually to realize that he would not much longer be able to dissociate himself from the movement that pressed for the recall of the Austrian troops, for Medici daily reminded him of what terrible burdens the occupation imposed upon the kingdom, and how his sovereignty was limited thereby. But the king feared the outbreak of another revolution; and as he did not trust his own soldiers, he attempted to recruit Swiss regiments. These negotiations came to nothing because of the expense of raising the troops.

The king then proceeded to recruit in Ireland. The brothers Rothschild had very skilfully introduced this idea to him. Great disturbances had broken out in that country as a result of the wretched conditions under which the poor peasantry, oppressed by their landlords, were living. Nathan had come into contact with an Irishman, the Irish London banker Callaghan, who thought that the British government would also be in favor of such recruiting, as it would draw off dissatisfied and poverty-stricken elements of the population. Nathan saw the opportunity of killing three birds with one stone: he would be rendering a service to the English government by diverting a troublesome element; to the Ring of Naples by providing the neutral troops that he so much wanted; and, in addition, he would do good business for himself.

It was Nathan who, having prepared the ground in England, advised his brother Carl to make a proposal on these lines to the King of Naples.[47] He enclosed the Irishman's letter, which stated that the difficulties that might previously have been put in the way of such a scheme had disappeared, now a new government had come into power. Callaghan stated emphatically that the overpopulation of Ireland, where it was scarcely possible to keep body and soul together, was at the root of all the trouble, and that it was positively desirable that some of the population should emigrate.

Carl Rothschild handed the letter to the minister Medici, telling him of Nathan's proposal. Medici hastened to inform the king of both these facts, the king's one wish being to have at last some sense of security.

Shortly afterwards King Ferdinand fell ill, and died on January 4, 1825. He was succeeded by Francis I, who was personally no less frivolous and extravagant than his predecessor, and was far from possessing a strong character. Under his rule the state of the kingdom tended to get worse rather than to improve. He too had reason to feel anxious about his personal safety, and in 1825 it was decided to recruit four Swiss regiments for Naples, and the Irish project was discarded. The incident illustrates how the Rothschilds would apply their energies in the most varied spheres, if there were any prospect of rendering a service to those in power, and incidentally filling their own pockets.

Meanwhile James was actively engaged in negotiations in Paris for a new Spanish loan, which the Madrid government wanted to put through at any price. Busy though he was, he contrived to steal time to make a journey to Frankfort in early July, 1824, in order to marry his nineteen-year-old niece Betty, the daughter of Solomon. He was acting in accordance with the wish of his dead father - which had come to be regarded in the family as an unwritten law—that the sons should refrain as far as possible from introducing other families into their circle by marriage, and should in no circumstances marry a Christian.

Even on this journey James took with him private letters and dispatches reporting on the situation in France, from the Austrian ambassador to Prince Metternich, who was staying at his country place, Johannesberg. Forgoing his honeymoon, immediately after the marriage, James had to return to Paris as his brothers Carl and Solomon were there, carrying on discussions with the Spanish negotiators.

The three brothers decided that one of them should go to Nathan in London with a Spanish plenipotentiary, and ask him to try to persuade the House of Baring to participate in the loan. The Rothschilds, however, demanded that the seventy-two millions which Spain owed to France for her intervention should be included in the loan; to this proposal the Spanish government raised objections. As the Rothschilds in any case had little confidence in Spanish conditions, and tried in vain to secure a guarantee from other powers, the negotiations on this occasion also came to nothing.

On September 16, 1824, King Louis XVIII died. His brother, the former leader of the conservatives, succeeded to the throne as Charles X. He was already sixty-seven years old, and firmly convinced of the necessity of still more definite reactionary measures, as well as being full of religious intolerance. Villele remained in office for the time being, so that as far as the Rothschilds were concerned, there was no immediate change in the political and financial situation in France.

During this period their business expanded in all directions; Nathan founded a big insurance company in England, the Alliance Insurance Company; Amschel was collaborating with Bethmann, Gontard, and Brentano in a scheme for founding a bank at Frankfort, although through the opposition of the senate it came to nothing.

As the Rothschilds' business expanded, their correspondence naturally became more voluminous, and they found it necessary strongly to reinforce the system of couriers with which they had covered Europe. This circumstance entailed a consideration of the question whether their correspondence could be more closely watched.

In this connection the suggestion made by a Milan postmaster is illuminating. "I have often noticed," he reported to Vienna,[48] "that the Rothschild clerks who travel as couriers from Naples to Paris about once or twice a month take with them all the dispatches of the French, English, and Spanish ministers, accredited in Naples, Rome, and Florence. In addition to this not inconsiderable correspondence, they also deal with the communications passing between the courts of Naples and Rome and their legations at Turin, Paris, London, Madrid, Lisbon, etc., as well as all private letters that are of any importance.

"These couriers travel via Piacenza. As we have an Austrian garrison there, under the command of the reliable Colonel Eberl, it might perhaps not be impossible to induce one or another of these clerks to hand over their dispatches for our perusal. Such an examination should yield profitable results, especially if we wait for a favorable or important moment. A room at Piacenza under the protection of Austrian soldiers would be all that we should want in order to do everything necessary without attracting attention."

Since diplomatic correspondence was involved, this proposal concerned the chancellor, and was duly brought to Metternich's notice. He felt that it would be awkward to accept the suggestion. The scheme could turn out to be a double-edged weapon, as he himself often made use of the Rothschild couriers, and matters of the greatest secrecy might come to the knowledge of a subordinate postal official. On the other hand, Metternich would have been exceedingly glad to get hold of the private correspondence between the brothers Rothschild and, as the technical term went, to submit it to "manipulation."

The result of these considerations was the issue of the following order: "The couriers of the House of Rothschild passing through Lombardy on their way from Paris to Naples, or from Naples to Paris are, when carrying dispatches bearing the seal of the I. and R. Consulates-General in those cities, to be regarded and treated as official couriers; if, however, they should be found carrying any letters which have nothing to indicate that they are of an official nature, such letters shall be subject to the usual regulations in force."[49]

Hormayr, the former director of the Vienna State Archives, who had been banished because of his association with the Archduke Johann in his venture for founding the so-called "Alpine Kingdom," was a bitter enemy of Metternich and the emperor. He was thoroughly familiar with the manner in which correspondence was tampered with, and used this knowledge for making a violent attack upon Metternich and Solomon Rothschild. He even went so far as to state[50] that Metternich had, in agreement with Solomon, waited at Fischamend, two stages from Vienna, for a post bearing important news from Constantinople, and held it up for two days.

"This was done to gain time in order to have two or three days to rig the market, and to make some hundreds of thousands for the chancellor, Zichy, and the rest of the pack of thieves, with the German fortress caretaker[50a] Rothschild, the King of the Jews and the Jew of Kings, at their head."

As far as Metternich's relations with Rothschild were concerned, these exceedingly offensive allegations were far from the facts; but it certainly was possible, through holding back news received by courier, to gain time for profitable deals on the exchange, and this was no doubt done.

The firm of Rothschild, which had now literally attained world-wide dimensions, was to enter upon a difficult period. The long years of peace which England was enjoying led that country to seek profitable investment for the enormously increased wealth which it had acquired since the successful termination of the Napoleonic wars. There was also an increasing tendency to unsound speculation, and a flood of new flotations. As the Central and South American republics freed themselves of Spanish dominion, they seemed to offer desirable opportunities for doing business in agricultural produce and mines.

At the end of 1824. there was feverish activity in the City. Companies sprang up like mushrooms, and millions of pounds in cash were subscribed. Almost all the principal London firms took part in this movement;[51] but the Barings and Rothschild, who regarded it as unnatural and artificial, held aloof. The year 1825 proved that they were right. The South American mining ventures collapsed, and numerous undertakings apparently on a solid foundation experienced the same fate, in a crisis that was becoming more and more general, and was spreading from London to the whole of Europe. Consols fell appreciably, and foreign public securities threatened to follow their example.

In these difficult circumstances, Wellington remembered the signal services Nathan had once rendered to him under the much more dangerous conditions of war. He consulted him as to how the crisis should be met, and Lord Liverpool's government followed Nathan's advice.

Nathan had intended to go to Paris to meet Metternich, who was staying there in 1825, but in view of the critical economic situation, he could not think of leaving London, and wrote the following letter to Metternich:

"It has been my daily endeavor to travel to Paris, in order to express to you the gratitude I owe for the gracious and fatherly kindness which your Highness has shown to the Rothschild family for so many years. The date of my journey was actually fixed, but an entirely unexpected event unfortunately frustrated my intentions. The British funds, which had reached a very high level, have fallen rapidly, because of incorrect inferences drawn by the English from the meeting of sovereigns. I am accordingly forced to remain here to prevent if possible any further fall, the government being unwilling that I should be absent at this time.

"I hope your Highness will not misinterpret my absence, and will appreciate the obvious urgency of the matter which detains me . . . since, if a further fall in the funds is not speedily checked, the movement will spread abroad, and even affect the I. and R. Austrian funds. Nevertheless I cherish the hope that financial circles here will soon regain their confidence, and am looking forward to making the journey then, and waiting personally upon your Highness. Meanwhile I beg that your Highness will graciously accept my written expressions of thanks in the spirit in which they are offered, as proceeding direct from my heart, for I pray constantly to the Almighty that our beloved sovereign emperor may long be spared, and that your Highness may flourish."[52]

Thanks to Nathan's skill, the developments in England did not result in excessively serious losses to the House of Rothschild, in spite of the crisis through which that country passed, but the firm was severely affected indirectly by the commercial crisis in Paris. In spite of the change in the general situation, the French minister Villele had adhered to his conversion scheme, and although the Rothschilds were much less enthusiastic about it than they had been a year ago, James was so closely bound up with the French minister that when Villele took the scheme up again in May, 1825, he could not stand entirely aloof.

He certainly did not conceal his misgivings. While Metternich was in Paris, James openly said to him that it was wrong of Villele to resume the operation at that time.[53] James was more explicit in the following statement to the Austrian ambassador, Baron von Vincent: "There are times when such an operation may be opportune. Last year the finance minister was assured of the success of his scheme; he was supported by powerful firms, and a large volume of English money was available for investment in France, but now it is flowing into other channels. The return of the capital sums that find their way to America is only partial, and much slower. Most of the banking operations in Europe are not carried through on a cash basis, but this is not the case in America. The . . . operations of Mr. Huchinson in England are moreover exactly contrary to those of M. de Villele. When one also considers the constant complaints in the press which bring the measures proposed by the ministry into bad odor, one cannot but fear that it will find itself deprived of the necessary resources."[54]

Villele, however, was not to be restrained. He succeeded this time in carrying his proposals in the upper chamber as well, and he proceeded to put his long-cherished plans into operation. The Rothschilds could not exclude themselves from the scheme, but they went into it very cautiously. The Paris market was reacting to the fall in prices in England, and as success was largely dependent upon a boom in French securities, the prospects were far from propitious.

James remarked to Vincent on July 7, that it was a long time since he had seen the Paris market so dull. He shared the antagonism of a certain party toward M. de Villele, and he said it was certainly not his fault that the House of Rothschild was regarded as seriously compromised in having supported the government.[55] This was a dig at Nathan, because James was a little jealous of Nathan's outstanding reputation.

The difficulties of the whole undertaking were increased through the public opposition of the authorities at the Bank of France. This was shown in the fact that they suddenly demanded the repayment of considerable sums advanced by the bank to the treasury. James was, however, not altogether confident that he was right in taking up an attitude opposed to the operation. The matter might succeed in the end, and in that case James would have suffered a humiliating reverse. He accordingly thought it advisable to say[56] to Vincent as early as June 8, that in spite of the bank's hostility to Villele and to the House of Rothschild, matters could still be arranged, and Villele's plan would yet succeed.

Somewhat later, after the chambers had accepted the draft bills, James for a time saw everything in glowing colors, and wrote a letter to Metternich expressing his changed views :[57] "You may now be assured that Villele has won his case. The bonds will be a great success, and he will defeat all his opponents because he is right."

On June 18, Solomon, who was also staying in Paris, made the following statement: "I am now able to say that notwithstanding all the vigorous attacks to which M. de Villele has been subjected hitherto, and is still being subjected, in my view, his financial scheme will go through; and the count, who enjoys his Majesty's confidence to an exceptional degree, will be strengthened in his position; while the enemies of peace and of the ministry will be deprived for a long time yet of the pleasure of seeing it fall."[58]

Metternich condemned this remarkable change of opinion with the remark: "In Paris Rothschild said to me that Villele was wrong. It is often so with the world's judgment."[59]

James's first view had really been the right one. The general financial situation throughout the world did not in fact admit of such an operation's being carried through at that time. The government succeeded only in converting 30 millions to 3% bonds, and these quickly fell from 75 to 62 and 63.

Four of the Rothschild brothers—Nathan alone was absent—were assembled in Paris in August to take counsel regarding the steps to be taken to limit the loss resulting from the decline in the 3% bonds. They admitted[60] that they had not reckoned with the possibility of such an unexpectedly sudden fall. The four brothers finally went to consult the family oracle Nathan, in London, with a view to taking energetic measures to save the situation. Villele's conversion scheme, however, could not be improved in any essential now. Even the 5% bonds were quoted some points under par at the end of the year. All they could hope to do was to limit their losses, and in this they succeeded to a certain extent; but the whole affair was an unfortunate piece of business.

In other, more distant fields also, the Rothschilds had not been over-lucky in their investments during that year. After several fruitless attempts at reconquering Haiti, the second largest island of the Antilles, it had to be surrendered by France, on the payment of an indemnity of 150,000,000 francs by the new republican government. This government borrowed the necessary money, the loans being taken up by a French syndicate, including Rothschild and Laffitte. The Republic of Haiti was never able to meet its obligations; and even though the French government eventually indemnified the two firms for their losses, the transaction had to be put down as unprofitable.

Whether the brothers Rothschild were fortunate or unfortunate in their dealings, their names were on everybody's lips; legends gathered around their activities and their wealth, and they were accredited with the most fabulous schemes by the general public. Thus the story gained currency in Austria that Rothschild had one day demanded the immediate repayment in convention coinage, of no less than 40 million gulden which he had lent the state. On being told that it was impossible to repay this sum, Rothschild was alleged to have proposed that he should either be handed over the whole customs revenue throughout the imperial dominion for a certain period, or be granted the monopoly of the purchase of fleece in the Austrian dominions, whereby he would have been able to dictate the price of textiles. Although these rumors were obviously untrue, they indicated the estimation of the power of the House held by the public, whether it was well or ill disposed.

The Rothschilds were becoming the central figures in the jokes and caricatures of comic papers. In 1825 a caricature making fun of their versatility was circulated in Frankfort and South Germany. The drawing showed a Rothschild on horseback, with samples of all his businesses; wine-casks, seeds, buttons, etchings, state securities, umbrellas, pens, magic lanterns, etc., on his way from the north to the south of Europe. The easily interpreted legend ran: "Blueshield, commercial traveler, does business in all branches of trade."[61]

The brothers did in fact engage in every conceivable kind of venture, and they were approached with all sorts of schemes. Persons in high places especially had recourse to them for loans. Among them was Marshal de Marmont, Duke of Ragusa, formerly governor in Illyria under Napoleon I. He had joined the Bourbons after Napoleon's fall, and got on good terms with Metternich. As a reward for his change of allegiance and various political services, he was granted an annuity of fifty thousand francs by the Austrian government, in alleged compensation for a donation allotted to him by Napoleon I. The marshal had again got into serious financial difficulties, and the French government, which did not wish him to be publicly compromised, advised him to mortgage his Austrian annuity to Rothschild if the banker would put his affairs in order.

The duke did apply to Solomon Rothschild, but Solomon wanted first to make sure that the Austrian government would actually pay Marmont the annuity until he died. He therefore wrote to Metternich: "I would not have entered into any negotiations in this matter without having previously asked your Highness's consent, had I not done so at the suggestion of Count de Villele. ... I am therefore venturing to ask your Highness in this most humble private letter, whether the assumption of these negotiations or their continuance is in accordance with your Highness's wishes. Will your Highness please to be assured that on receipt of the slightest hint of the contrary being the case, all negotiations will immediately be broken off, and in such a way that neither Count de Villele nor the Duke of Ragusa will discover the true reason of the change."[62]

Marmont also wrote to Metternich in order to get his support.[63] The chancellor replied cautiously.[64] He thought that the treasury would no doubt simply pay the annuity to Rothschild; but the finance minister would have to be asked for a special guarantee to that effect. Everything would be simple, "as long as the respective positions of the persons concerned remained the same."

This was rather a dangerous reply, and Solomon wanted to have various, and, as Marmont called them, "ridiculous" guarantees.[65] Rothschild, however, firmly adhered to the position that the Austrian government must give her full expressed consent to the arrangement, if he entered into it.

"I am fully aware," Marmont wrote, "that this requirement is not flattering to me, and that the only motive for making it is to obtain guarantees against the possibility of my mauvaise foi." But for fear of endangering the arrangement, he had to agree.

In November, 1825, the contract was submitted, constituting a speculation on the part of Rothschild that the marshal, who was fifty years old, would live a long time. Metternich, however, would not agree that Emperor Francis should give his express consent, as contemplated under the contract, because it was impossible to know in the case of a former marshal of Napoleon whether his political opinions would not undergo changes such as might cause Austria to cease her payments. If, however, these payments were mortgaged to Rothschild for the full term of the marshal's life, it would not be possible to discontinue them. The contract was therefore not concluded, and in order not to rebuff Villele, James lent the marshal a small sum on the security of the next instalment of his pension.

On April 30, 1827, Solomon wrote the following letter to Metternich[66]: "Your Highness will perceive from the enclosed statement that Marshal de Marmont's affairs are in a state of the greatest confusion, and he is hard pressed by his creditors. He is bound to go bankrupt sooner or later, and in such a case our Paris branch would be a creditor to the extent of fifteen thousand francs, advanced to the marshal on the security of the personal annuity payable to him by the imperial government. There is only one way in which my firm can be secured against possible loss, and that is by impounding the two next instalments of this annuity. I therefore venture most humbly to request your Highness to issue the necessary authorization for the I. and R. Treasury to instruct the paymaster's office to accept a veto from me, in the usual form, upon the instalment of the pension now due and upon that due next quarter in so far as this may be necessary to cover our claim."

It was asking a good deal to expect the powerful Austrian chancellor to concern himself with securing a pay ment of 15,000 francs to the House of Rothschild. But Solomon was in a position to take this liberty, since Metternich himself was again negotiating a personal loan with the firm; and in fact on June 1, 1827, the prince received a loan of half a million gulden from the Rothschilds.

The failure of the conversion operation necessarily damped the Rothschilds' ardor with regard to any other ventures, the consequences of which could not be clearly foreseen. The situation in Spain was exceedingly critical, and the lack of money was being acutely felt. In ignorance of the way in which the conversion scheme was working out, the Rothschild representative at Madrid had been somewhat rash in making promises to the Spaniards.

"The financial problem [in Spain]," Vincent reported to Metternich,[67] "is now in the hands of the House of Rothschild, all of whose members are just now in London. It seems to me that M. Renevier, the manager of the Madrid branch, has gone rather too far in what he has said to the Spanish government. The House of Rothschild will not enter into business negotiations with Spain without having made previous inquiries in England, and assured themselves of the probable attitude of bankers there with regard to assistance rendered to Spain, for such a loan might damage the loans made to the South American governments which are in rebellion against that country."

When James Rothschild returned from London in the middle of September, 1825, after spending five weeks there with his four brothers, he was assailed by questions from all sides as to whether Spain had any prospect of securing a loan of 25 millions. Nathan had advised against it because for political reasons he did not wish the reactionary Spanish government to be supported. Metternich on the other hand would have been pleased by the granting of a loan, and desired it to go through.

"So far as I have been able to ascertain," Vincent reported to the chancellor,[68] "the House of Rothschild is not much inclined to have anything to do with a financial venture in Spain. They have little confidence in the guarantees offered by the government, and they are afraid of damaging themselves with English firms having interests opposed to those of Spain. Although the House of Rothschild may pretend that their sympathies are purely monarchistic, the recognition of the engagements entered into by the Cortes government, and the liberation of the Spanish colonies, would provide a far wider field for enterprise and political securities, the value of which they do not fail to appreciate."

The House of Rothschild could well be discriminating. Offers of business from governing circles flowed in on them from all quarters. Carl Rothschild had met Count Louis Philippe de Bombelles in connection with some payments which he was instructed by the Austrian government to make on the Neapolitan account for the passage of Austrian troops through Tuscany. Although large sums were involved the matter was promptly settled, and the Tuscan government gave him to understand that it would take the opportunity of demonstrating its satisfaction.

Grand Duke Leopold II, who had been ruler of Tuscany since 1824, was at that time considering a scheme of great benefit to his subjects, namely, to drain the Maremme, an area of marsh land in Tuscany embracing thousands of square miles. The grand duke proposed to Carl Rothschild through Bombelles that he should undertake a part of the drainage operation on his own account, subject to a suitable arrangement with the state of Tuscany. Such was the esteem in which the House was then held for its versatility and financial resources.

Carl Rothschild did not feel that he could undertake such a far-reaching scheme. "Would it not be better," he replied to Bombelles,[69] "if the Tuscan government which has conceived such benevolent plans for their subjects, would itself supervise the carrying out of the scheme with the assistance of a loan to be taken up gradually as the work progressed? Such a method of procedure seems to me to be more advantageous than to entrust the work to foreigners who do not know the country, and who would be compelled at great expense first to find and engage workmen."

These discussions took place in August, 1825, a most unfavorable time for persuading the Rothschilds, who were uneasy at their losses, to agree to such a serious undertaking. The scheme nevertheless was carried through, and the firm took some part in financing it, although it had nothing to do with the work itself. It proved to be an inestimable boon to the country, although the work took very many years to carry out, and cost untold millions.

The relations of the House of Rothschild with Metternich had remained untroubled throughout the year 1825; and the Rothschilds actually ventured to intercede with the chancellor regarding the affairs of certain members of Napoleon's family. Toward these Metternich was in general anything but well disposed, and was always inclined to put the greatest difficulties in their way. Napoleon's mother, the aged Laetitia, who was then seventy-five years old, lived at Rome, and dearly wished to see again her eldest son Joseph, the former King of Spain, who was living in North America under the pseudonym of Count de Survilliers. Mother and son had not seen one another for ten years. Joseph had repeatedly attempted to get a passport, but the Austrian and French governments would not permit him to return to Europe. All entreaties had hitherto been in vain, and a friend of the family, Count Villeneuve, approached Solomon Rothschild, asking him to use his influence with Metternich, because the old lady was ill, and Joseph promised to return to America immediately after his visit. The world had indeed passed through great changes during the previous ten years when the son of a despised Frankfort tradesman was asked to intercede on behalf of the man who was once deemed all-powerful.[70]

Metternich, however, remained obdurate. To yield would not have been in accordance with the general principies of his policy. The House of Bonaparte was finished with, should remain finished with, and never be allowed to become dangerous to Metternich's system again. For this reason even the smallest favor was refused to the family; Rothschild was not listened to, and had to realize the limits of his influence. Although when interference with his policy was involved Metternich might remain absolutely firm, he often gave the House of Rothschild much too much rope in matters of finance; and in such instances he relied upon the finance minister and the treasury.

An accident has revealed the details of a transaction which clearly shows that Metternich and his assistants sometimes went too far in their reliance on the Rothschilds; and an examination of this incident offers an opportunity of noting the treasury's own comments on its mistakes and on the loss involved, which, it should be pointed out, was incurred under Count Stadion's successor.

Since the first Austrian occupation of Naples in 1815, the kingdom had had to pay a war indemnity. Since the end of 1818, it had been the duty of the Austrian ambassador at Naples, Prince Ludwig de Jablonovski, to receive the instalments as they were paid in each month, and, in connection with a banking syndicate controlled by the Neapolitan firm Dollfuss, to arrange for their transmission to Vienna. Everything went well at the start, but the bill for the second instalment was protested in Vienna, because the firm of Dollfuss was in difficulties a Dollfuss reported this fact to Jablonovski in January, 1819, but the ambassador had already received the orders on the Neapolitan Treasury for the following instalments up to March and drawn these sums in advance. Jablonovski was now in danger of losing this money, and was forced to accept a very unfavorable settlement offered by the firm of Dollfuss, under which they handed him public securities, for the sum they held, at 87, the price at which they had bought them, although these securities had by then fallen to 78. Jablonovski hoped that they would appreciate again, so that he would avoid any loss.

"The power," Jablonovski remarked later, "which autocratically governs quotations throughout Europe, so that the most careful calculations go astray, the autocratic power of the House of Rothschild was a factor of which I was not then aware."[71]

Jablonovski had miscalculated. The bonds continued to fall, and the prince was unable to make the payments to Vienna on the due dates, because he felt he could not sell the bonds at such a loss. He therefore mortgaged them at 60% in order to be able to send at any rate part of the money, and still hoped that they would appreciate. Later on, however, the remittances to Vienna ceased altogether. This greatly annoyed and worried Stadion, who needed the money. As an imperial ambassador, who was under Metternich's orders, was affected, Stadion complained to the chancellor, and Metternich had to try to think of a way out. Again he had recourse to the brothers Rothschild, a constant refuge in distress. It was in the summer of 1819, and James and Carl had just come to Vienna from Naples. They had informed themselves as to conditions there, reported to Prince Metternich and been commissioned by him[72] to undertake the transmission of Austria's outstanding claims in Naples.

Rothschild stated that he would be delighted to carry the matter through in collaboration with Gontard at the "most favorable possible rates," and asked for 1/2% commission and 1/2% brokerage. "You may be assured," his offer concluded,[73] "that we shall do everything in our power to carry out your commands with all the diligence and economy of which we are capable, so that we shall continue to justify the confidence which you place in us." The matter was accordingly entrusted to them.

Prince Jablonovski had not yet been told anything about the negotiations with Rothschild, and he was exceedingly upset when he was suddenly instructed to hand the business over. He expressed his astonishment, especially in view of the fact that he had meanwhile arranged a solution of the matter with the finance minister Medici by direct shipments of gold to Trieste.[74] "But," he wrote, "Herr James Rothschild was in Naples, and presumably heard of my unfortunate dealings with the firm of Dollfuss, and determined to turn them to his own advantage. Nothing else can explain how the House of Rothschild should have taken over such an unimportant business in a center with which they are not familiar, where the rate of exchange is constantly varying and unfavorable, or how they could have persuaded the I. and R. Treasury to renounce the advantages of transporting gold, and to bear the considerable loss of exchange."

In any case the matter was taken out of Jablonovski's hands, and his suggestion that further payments should be deferred until the Neapolitan bonds rose again was ignored. In January, 1820, Jablonovski received instructions to hand over all documents regarding the matter to a controller specially sent to Naples for this purpose. In July, 1820, the revolution broke out, and in the spring of 1821 the Austrian troops entered Naples. The immediate effect of these events upon the bonds was unfavorable, and they fell continuously until May, 1821. The result was that Stadion, who was always liable to sudden panics, hastily gave instructions that the bonds which had been mortgaged at 60% should be sold to Rothschild, and this was done in May, 1821, at the lowest point which they touched, namely 58 1/8.

The following year saw an extraordinary rise in Neapolitan securities, so that it may be readily imagined that the House of Rothschild made an enormous profit out of this purchase. This became particularly apparent when in August, 1827, the new finance minister Count Nadasdy, after going through these accounts, declared that Prince Jablonovski was liable to make good an amount of 584,-354.54 florins, and created a charge over his property at Rogozno for this amount.

The prince protested strongly with the result that an imperial commission was appointed to investigate the matter. This investigation led to some lamentable revelations as far as Austrian public finances were concerned. The "most obedient loyal servant Count von Taaffe," president of the treasury, had some utterly devastating statements to make in his most submissive report[75] regarding the treasury's claims on the prince. He revealed that the transaction had been most unprofitable in every way, and declared that Prince Jablonovski's statement that it would have been better for him and for the treasury to have burned the certificates of the mortgage bonds, and rid himself of them completely, was correct, harsh though it sounded. For as the bonds[76] had been mortgaged for 60, and had later been transferred to Rothschild at 58 1/8, the Austrian state had not merely failed to receive anything further, but had actually had to make up the difference. Jablonovski's proposal to hold the bonds, and wait until they improved in value before realizing them, had been a sound business speculation. Instead of this they had been handed over to the House of Rothschild, together with the interest payments for the first half of the year 1828.

On this memorandum an imperial instruction was issued, ordering the finance minister to examine the accounts again in collaboration with Prince Jablonovski, and if the results showed that any added compensation had to be paid, to take the necessary steps to collect the amount as speedily as possible. The fianance minister carried out these instructions; and the report on the matter concluded with the following words: "The assessor appointed for the investigation is of the opinion that, although there is in a general way ... an obligation on the prince to make good the amount, the claim could be effectively resisted in the courts or otherwise. For we are not at all likely to succeed in replying to an order to show cause, such as will necessarily be granted if the charge created [on the prince's property] is not canceled."

The result of the further examination was that instead of being held liable for the amount of more than half a million florins, the prince was finally required to pay only 10,694 florins 34 kronen, in order that the complete failure of the treasury might be somewhat concealed from the outside world.

The facts which had thus been brought to light also gave the chancellor food for thought, and he afterwards observed a certain amount of caution in his relations with the House of Rothschild. They availed themselves of every occasion to make the sovereign and the leading statesmen forget such untoward occurrences, and endeavored to obliterate the bad impression by giving proof of their deepest devotion. This was especially the case when Emperor Francis fell ill in the spring of 1826, recovering only after many weeks of sickness. The whole of Europe had been in suspense, for the decease of the emperor would have involved profound political changes; and the news of his recovery offered an opportunity for the brothers Rothschild to send their congratulations to Metternich. It is true that they little guessed how cleverly he had provided for the continuance of his control of affairs, even in the event of Emperor Francis's death. It will suffice to quote the letter which Amschel wrote from Frankfort:

I have by today's post received the news of the fortunate recovery of his Majesty our universally beloved emperor. Having suffered the greatest anxiety since the emperor fell sick it was one of the most joyful moments of my life when I heard the news.

Heaven has heard our prayers in preserving the greatest and most virtuous of monarchs, and thus allowing the world to continue to enjoy a good fortune, the greatness of which I can but marvel at without venturing to appraise. It is impossible to describe the radiant joy that lights up all faces—only angels could express in words our feelings of gratitude to Providence!

I cannot refrain from expressing to your Highness my congratulations on this blessed event. I would gladly make so bold as to lay my congratulations at the feet of his Majesty himself, our most benevolent emperor—so sincere and overwhelming are my feelings. May God preserve in full health this best father of mankind until the end of his days! And may it ever be my fortune in deepest reverence to call myself your Highness's most humble and most obedient servant,
AMSCHEL MEYER VON ROTHSCHILD. [77]

Now that the emperor had recovered, the fear that his death would deal a blow to Metternich's regime, and therefore also to the position which the brothers Rothschild had established in the I. and R. chancellor's office, was again remote. Solomon, who through Metternich and Gentz was constantly winning his way in Viennese court circles, was frequently invited to the chancellor's and also often entertained him in his own house.
One after another, families of the high aristocracy, requiring financial assistance, procured loans from the Frankfort banker who had settled at Vienna. In this way he placed many aristocrats under an obligation to himself, and whether they liked it or not they had to admit Solomon and his family to their exclusive salons. Thus both socially and in business Solomon climbed to dizzy heights at Vienna, and his commercial rivals began to become painfully aware of this, especially during the years of financial crisis of 1825 and 1826.
The firm Fries & Co., one of the four "monopolistic state bankers" which had come into prominence during the reign of Maria Theresa, had got into difficulties during the crisis of 1825. David Parish, a son of the well-known John Parish of Hamburg, and Rothschild's partner in numerous transactions, had entered the firm some time previously, and was now involved in its fall Parish's extravagance and reckless speculation hac caused him to be excluded from a partnership in his father's business, and he had set up on his own account. Being unable to meet his liabilities he had no other course open but to require his most powerful patrons such as Metternich and Gentz, who were at the same time his debtors, to repay their loans. He thus forfeited their favor, though he could not save his firm from ruin.

When he saw that the crash was inevitable Parish put an end to his life by jumping into the Danube; but before doing so he wrote two bitter letters expressing his resentment at the fact that the House of Rothschild had elbowed him out of many transactions. He blamed Metternich for having sacrificed him to the cupidity of a family who had succeeded better than he had in securing the chancellor's interest. He described the brothers Rothschild in a letter to Metternich as "heartless persons, only interested in their money-bags, who, standing under the special protection of Metternich, have behaved in a most ungrateful manner to him."[78]

Just before his death, Parish also wrote to Solomon Rothschild, reproaching him for having squeezed him out, although he had in 1817 introduced him to the big French and Austrian financial business. Now it has been ascertained that the Rothschilds would have succeeded in establishing this connection even without Parish, and that he invited them to join in several transactions simply because he was not sufficiently rich and powerful to carry through these great state financial operations alone.

On the other hand there is no doubt that the brothers Rothschild were entirely ruthless in competing with the firm of Fries and Parish, and that they succeeded as no one else did in consolidating their position with the public departments. In any case, Solomon neither desired nor expected that the rivalry should have such a tragic ending, and he was not a little shocked by it. He spent many hours discussing the tragedy with Metternich and Gentz, in its various aspects.

Two rivals had been disposed of, but life went on its course, and it appeared desirable to wipe out their memory, and to anticipate evil tongues by cleverly giving publicity to news regarding the fame, the business dealings, and the prestige of the House of Rothschild. The brothers had long recognized that good advertisement, which owing to the limitations of the time had to be of a literary nature, could be of the greatest value. Through their influence with the authorities, who were able to use the power of the censorship in order more or less to restrain press activities in all countries, they had little to fear from violent attacks in the press; and if any such occurred, they were almost always able to take effective countermeasures. Moreover, they had ample means at their disposal for influencing cowardly papers, and pressing the cleverest pens into their service.

First and foremost there was Gentz, the "Secretary of Europe." He had for a long time been writing propaganda articles for the Rothschilds in various papers, and exerting his influence—backed as it was by the powerful figure of Metternich looming behind him—upon the contemporary press in their favor. Gentz's growing intimacy with the House of Rothschild, which was marked by constant invitations to dinners and theatres, as well as by "highly welcome financial transactions with the excellent Rothschild," as faithfully recorded by Gentz,[79] gave a chance for carrying out a master-stroke of publicity.

In 1826 the Brockhaus publishing firm was just about to publish a new edition of its Conversational Encyclopedia, which had a very wide circulation at that time, and was regarded as an absolute gospel. The Rothschilds had not yet been featured in it, and it seemed to offer a convenient opportunity for describing the origin and progress of their House.

There was nobody better qualified to execute this, as regarded both manner and matter, than Gentz. Solomon Rothschild accordingly requested him in return for a princely fee, to undertake the task, explaining to him the points he wished to have emphasized. He was particularly anxious that the relationship with the Elector of Hesse should be described in such a way as to convey the impression that the whole of his enormous fortune had been entrusted to the management of the House of Rothschild; and that they had succeeded in saving it by risking all their possessions. Special emphasis was to be laid upon their integrity and disinterestedness, and the firm was to be described as more powerful than any contemporary firm, all the titles and dignities that the five brothers had acquired in the course of time being enumerated.

During the first week of April, 1826, Gentz wrote an essay entitled "Biographical Notes about the House of Rothschild," which was to serve as the basis of his article in the encyclopedia. The following extracts will give an idea of the way in which Gentz carried out his task. The essay was accepted at its face value by very large numbers of people, and after appearing in the Brockhaus publication was incorporated into similar foreign works, as for instance Encyclopedic des gens du monde. The article ran:

The Rothschilds, at the present time the greatest of all business firms, are among those who have achieved greatness and prosperity simply through intelligently taking advantage of opportunities which were available for thousands of others, through a spirit of enterprise seasoned by calm judgment, and through their understanding of men and affairs, and their capacity to adjust themselves to the conditions of the time. Meyer Amschel Rothschild, the father of the five brothers, who are now living, was the founder of this firm.... In a short space of time his knowledge, his tireless industry, and his straight dealing won for him the confidence of highly respected firms; he was given important orders, and his credit as well as his wealth increased. The relationship which Rothschild established with the Landgrave, afterwards Elector, of Hesse was a decisive factor in the enormous subsequent development of his business. The elector appointed him crown agent in 1801, having come to realize that he was as reliable as he was useful. When in 1806 the French occupied the elector's territories, and he himself was compelled to flee, he left the rescue of his private possessions to Rothschild, their value amounting to many million gulden. It was only by sacrificing the whole of his own property, and at considerable personal risk, that Rothschild contrived to save the property that had been entrusted to him.

The well-known fact that all Rothschild's possessions had been confiscated by the French led the exiled elector to believe that his own property had been lost too. In fact he does not appear to have thought it even worth while to make inquiries about it. When matters had settled down again Rothschild immediately proceeded to do business with the property he had saved. . . .

The brothers are most scrupulous in observing the injunction that their father laid upon them when he was dying, which was to collaborate in absolute brotherly harmony in ail business matters. Indeed they treat the memory of their father with such piety that they refer to him in all important business matters, and Nathan generally applies to doubtful cases a rule his father recommended.

When the elector returned to his states in 1813, the House of Rothschild not merely offered immediately to return to him the capital sums with which it had been entrusted, it also undertook to pay the customary rate of interest from the day when it had received them. The elector, positively astonished by such an example of honesty and fair dealing, left the whole of his capital for several more years with the firm, and refused any interest payments for the earlier period, only accepting a small interest from the time of his return. Through recommending the House of Rothschild, especially at the Congress of Vienna, the elector certainly assisted greatly in extending their connections, until now as the result of the political developments since 1813 the House has, through an uninterrupted series of great transactions, attained the position it at present holds in the commercial and financial affairs of Europe, which are partly directed by it. . . .

Students of economics and politics have no doubt frequently wondered how the House of Rothschild has been able to achieve so much in so short a time. Leaving the effects of chance out of account, its success is attributable principally to the strictest observance of certain fundamental maxims, together with wise business management, and the exploitation of favorable opportunities. The principal maxim is harmonious collaboration in all business matters, to which reference has already been made.

After their father's death every offer, whatsoever its origin might be, was made the subject of joint discussion between the brothers; any transaction of any importance at all was carried through according to a concerted plan by their joint endeavors, and all the brothers had an equal share in the result. They continued to act in close agreement, in spite of the fact that they gradually settled in places far removed from one another. This circumstance, indeed, instead of interfering with their collaboration, has proved an actual advantage; it has enabled them to obtain the fullest information as to the state of affairs in the principal markets, so that each of them can from his own center the more effectively take the preliminary steps in any business. The firm as a whole then takes it over and carries it through.

Another of the principles which the Rothschilds have adopted is to keep moving, and not allow themselves to become enmeshed by circumstances. . . .

Finally it should be noted that, apart from the reasonableness of their demands, the punctiliousness with which they carry out their duties, the simplicity and clarity of their schemes, and the intelligent way in which they are put into operation, the personal moral character of each of the five brothers has been a determining factor in the success of their undertakings. It is not difficult for those whose power enables them to attach large numbers to their interests, to secure the backing of a powerful party; but to unite the support of all parties and, in the popular phrase, to win the esteem of gentle and simple, implies the possession not merely of material resources, but also of spiritual qualities not always found in association with wealth and power. Ever ready to lend a helping hand, without distinction of person, to those who have come to them for assistance, all of the five brothers have achieved a real popularity. They have rendered the most important services in such a manner as to make them most acceptable, for they have been actuated not by considerations of policy but by natural benevolence and kindness.[80]

This eulogy of the Rothschilds was a masterpiece executed by a clever stylist; it was bound to raise the prestige of the House enormously, especially in the opinion of those who did not know how it came to be written. Then as now the great mass of the unthinking public accepted anything in print at its face value, and as the article, while containing statements that were untrue, did contain much that was the result of accurate observation, and attributed excellencies that were not fictitious, even the more critical were inclined to give credence to the description.

It was not signed by Gentz, although it is true he admitted to being the author, at any rate in conversation with his friends. Indeed he actually asked Adam Muller to express his opinion on it. "I should be glad," he wrote,[81] "if you would read the article on Rothschild in the supplement of the Conversational Encyclopedia. It is my work, and I have endeavored to give briefly a simple and I hope not infelicitous explanation of the greatness of that House. I shall greatly appreciate your opinion on this little article."

Gentz was proud of his work, and as he has noted in his diary, he read it to Rothschild's manager Wertheimstein, who naturally listened to it with "undisguised admiration."[82] Ten days later Gentz called on Rothschild and received his "actual" cash reward.[83]

Apart from the great advantage which its publication brought to the brothers Rothschild, his essay contained some shrewd observations which are of general interest. One passage in particular, although not included in the Conversational Encyclopedia, may be worth quoting. "There is a truth," Gentz remarks, "which, although not quite new, is generally not properly understood. The word luck as commonly used in the history of famous individuals or eminent families is bereft of all meaning, when we endeavor to dissociate it entirely from the personal and individual factors in each case. There are circumstances and events in life in which good or ill luck may be a determining although not an exclusive factor in human destiny. Lasting success, however, and constant failure are always, and to a much greater degree than is generally supposed, attributable to the personal deserts or the personal failings and shortcomings of those who are blessed by the one or damned by the other. Nevertheless the most outstanding personal qualities may sometimes require exceptional circumstances and world-shattering events to come to fruition. Thus have the founders of dynasties established their thrones, and thus has the House of Rothschild become great."[84]

The circumstances could not have been more aptly described, for the family Rothschild of that generation did undoubtedly bring mental forces into play in a definite direction, the results which they achieved being favored by the circumstances of the time.

CHAPTER VI

The House of Rothschild Rides the Storm

THE control of the business of the House of Rothschild, established as it was in five different centers in Europe, had become exceedingly difficult with the passage of time as a result of the enormous extension of its operations and their intimate interactions with the events of general European politics. It is true that Nathan quietly exerted an influence that tended to harmonize the often conflicting aims of the various branches; but on account of the primitive nature of the communication at that time, and the inadequate postal arrangements, it was impossible, in spite of all the efforts he made, for him to supervise everything.

The result was that each brother had a fairly wide scope within his own center, it being left entirely to his own judgment within certain limits to do what he considered best in the interests of the firm as a whole. Between Vienna, Frankfort, Paris, and London, these places being linked up on the main European routes, communication was easier. It was just the least gifted of the brothers, Carl, who was practically isolated from the others at Naples, and therefore often had to travel personally to Paris and London in order to get into touch with his brothers.

A final solution of the problem of the Austrian troops at Naples had become urgently necessary. Since the end of the year 1822, Neapolitan statesmen had been constantly protesting that the Austrian Army of Occupation should be reduced, in view of the enormous expense of maintaining it. Memorandum after memorandum, explaining the intolerable burden and the necessity of relieving the situation, was sent in.[1] The Congress of Vienna had decided that the occupying forces should be reduced to 35,000 men; but before this decision was put into effect (August, 1824) the Austrian government had already realized savings to the extent of about 6,500,000 florins out of the sums paid by Naples.[2] This fact naturally soon leaked out and caused great dissatisfaction in the kingdom,[3] especially as a rumor was abroad that the government would shortly reduce the pay of all those in its service.

The greater part of Naples public securities was held abroad. Of the annual interest, only about two million ducats remained in the country itself, while the balance constituted a tribute that Naples had to pay to foreign capitalists. The budget suffered from the malady of a constantly growing deficit, which rose to 3,800,000 ducats in 1825. This meant that the interest on foreign debt was only slightly less than the state's annual deficit.

Count Apponyi, afterwards ambassador in Paris, had been sent to Naples by Metternich to examine the situation on the spot. "Cavaliere de' Medici," he reported,[4] "regards the presence of our troops as nothing but an intolerable burden. As finance minister he trembles at the idea that the foreign occupation may last until after 1826, and by compelling him to take refuge in another loan, still more increase the state's terrifying deficit. This caused him to say to Rothschild a few days ago: 'If the Austrian troops remain here after the limit of time fixed by the convention, I am determined to hand in my resignation.'"

Fundamentally Carl Rothschild was absolutely on the side of the finance minister. It was not in accordance with his wishes that the expenses of the occupation should lead to the whole internal economy of the state being thrown into confusion, so that the loans handled and issued by the House of Rothschild would run the risk of declining seriously in value. He began, therefore, noticeably to adopt the Neapolitan point of view, and gradually to forget to consider the interests of Austria, although he owed his position in Naples to that country.

He too favored speedy evacuation, especially as the new king, who had succeeded to the throne in January, 1825, and on whom he wanted to make a good impression, cherished the same wish. At Vienna he was actually suspected of supporting the Neapolitan finance minister in his obstinate efforts to recover part of the moneys paid out to the Austrian troops on the ground that they were excessive. The Neapolitan government was claiming the repayment of 1,013,398 ducats as excess payments made only up to November, 1821, and proposed to retain 100,000 ducats each month from the moneys payable to the Austrian war account until the adjustment should have been fully effected. Austria offered only 650,000 gulden in satisfaction, and was contemplating making deductions even from this amount. However, she was afraid of any public dispute in the matter. The quartermaster-general himself admitted in a letter to Count Nadasdy that the estimate of 650,000 florins was too low. He said that in his view it would be better to agree to the amount demanded by the Neapolitan government as a lump sum, rather than to allow the matter to be discussed in detail, as that would be too damaging to Austria.[5]

Ficquelmont also expressed his fears[6] that innumerable claims might arise, the airing of which would be unpleasant for Austria. He offered to arrange for the settlement of the matter, "without publicity and without compromising the dignity of our government," asking only that the repayments should not be made out of the resources of the I. and R. war-chest at Naples, but through the House of Rothschild. For direct repayments through the war-chest would furnish proof that savings had been effected out of the lump sums paid by Naples.

"Looking at the matter coldly and impartially," he added, "we find that we are to refund only the portion of the excess payments attributable to the period between February 1 and November 30, 1821."

But Vienna was not prepared to refund the money so quickly, and hesitated about making it available. Medici urgently needed the money, and would not wait any longer. He therefore applied to Carl Rothschild, informing him that the royal treasury required 1,500,000 ducats in excess of its normal revenue. He asked Rothschild to advance this sum, offering as partial security the claim exceeding a million ducats which had been recognized by Austria.[7]

Carl Rothschild immediately sent Medici's letter to Vienna in order to ascertain the imperial government's attitude in the matter. As, however, it was not yet inclined to give way, in spite of Ficquelmont's representations, it simply put the letter by. Nevertheless, in return for special securities in the event of Austria failing to pay, Carl Rothschild advanced 1,200,000 ducats, because he attached great value to being on good terms with Medici and the new king.

This brought him into great favor in high quarters, a fact which Carl exploited to create a position for himself in society in Naples, as his brothers had done elsewhere. During the winter of 1826 many distinguished foreigners flocked to the beautiful city of the south; amongst them were Leopold of Saxe-Coburg—afterwards King Leopold I of Belgium[8]—the Duke of Lucca, and other princes, as well as several wealthy English families. "This greatly enlivens our social gatherings," Carl said in a private letter.[9] "Amateur companies perform French plays; there are balls and soirees—in a word, in spite of everything, life is very gay. . . ."

Meanwhile, as the result of representations made by Solomon to Metternich,[10] the House of Rothschild had been informed that there was no objection to crediting to the House of Rothschild the moneys which Austria would finally refund to Naples. Their total, however, remained undefined, and as it went very much against the grain to pay these amounts at all, Metternich was somewhat annoyed that the House of Rothschild should intervene in the matter.

At the end of December, 1826, Emperor Francis and Metternich decided finally to evacuate the Two Sicilies,, although not without emphatically warning the king never to think of changing the form of government. On the occasion of the Austrians' leaving, General Frimont, the officer in command, had recommended various persons for decorations, including the finance minister Medici and Carl Rothschild. In view of the attitude adopted by both of these in the matter of the rebates, Vienna was not prepared to consider the suggestion, Metternich minuted on the proposal that Medici ought not to receive any distinction,[11] since he already possessed the Grand Cross of the Order of St. Stephen, and that Baron Rothschild should not receive one "because he is not qualified to receive the distinction suggested." This was, in effect, a reply to the new attitude which Carl Rothschild had assumed. People in Vienna were almost inclined to call him a traitor or a deserter.

The negotiations regarding the refund of the excessive payments made for the support of the army continued for some time. Austria maintained her resistance against paying in full the amount demanded, until the King of Naples finally yielded, in order not to upset the, agreement arrived at. But he wished at least to receive the interest on the excess that had been paid.

A memorandum on the matter states:[12] "The king does not doubt that the difficult circumstances in which Naples has been forced to accept her onerous obligation to the House of Rothschild will so far influence the noble heart of the emperor that he will without delay carry out at least this wish of the Court of Naples." The Austrian government was to arrange the method of payment with the House of Rothschild. This appeal, however, met with little success; Austria finally paid only 338,564 gulden, which Rothschild took over on account of his claim against Naples, and at the end of 1829 this settlement was accepted for the sake of peace.

Although, as in Carl's case, Metternich was sometimes not entirely in agreement with the attitude of the brothers Rothschild, he always came back to them again, in both public and personal matters. There was no other financier who controlled such large sums of money and such important international connections. Moreover, it had been the chancellor's experience that the strictest secrecy was observed and maintained by the Rothschilds in all transactions of a delicate nature. In that respect they were in marked contrast to most other bankers; and this was of special importance to a man in such a public position as Metternich.

Transactions constantly arose in which the financial interests of the imperial house, to which Metternich naturally always wished to prove his devotion, had to be made to harmonize with those of the state in such a way as to avoid any public criticism. The Rothschilds were particularly skilful in handling such cases, and they thereby made themselves indispensable to Austria's leading statesmen, in spite of any disagreements.

A striking example of this was furnished when Metternich had recourse to the services of the Rothschilds in connection with the financial affairs of Marie Louise, wife of Napoleon I and daughter of Emperor Francis. Although she was far superior to her husband in birth, this lady was in general character and in intellectual gifts no fit consort for the Corsican genius. She remained with him as long as fortune favored him; but when his collapse came she left him, with her son, and returned to her father without shedding a tear for her husband.

Notwithstanding Napoleon's entreaties, she never once expressed the wish to visit him at Elba, to say nothing of St. Helena, although it is true that if she had so wished, her father and, still more, Metternich would have opposed her. The chancellor wished Napoleon's memory to be completely obliterated, and he was particularly skilful in the case of Marie Louise in exploiting her weaknesses to that end. She was callous and pleasure-loving, and used to visit fashionable spas; she lived only for her own amusement and did not even trouble to answer Napoleon's letters.

In 1814, while the ex-empress was staying at Aix-les-Bains, Metternich allotted to her as courtier a man who not only played the part of courtier, but also had an important political role in Metternich's service. Adam Albert, Count von Neipperg, was a handsome man of thirty-nine; he had lost his eye through a sword-thrust in the war and wore a black eye-patch. He was a smart and elegant officer, and had the reputation of possessing unusual courage and exceptional intellectual and diplomatic gifts. It was his duty to obliterate all thoughts of Napoleon and the empire in Marie Louise's mind, and to keep her from all contact with any member of Napoleon's family or his supporters. He was to be only too successful.

The Congress of Vienna had decided that the dukedoms of Parma, Piacenza and Guastalla should belong to Marie Louise "en toute souverainete et propriete." As long as she ruled in accordance with the principles of an absolute monarchy, without constitution or representative bodies, she thereby acquired a kind of private property in these territories, by the act of the congress, this being quite in accordance with the contemporary attitude of regarding a state as a patrimony. It had, however, been laid down by the Treaty of Paris of 1817 that these possessions should not be hereditary, but should pass to another prince on Marie Louise's death. Yet no provision had been made as to how the transfer should be effected, nor as to how the duchess's private property should be determined.

Marie Louise had entered Parma in 1816, Count Neipperg sitting with her in her carriage. He had in the meantime not merely obtained complete control over the duchess's actions, as Metternich had wanted—he had also won her heart. The man in gold-braided uniform, sitting next her in her carriage, as Marie Louise entered Parma, was already her lover, and Napoleon, the great emperor and general, her husband and the father of her child, had been completely forgotten.

The affair was no secret at Parma, and it proved useless to try to hush it up; it soon became publicly known that on May 1, 1817, a daughter had been born to Marie Louise and her courtier in the palace of the ruler of Parma. This child received the name Albertine at her christening. Two years later on August 8, 1819,[13] Marie Louise gave birth to a son, who received the names William Albert, Count of Montenuovo—this being the Italian equivalent to the name Neipperg (Neuberg).

Both children were therefore illegitimate, for Marie Louise's husband, from whom she never obtained a divorce, did not die until May 5, 1821, in his distant island prison at St. Helena, while the marriage between Neipperg and Marie Louise, who had been living constantly together for some years, was celebrated in secret in September, 1821.

As the Duke of Reichstadt was still alive, Neipperg feared that on the death of their parents, his children might be left unprovided for. He therefore begged Marie Louise, while there was still time, to extract from her small dominions some money that could be declared to be her private property so the children could be given portions out of it. Marie Louise too realized that something must be done for their future, since on her death her lands would pass to another prince. She knew that there was an intention to construct a dukedom out of some Bohemian estates for the son by her marriage with Napoleon, but nobody at Vienna knew anything about the Montenuovos.

Up to 1826 the annual income from the territories ruled by Marie Louise had never been completely absorbed in administration, and it had been possible to allot large sums to the building of castles and bridges, and to improvements in the ducal gardens, etc. The Castle of Piacenza had been built, and the palaces at Parma and Colorno had been magnificently refurnished; bridges had been constructed over the Taro and the Trebbia; a theater had also been built; and a survey had been made of the whole country. Neipperg argued that these outlays had been a drain on Marie Louise's personal income, since it could not be disputed that any balance left over in administering the state belonged to the ruler.[14] The expenditure in question amounted to 10,435,000 francs,[15] and he said that she should ask that at any rate a part of this sum should be refunded in cash and applied to forming a private estate for the duchess.

Neipperg fully realized how far his understanding with Metternich went, and that the chancellor would not be able to refuse his request. The general decided with Marie Louise that the matter should at first be dealt with without mentioning the Montenuovo children, but only the Duke of Reichstadt when necessary. The general then wrote to Metternich to say[16] that after all the sacrifices which Marie Louise had made for the peace and welfare of Europe, and in view of the enormous benefits which she had conferred on her subjects, the question of her personal and private property ought to be cleared up. It was obvious that the castles, etc., which had been built out of savings were her own private property, and in order to secure the furniture, pictures, library, horses, and jewels, all of which she wished to leave to her son, negotiations should be immediately entered into with her successors, so that there should not be any dispute in the event of her death.

Neipperg proposed that either all the powers should conclude a supplementary convention, or a loan should be issued whereby what was due to the duchess could be made immediately available. Neipperg pointed out in a memorandum[17] written in support of his contention that "nobody can protest that, according to the law of the land, the whole direct and indirect income of the state, of whatever kind it may be, is absolutely at the sovereign's disposal; and she may, after the expenses of the administration in all its branches have been met out of the annual budget, dispose of any sums saved or balances left over, entirely as she thinks fit."

Metternich wanted to keep the other powers out of the matter as far as possible, and advised as a "less compromising procedure" that a direct agreement should be reached[18] with the Duke of Lucca, Marie Louise's designated successor. He too was in favor of "the application of carefully designed measures in order to place her Majesty's property beyond the reach of foreign claims and, in so far as it cannot actually be taken out of the country, to secure its separation from the property of the state."

The issue of an "appropriate loan" seemed to him to furnish an easier way out. "In considering a loan," he wrote, "we have, it is true, to keep in mind the fact that her Majesty is herself the beneficiary of the dukedoms; but this does not constitute a reason for denying her power to contract loans on the country's security by virtue of her recognized sovereign rights." The justification for such a loan was to be found in the fact that Marie Louise "has made notable and extraordinary sacrifices in carrying through important works for the benefit of her subjects and the country; and in order to a certain extent to indemnify herself for these sacrifices without imposing new burdens upon her beloved subjects or exacting the taxes due with excessive severity, she has decided to have recourse to a loan."

Metternich stated emphatically that the questions of the Duke of Reichstadt's inheritance, of a civil list for Marie Louise, or of the distinction between private property and the public treasury should not be brought before the public. The only result of this would be to draw undue attention to the matter and to compromise oneself. Neither did he consider it necessary to go into any question of accounts with the public, excepting such as had reference to the amount and conditions of the loan.

After lengthy correspondence, Neipperg reported in a personal discussion of the matter with Metternich at Vienna that[19] "her Majesty the archduchess has decided to propose to her council that she shall apply one-sixth of the state property [patrimonium] which is valued at thirty millions to the formation of an allodial property, which would be hers to dispose of as she pleased, and to make a gift to her subjects of the rest of the sum that she had used in works for the benefit of the public weal, the cost of which amounted to 10,439,000 francs. Marie Louise wishes to leave it to the council to decide whether the public debt of Parma shall be increased from its present amount of four millions to nine millions, or whether steps shall be taken to sell some of the state lands."

Metternich felt it difficult to come to a decision. The problems involved were of a difficult and exceedingly delicate nature, such as were hardly suitable for official discussion. He therefore decided again to ask Solomon Rothschild for his advice. When the question became acute Metternich was staying on his Johannisberg estate on the Rhine. He first informed Marie Louise that he would ask Solomon Rothschild's advice on all these matters, and that he was certain that Solomon would have the most useful ideas as to the best way of carrying out her wishes. He then wrote a long letter to Solomon,[20] carefully explaining to him that the archduchess wished to have available a capital sum of from five to six million francs, and to assure herself of the right to spend the income derivable from it in such a manner as she should deem fit. There were political objections to Neipperg's proposal that state lands should be sold; while if she increased the public debt, the archduchess was afraid of losing popularity.

"In my humble opinion," Metternich wrote, "the following scheme might be suitable. The archduchess should state publicly to her council that she could just as well have applied the state revenues—used of her own free will in erecting buildings for public purposes, or about to be so used—for acquiring a private property, but that she does not intend to do this; that she is leaving for the benefit of the state what has already been spent, as well as what will be spent, but wishes to secure a sum of five to six million francs out of the whole amount for her free disposal.

"After making this declaration she should take up the sum as stated and deposit it in the form of bonds in her treasury. The transaction may be a fictitious one, for she does not need ready money; she could leave the securities in her treasury, or issue them in whole or in part. My idea is that only five per cent securities should be created."

Metternich wished to have Solomon's views as to how this scheme should be put into practice in detail; and on receipt of the chancellor's letter, Solomon hastened "to submit his suggestions for his Highness's wise consideration."[21]

"In my humble opinion," he replied, "the object which you have in view could best and most effectively be realized in the following way. The government of Parma should create for the total capital sum involved a general inscribed bond, made out in the name of our firm, which bond should be deposited at the government's option in the I. and R. Austrian National Bank at Vienna, or in the Bank of Milan. On the security of this general bond we should issue bearer certificates of varying amounts . . . the holders of which should be competent to change them at any time . . . for inscribed bonds registered in the Great Debt Book of the state."

Solomon submitted a three per cent rentes certificate, which the French government had privileged his House to issue. A sinking fund would furnish the necessary security, and punctual interest payments should place the business on a sound basis. Solomon certainly wished first to obtain information regarding Parma's outstanding loans, but he did not recommend sending anybody there yet.

"Perhaps," he concluded, "your Highness could obtain the documents relating to them direct from Parma. This would not arouse attention as would be the case if I did so. Finally, I assure your Plighness that I shall most zealously use all my endeavors to deserve the satisfaction of her Majesty the Archduchess, as well as the gracious commendation of his Majesty the Emperor in this matter, since, as your Highness is aware, I always deem myself richly rewarded when I have the good fortune to contribute to the fulfilment of the lofty aims of the Imperial Court of Austria."

This was Solomon's official reply, for Metternich's use in dealing with Marie Louise. He sent also a covering confidential letter, intended for the chancellor alone.[22]

"I take the liberty, in accordance with your Highness's wish, of writing a few separate lines regarding the business dealt with in the enclosed business letter.

"I am pleased to say that I am confident of arranging this matter to the full satisfaction of her Majesty the Archduchess, and of H. M. the Emperor and King, and of achieving the desired results. As the financial considerations touch political questions at many points I venture to give it as my opinion that it is quite important for the archduchess to secure the capital in such a way that after her death the claims of her legal heirs cannot be disputed. The preparation of bearer bonds issued by an eminent banking firm, the holders of which will be constantly changing, seems to me to meet any possible eventuality. For if anyone attempted to seize such certificates . . . such action would ruin the credit of Parma for all time, consequently all governments who have an interest in maintaining an inviolable credit system would use their influence to prevent such a thing being done.

"In my opinion it would be better to fix the capital sum, not at six, but at ten millions, for as your Highness has yourself indicated, the state requires some millions for public institutes and buildings. In this way the bad impression which might, as the grand duchess fears, be produced by the issue of the loan would be largely counteracted by a consideration of the fact that the proceeds were to be adapted to purposes beneficial to the community and to the country. ... If on my return to Vienna your Highness should feel convinced that my personal presence in Parma would assist in promoting the business, I should not hesitate for a moment to obey your Highness's wish—which for me is a command—and should immediately proceed thither.

"I shall count myself happy indeed, if my efforts are crowned with the success we desire, and if I carry through the business to your Highness's satisfaction, which I value above all else."

Metternich acted in accordance with Solomon's wishes, and obtained documents regarding Parma's former loans; these he forwarded to Solomon. They, however, did not sufficiently enlighten Solomon. He wrote to Metternich that he could not obtain a clear view of the situation from them, such as was absolutely necessary to enable him to draw a valid conclusion, applicable to such an important transaction as was involved. "I therefore venture to suggest that your Highness invite her Majesty the Archduchess of Parma to send to me a confidential man of business, furnished with the necessary powers, so that he can let me have any information I require, and I can negotiate the matter with him under the direction of your Highness. ... It is with particular satisfaction that I am able constantly to assure your Highness that I count it the greatest honor to devote my best services to her Majesty the Archduchess of Parma, and to justify the confidence which that gracious lady reposes in me."[23]

Solomon's wish was granted, and Colonel von Werklein, who directly controlled the duchess's public purse, set off for Vienna, taking with him a letter from Marie Louise to her father, the emperor.

"My one desire this year," she wrote,[24] "is to have the great happiness of seeing you again, and I cherish the firm hope that this may be fulfilled. This letter will be brought by Colonel Werklein, whom I am sending to Prince Metternich in Vienna, in accordance with his wishes, so that he may give Rothschild all the explanations he needs in the financial matter which you know about. The loan itself, however, which is to clarify my claims on Parma, will be formally negotiated and concluded here, with the assistance of the finance president, and a plenipotentiary of Rothschild's. I will then be much more at ease regarding the future."

The main lines of the proposal to be submitted to Marie Louise were decided in long secret conferences between Metternich, Werklein, and Solomon.

Solomon Rothschild had brought with him a detailed memorandum[25] in which he showed that the commercial crisis had affected the credit of all states, so that public enthusiasm for investments of the kind in question had been considerably damped. Moreover, Parma's public debt was too small to arouse interest in any of the principal money-markets of Europe. These facts were mentioned In explanation of the rather unfavorable conditions which he was offering. He made it a conditio sine qua non that the consent of the Duke of Lucca, the presumptive successor, should be obtained. State lands of the value of twenty-five million would realize only twelve to fifteen millions at the outside, so that a loan was preferable; but Parma would have to undertake not to incur any further debt for a period of years.

"Finally," Solomon's memorandum concluded, "as his Highness Prince von Metternich is well aware, local conditions in Parma make it of the greatest importance that the government should be told most emphatically to maintain the strictest secrecy regarding the proposed business until the time comes for carrying it into effect. We must also bear in mind that the new loan will almost double the public debt of Parma, a fact which will have a far from good effect upon the country's securities, so that the loan cannot be issued at a very high price."

There was no fear that Metternich and Werklein would attempt to modify these conditions. They were far too well satisfied that the matter was being arranged so easily, to attempt to obtain better conditions. They therefore signed the draft agreement submitted by Rothschild and Mirabaud, under which a loan of 6,000,000 livres, bearing interest at 5 per cent was to be issued at 75 per cent on the security of the three dukedoms.

Both bankers undertook the sale of the bonds, stating explicitly in the contract[26] that it had been arranged "at the invitation of the government of Parma and under the auspices of his Highness Prince Metternich." The government of Parma also undertook for fifteen years not to issue any other loans, without the consent of Rothschild and Mirabaud, to reduce the present loan by 3 per cent per annum, and to obtain the requisite consent of the Court of Lucca. Metternich and Werklein agreed because they hoped easily to secure the other's agreement. "If he [the Duke of Lucca] should refuse," Metternich wrote,[27] "we should simply carry on and ignore him; that is, act against him."

Metternich expressed his satisfaction in a letter to Neipperg: "In settling the matter in this way every factor has been carefully considered. The best thing will be for your Majesty to sell your property to the House of Rothschild under a fictitious contract, and gradually . . . invest the funds skilfully. You will thus find in about twenty years that you have acquired the whole capital sum that you want without its having cost you a halfpenny, and you will also during the whole of the period have received 9 per cent interest upon it. . . . Unless I am very much mistaken you will then possess not merely six millions in cash but seven or eight."

The chancellor wrote a short letter to Marie Louise in which he expressed his satisfaction at the conclusion of such an excellent arrangement, which offered the prospect "of achieving the desired results in the simplest possible way. If on examining the contract," he added, "your Majesty shares my feelings, all my wishes will be completely satisfied."[28]

Marie Louise, who understood nothing of financial matters, but gathered that she would obtain the millions she wanted, agreed to everything, signed the contract, and rejoiced with Neipperg that the future of her children by the second marriage was now assured. She wrote to her father saying:[29] "I have accepted and ratified the fictitious loan of 300,000 francs annuities,[30] which Prince Metternich and Werklein have concluded at Vienna with Rothschild and Mirabaud. I should be glad if, when the Duke of Lucca is being asked to give his consent, everything affecting my private property and furniture could be cleared up at the same time, so that after my decease my son and those persons whom I wish to benefit will not become involved in actions and disputes with his successor."

Marie Louise, however, wished that Rothschild would carry out the agreement, even if the duke's consent were not obtained. Metternich informed Solomon of this, assuring him that he would personally endeavor to secure the duke's consent. But Solomon was most unwilling to proceed without this security.

"I must honestly confess to your Highness," he replied,[31] "that I can see no prospect of this matter being satisfactorily settled in such a case. Her Majesty cannot flatter herself that it will be easy to double the country's indebtedness and to find a market for such a large quantity of bonds, without offering the public every kind of security." He therefore emphatically begged Metternich to use all his influence to secure the duke's consent. The chancellor concurred all the more readily in Rothschild's appeal, as he himself wished to secure this consent in view of possible further developments.[32]

Baron von Werklein accordingly went to see the Duke of Lucca with a letter from Marie Louise and Metternich. The duke unexpectedly made no difficulties. He authorized Werklein to write to Marie Louise and Metternich and say that it was a pleasure to him to be able to meet the wishes of the archduchess.[33] He also permitted Neipperg to have an inventory taken of Princess Marie Louise's personal effects. He stipulated only that the duchess should not arrange any further loan, that she should create a sinking fund and sell no property belonging to the state.

In the end all parties were satisfied, including the Austrian Treasury, which immediately recouped itself out of the loan to the extent of 400,000 francs disbursed on military expenditure and on the maintenance of Marie Louise during the years 1814 to 1816.

Metternich wrote a self-congratulatory letter to Marie Louise herself[34] in which he said: "The matter has so far worked out so entirely in accordance with my wishes that I cannot refrain from congratulating myself for having first conceived the idea of an arrangement that so extensively harmonizes your Majesty's interests with the principles of justice."

There were certain distinctions to be conferred in connection with this business. Metternich wrote to Neipperg:[35] "Werklein will have told you that Herr von Rothschild wants a little St. George for his managing clerk.[36] This indicates a certain amount of vanity, the Rothschilds, in spite of their millions and their generous loyalty, having a craving[37] for honors and distinctions. At the same time I feel that it is not in the best of taste to ask that such an order should be conferred upon a clerk, and I suggest that you reply to this request that the order of Constantine is a knightly order. It constitutes a genuine religious brotherhood, and is not simply a distinction, and as the (Jewish) religion forbids its adherents to take the statutory oath of the order, the chancellor of the order would not be able to confer the cross. Temper your refusal with appropriate expressions of your extreme regret, and the matter will be disposed of. Write to . . . Herr Solomon on these lines, but do not mention me, as nobody can take offense at a statutory provision, while a single personal remark can do untold mischief, and I myself have committed the great offense of making it impossible for all time[38] for the Rothschild family to obtain an Austrian decoration. If he thought I was implicated he would regard me as a positive cannibal."

Metternich certainly did leave Rothschild under the impression that he was prepared to use his influence in favor of securing a distinction for Leopold von Wertheimstein; but Solomon himself had been disingenuous in the matter. In putting his secretary forward he had himself in view, for if Wertheimstein were to be made a Companion, he himself was bound to be made at least a Commander. As he took Metternich's pleasant words at their face value, and had no suspicion of the correspondence quoted above, he wrote the following letter to Werklein at Parma:[39]

"I have just taken the opportunity of asking our most esteemed prince to lend his powerful support to my request, and the gracious reply which I have received from his Highness justifies me in anticipating that if you will only be so good as to make a suggestion in that quarter, his Highness will not be averse from . . . graciously acceding to it.

"I leave it to you to choose the most propitious moment for putting forward the proposal, having full confidence in your feelings of friendship for me, which I know how to value. I feel a correspondingly lively desire to find a suitable occasion for reciprocating them, and you will afford me the best possible proof of your friendship if you will give me an opportunity of being of use to you on the earliest possible occasion."

Leopold von Wertheimstein set off for Parma with full powers to conclude the business. He brought with him a secret letter from Metternich to Neipperg. "To my great satisfaction the matter has gone through," the letter ran,[40] "and something must be done for the bearer. He is Rothschild's right-hand man, and a splendid young fellow of first-rate intelligence. He hopes to get the minor cross; you know my views on that matter. Give him a nice present of a more useful kind."

The deeds were sealed, signed and delivered.[41] The two contracting firms underwrote 284,000 lire 5 per cent perpetual annuities representing a nominal capital of 5,680,000 lire at 75 per cent, i.e., 4,260,000 lire altogether were to be paid in monthly instalments of 355,000 lire. Rothschild and Mirabaud were if possible to sell the securities within six months, and they received as their commission 2 per cent of the nominal capital of the whole public debt of Parma, which amounted to 12,008,000 lire, so that they got 240,160 lire. Marie Louise informed her father[42] that they had now concluded the contract with Rothschild and Mirabaud which Prince Metternich had prepared at Vienna, and that she was exceedingly relieved.

No sooner had the transaction been completed than Solomon Rothschild began to wonder how Marie Louise proposed to invest the sums of which she would become possessed. He meant to get this business for himself to the exclusion of his partner Mirabaud; and he proposed to Metternich that the duchess should purchase shares in the Austrian National Bank through the firm of Rothschild "at a fixed average price to be agreed," and deposit these shares in Vienna. Metternich supported Solomon's plan because he hoped that the money would thus certainly remain in Vienna, and would not, as the emperor feared, be dissipated by the duchess. He therefore used his influence with Marie Louise and Neipperg in support of Solomon's proposal, without considering that Solomon was hoping thus to derive further profit from the transaction.

While Wertheimstein was on his way to Parma, "Metternich had accordingly written to the duchess in the following terms:[43] "Rothschild has some ideas regarding a transaction which is as easy as it should be advantageous for your Majesty, and which he would like to negotiate discreetly with someone who can be trusted. Monsieur Mirabaud will be in Parma, and Rothschild's authorized agent will not be able to discuss this matter in his presence. I know what Rothschild has in mind, and I guarantee that your Majesty cannot do better than to act in accordance with his suggestions."

Metternich wrote in the same sense to Neipperg and asked him to send Werklein to Vienna. Werklein brought with him a letter from Marie Louise to Metternich in which she said: "You have always given me such good advice that my interests cannot be in better hands, and I am entirely relieved with regard to my future."[44]

He also received a letter from Neipperg[45] stating:

"Herr von Wertheimstein has displayed as much zeal as he has understanding, and her Majesty has recommended that a ring with monogram of the value of 3,000 francs be given him."

Marie Louise also asked Metternich to let her know what would be a suitable present for Solomon, as the statutes of the Order of St. George made it quite impossible to admit him.

Metternich and Rothschild discussed the proposed investment of the money with Werklein at Vienna, and Werklein brought a detailed memorandum to Marie Louise[46] in which Rothschild showed that it would be to her advantage to sell the Parma bonds, and to invest the money thus made available in other suitable public securities. He pointed out that the Parma bonds did not constitute as good a security as those of larger states, since it was always the smaller states that were first endangered through political movements of any importance. He suggested that shares in the national bank would constitute an exceedingly good and safe investment.

Solomon Rothschild offered to carry through the business on the basis of the average purchase price of the shares during the years 1825 and 1826, this price to remain unaffected by any future changes, provided that he was granted a share in the dividends. Marie Louise accepted his offer, subject to the one condition that one-third of the share certificates should be sent to her at Parma, the others being deposited in the treasury at Vienna.[47]

Marie Louise maintained a constant business relationship with the House of Rothschild, even after the death of her second husband Neipperg. Everything connected both with the loan and with the budget of Parma went off sc well that in 1828 fully three million francs[48] were made available for Rothschild to apply in the purchase of 1,054 national bank shares. Marie Louise also en-

